Perez testified that one afternoon he was in the shop and was approached by Mike Grant, who told him that the collective-bargaining agreement was to expire in a few days and that he could lay him off so that he would be able to collect unemployment compensation, inasmuch as he knew that the employees were going to walk out on strike. (Perez opted to be laid off.) Perez also went on to testify that Mike Grant said to him that there was not going to be a union anyway, that it was asking for too much, more than Respondent could afford. Perez further testified that he told at least three or four other employees about Mike Grant's statement to the effect that there would no longer be a union at the shop.

According to Perez, this conversation with Mike Grant was apparently a followup to a conversation he had had on the previous day with Mike Grant, during which Mike Grant had told him of an incident that occurred when he Grant had been in a ball game and had run into the owner of another business such as Respondent's. Perez recounted that Mike Grant went on to say to him that he was supposed to "get back" to the owner of the other shop and let him know what came about in the contract negotiations and that he intended to tell the other owner that he Grant could not afford the Union.

Finally, Perez testified that only several days preceding the conversations with Mike Grant, set out above, he overheard an exchange between Grant and an employee named Preston Williams, who, it developed, is a brother-in-law to Grant. The exchange between Preston Williams and Mike Grant was quite loud and heated, so that all those in the shop could overhear it. According to Perez, Grant stated that Preston and another employee were not working fast enough. When Williams responded that the blades on the machines he was given to work with were dull and needed sharpening, Grant became upset and called Williams a big cry baby and went on to say that "once we get the Union out" he could fire Williams.

[3] Perez repeatedly asserted that his employment in 1985 was during June, and that the conversation about to be recited occurred immediately prior to 28 June. He was obviously mistaken. Mike Grant admitted having this conversation with Perez, and that it occurred prior to 1 June.

Grant testified about these conversations, and admitted that it occurred on the Thursday before the employees voted on whether to accept Respondent's final offer.[4] Grant would have it that he told Perez that he intended to try to settle the dispute with the Union regarding a new collective-bargaining agreement, but he seems in his further testimony to have tacitly acknowledged that he regarded the fact of a strike as a foregone conclusion. And, while he was asked to (and did) deny that he had said words to the effect that he would try to get rid of the Union, I regard his denial as tepid, and as not quite directly meeting that which he had been accused of, which was that he had simply stated to Perez that there was not going to be a union anyway.

Grant also acknowledged that he had had a conversation with Perez on the day preceding that would have been Wednesday, 29 May. He stated that during this conversation, he simply told Perez of a conversation he had with the owner of another business in Orange County on the previous night, and that he merely said to Perez that he had told his counterpart that the Union was asking for a heck of a lot and received a sort of commiserating response.

And finally, he acknowledged that he had a dispute with Preston Williams in the shop, which may have been overheard by Perez and others.[5] Grant admitted that it was probably true that during the course of the shouting match with his brother-in-law, Preston Williams, in which he upbraided his brother-in-law for being a slow worker, he probably did say that he would "fire his ass," and that he "might have" said something to the effect of "To hell with you and the Union!"

Perez was an extremely credible witness despite his seeming inability to get a particular date straight. I have no reason to doubt the truth of the substance of his testimony, especially in light of the less than fervent or convincing denials put forward by Mike Grant.

Accordingly, I find and conclude that Respondent, through Grant, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees when Grant told Perez on 30 May that there was not going to be a union, as well as the loud and angry threat overheard by Perez (and probably others) in the shop in the latter part of June when Grant threatened to fire Williams once the Union was out of the way. I conclude that each such threat would necessarily have the reasonable effect on employees of restraining them, and coercing them from engaging in union activities.

As far as the conversation between Grant and Perez goes concerning the conversation that Grant recounted that he had had with the owner of another business at a ball game, I do not find that any of the language there rises to the level of a threat. At most, such language is ambiguous or indicative of a state of mind by Grant that he simply did not know what would happen in the future.

D. Further Background Facts Regarding the Alleged Refusal to Bargain

It seems clear that throughout the bargaining history between Respondent and the Union, they had enjoyed an amicable relationship. Grievances had been few or nonexistent. Indeed, the relationship between Grant's father and Doore, the Union's business agent, was such that Doore had literally changed Grant's diapers many years ago.

Nevertheless, in early 1985 an incident occurred which, in my opinion, lies at the heart of the Respondent's greatly changed attitude toward the Union. According to Mike Grant, Doore's boss at the Union is Marvin Haines. Grant recalled that in the summer of 1983 Doore came to him asking him to give a job to Marvin Haines' son, a member of the Union and out of work. Grant testified that both Doore and Haines were old friends of his father and that "it wouldn't have killed me to have an extra helper in the shop"; so out of friendship to Haines and Doore, and in consideration of the friendship they had with his dad for many years, he agreed to give a job to young Lloyd Haines.

Grant recalled that Lloyd worked there for about a year before being laid off for lack of work and then was recalled after a time. After the layoff he worked for Respondent until March or April 1985. In February or March, however, Lloyd Haines, while working at Respondent's shop, got into an argument about who was going to use a burning outfit with another employee named Harry Davenport. Their fight was confined to yelling at one another, with no pushing or shoving. Nevertheless, Mike Grant got in the middle and broke them up. He told both of them to go back to work and just drop the matter. Davenport, according to Grant, turned and went back to work, but Haines blew up and started cursing, threw his tape measure against the wall, stormed out of the shop, got in his car, and drove away. This occurred sometime shortly after the workday had just begun. Young Haines stayed away for the balance of the day. Late that afternoon, Lloyd Haines' father, Marvin Haines, called Grant and asked what was happening. Grant related to him the story set out above. Marvin Haines then stated that his son Lloyd would be back to work on the following morning. Grant agreed. Before their telephone conversation was over, Marvin Haines told Grant that he was going to come by to see Grant.

The next morning Lloyd Haines returned to his job with Respondent. Thirty minutes or an hour later, his father, Marvin, showed up and came across Mike Grant in the parking lot. Among other things, according to Grant's undisputed testimony, Marvin Haines told him that he did not like what had happened yesterday, and that his son had told him around the dinner table the previous evening that there were a lot of things that were going on in the shop that he did not like, since he heard that Le Fort was getting away with too much, compared with other shops. Grant responded that he did not know what he was talking about and went on to say that the shop was run according to the Union's book, and that Respondent has always gotten along well with the Union, since each had shown the ability to give a little bit and sometimes to take a little bit in order to enjoy a good working relationship. Grant was met only by Marvin Haines' rejoinder that he did not like everyone in the shop picking on his son. At that Mike Grant recounted how he, himself, had worked in the shop for his dad for 15 or 20 years and had been picked on because he was the son of the owner and that Lloyd, Marvin's son, was going through a little bit of the same thing. Grant testified that Marvin Haines told him that he was not "buying this crap" and went on to remark that Doore was letting Respondent get away with too much. Mike Grant testified that he told Haines, that he did not know what he was talking about and he did not think that he was being fair to Doore, and that they got along perfectly well.

[4] This would place the conversation on Thursday, 30 May, because it is conceded by all the parties that the vote concerning acceptance or rejection of the offer occurred on Saturday, 1 June.

[5] He explained that this occurred shortly following an incident between an employee named Yates and other employees. According to Grant, Yates was subjected to verbal harassment by union adherents which caused him to quit his job and remain off work for a couple of days.

Then, according to Grant, Marvin Haines stated "That's bullshit, and if I have to, I'll come down here every day and I'll tell you how to run your company as far as who you will hire and who you will put out on your field jobs." Grant told Haines that he was full of shit, and started to walk away. Then he calmed down a bit and Haines grabbed him. Grant said to Haines, "Look, Marv, I don't know if you are picking on me because I am a new, young owner, or if you think I'm green or what, but I'm not going to stand by and have you come and tell me how to run my business. I don't need you and I don't need your union. If you want to work hand-in-hand like we have done in the past with Mr. Doore and yourself and my father, I'll be more than happy to work out with you people, but you're not going to tell me how to run my own company." Marvin Haines then left.

According to Grant, after this incident Doore seemed "just a little bit cold," and there was one grievance filed when Grant laid off Marvin Haines' son, together with three or four other people, because of lack of work.

E. The Alleged Refusal to Bargain

Briefly recapping, Respondent and the Charging Party were parties to a succession of collective-bargaining agreements for approximately 40 years. The most recent agreement was effective from 1 June 1982 to 31 May 1985. On 26 March the Charging Party's president wrote Respondent a standard reopening letter to begin negotiations toward a new collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent, through counsel, sent a similar letter to the Charging Party on 28 March and submitted proposals toward a new contract on 29 March.

Respondent met with the Union on 11 and 25 April and 1 May in negotiations. On this last date, the Union submitted a proposal to Respondent.

The parties met in further negotiations on 7, 13, 17, and 23 May.

On 29 May Doore wrote a letter to all employees covered by the expiring contract, telling them that a meeting would be held on 1 June for them to accept or reject Respondent's "last and final proposal for a new working agreement."

On 30 May Respondent, through counsel, wrote to Doore stating that Respondent "has just concluded extensive negotiations with you" and that the Respondent "deems that all meaningful negotiations have been concluded inasmuch as the major areas of dispute remain unresolved." The letter went on to recite that it was enclosing a copy of the Respondent's best and final offer, that if Respondent's enclosed best and final proposal was not accepted by employees and the Union by 1 June that it would deem a bona fide impasse to have been reached, that if not accepted, all proposals from Respondent were withdrawn, and that if not accepted, Respondent intended to implement its final economic proposals. Finally, as recited therein, Respondent's letter to Doore did enclose a copy of a complete proposal.

Respondent's employees did meet and vote on the proposal before them. They determined to reject it. However, they did not vote to engage in strike activity and have not done so to date.

Instead, the parties met again on 3 and 7 June. As previously noted, and as stipulated at the trial, the parties found themselves continuing to be in disagreement over provisions for union security, checkoff, and pension.

On 11 June Respondent through counsel, wrote to the Union that Respondent was unwilling to reinstate certain provisions that had been in its previous proposals having to do with union shop and checkoff, and the Union's pension plan. This letter also enclosed another "final offer" from Respondent to the Union for a collective-bargaining agreement.[6] The letter went on to recite that if not accepted by 14 June Respondent would deem a bona fide impasse to have been reached and would automatically withdraw all offers.

There has been no substantial change in the stance of the parties since that time, except that on 21 October the Union submitted a proposal to Respondent and on 27 November Respondent submitted a proposal to the Union.

At the trial the parties were able to stipulate that the differences between them that prevented a collective-bargaining agreement from being reached lay in the areas of union security, dues checkoff, and the pension plan. Although Respondent admits that it ceased making payments to the pension, health, and welfare funds pursuant to provisions in the expired collective-bargaining agreement on 1 June, the parties stipulated further at trial that, should any liability be found on Respondent's part to have continued such payments, that such liability should end as of 1 December.

Discussions and Conclusions

The General Counsel concedes in its brief that Respondent's conduct during negotiations through 30 May does not constitute bad-faith bargaining per se. Yet he argues that the violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as previously found, constitute valid evidence of Respondent's mindset throughout these negotiations, and particularly, in its presentation of what the General Counsel terms "regressive" collective-bargaining proposals on 11 June.

[6] Albeit, for only 1 year, rather than 2 years, as has been previously proposed.

In any discussion of allegations such as these, it is always necessary to briefly review the duties owed to one another by the parties to collective-bargaining negotiations. First of all, the Act imposes on employers and unions alike the duty to conduct their negotiations with one another in good faith. The failure of a party to do so may result in a finding that it has committed an unfair labor practice. In cases involving allegations against employers, the violation is of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, which makes it illegal for an employer to "refuse to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees."

Second, the obligation to bargain collectively, although never satisfied by application of rote or formula, is defined in Section 8(d) of the Act to include > the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession;

Determinations regarding good faith must necessarily be made on a case-by-case basis. It must be remembered, however, that some sorts of conduct are deemed so patently contrary to genuine desire to reach agreement that proof of the mere fact of their occurrence will sustain a finding of a per se violation. Actions that fly in the face of the 8(d) requirements have long been considered to be per se violations of the Act's bargaining duty regardless of any other good-faith activities. For example, if an employer were, during negotiations, to make unilateral increases in wages, changes in merit wage policy and sick leave policy, all of which are deemed to be "mandatory" subjects of bargaining, it will be held guilty of a per se violation of Section 8(a)(5). When faced with such a situation, the Supreme Court said > a refusal to negotiate in fact as to any subject which is within Section 8(d) and about which the union seeks to negotiate, violates Section 8(a)(5), though the employer has every desire to reach agreement with the union upon an overall collective bargaining agreement and earnestly and all good faith bargains to that end. [NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743 (1962).]

However, obvious per se violations aside, the courts consider an employer's entire course of conduct, or the totality of circumstances, in determining good-or bad-faith bargaining. The appropriate standard is whether the circumstances clearly indicate "a desire not to reach an agreement with the union." NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131 (1st Cir. 1953). In Altanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600 (1984), the Board stated its adherence to this "totality of conduct" test to be utilized in deciding whether an employer is, on the one hand, engaging in lawful, hard bargaining to achieve a contract that it considers desirable, or, on the other hand, is unlawfully endeavoring to frustrate the possibility of arriving at any agreement. There the Board specifically reiterated that a party is entitled to stand firm on a position if he reasonably believes that it is fair and proper or that he has sufficient bargaining strength to force the other party to agree, citing NLRB v. Advanced Business Forms Corp., 474 F.2d 457, 467 (2d Cir. 1973). Adamant insistence on a bargaining position was again stated to be an insufficient basis for a finding of bad faith in and of itself, citing Neon Signs Corp. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1203 (5th Cir. 1979). The Board in Atlanta Hilton Tower recited a number of criteria of bad faith, among which were "unreasonable bargaining demands," and "unilateral changes in mandatory subjects of bargaining." Nevertheless, the Board held to its old and often stated view that employers are bound to make some reasonable effort in some direction to compose differences with representatives of employees, in order that Section 8(a)(5) of the Act be read as imposing some substantial obligation.

Although not intending to depart from the General Counsel's concession that Respondent did not engage in activities that amount to per se violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act prior to 30 May, it must be observed that Respondent was most certainly engaged in hard bargaining and was seeking substantial concessions at all times throughout these negotiations. As Respondent concedes in its brief, "the employer wished to delete from the prior agreement and the Union wished to retain the union shop, the dues check-off, and employer contributions to the National Boilermakers-Blacksmith Pension Fund." The Respondent contends that it had sound, competitive business reasons for its positions on these issues, such as the loss of gross volume and profit due to nonunion competition, the Union's inability to supply workers with requisite skills, the Employer's unwillingness to compel employees hired outside the Union's hiring hall to join the Union, the increased costs associated with the dues checkoff, the fear of future withdrawal liability under the pension plan, and genuine fear of loss of management controls as a result of the confrontation between Respondent's management and the "local lodge president [sic]." Respondent presented no documentation of any sort at the trial in support of these claims of economic distress. Nor did the testimony of Grant sustantially assist Respondent's position, for I observed him to testify only in vague and conclusionary terms, even assisted (as he was) by the leading and suggestive questions of his counsel, except regarding the issues of his confrontation with the Union's president.

Grant's version of the confrontation is the only version that is in the record. I accept it as evidence of Respondent's valid concern at the time it occurred that a real change in its relationship with the Union might be in the offing. However, despite the fact that Grant thereafter found Doore to be "a little cold," and notwithstanding the fact that one grievance was filed, I see no real warrant for Respondent concluding that the Union had embarked on a course remarkably different, in its relationship with Respondent, from that which had obtained for decades. Nor, of course, which might legitimize Grant's threatening statements to employees, found previously.

Instead, it appears most likely to me that Grant's confrontation with the Union's president, plus Grant's unhappiness with the failure of the Union to "bend the rules" a bit and provide his father with a pension, were the real motivating factors behind Respondent's changed bargaining posture in 1985, compared to previous years.

Accordingly, I am inclined to find that the changes set forth in Respondent's bargaining proposal following 1 June to be so regressive as to warrant my drawing the inference, given my understanding of the background set forth above, that Respondent simply had no real intent to seek to compose its differences with its employees.

Respondent's proposal of 30 May was rejected by employees and its next proposal was simply to abolish the previous practice and agreement for employees to be hired through the Union, a practice that was shown by the evidence to have been followed between the parties with a true spirit of accommodation for whatever conditions were current when a question arose.

Its proposal also weakened the previous requirement that 48 hours notice of layoff or recall be given, to provide that it need only be given "whenever feasible."

Other changes in provisions concerning qualifying for holiday pay, startup time, the probationary period, a contractual duration of only 1 year, and the abolition of any right to compel arbitration feature the Respondent's proposal of 11 June.

Considering these changes, together with the key issues having to do with the union shop, the dues checkoff, and the employer contributions to the pension, health, and welfare funds, it seems very difficult for me to imagine just how the employer could be said to have been making "some reasonable effort in some form to compose his differences with the Union." NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404 (1952). Thus, I would find and conclude on these facts and circumstances that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by engaging in surface bargaining.

There exists other, and even more persuasive evidence of a violation of Section 8(a)(5) by Respondent. This is furnished by the Respondent's unilateral implementation of a health and welfare plan for its employees, and its concurrent cessation of payments to the trust fund provided in the expiring collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondent contends that its actions in this regard are privileged by virtue of its having proposed the abolition of the payments to the joint trust throughout the negotiations as well as that a bona fide impasse in negotiations occurred on 1 June, when the employees rejected Respondent's contract proposal.

The law relating to this issue is well settled. If the parties to collective-bargaining negotiations fail in good-faith efforts to reach agreement, an employer does not thereafter violate the Act by putting into effect, or implementing, provisions that are consistent with proposals previously advanced to the collective-bargaining representative of the employees and that met with rejection. NLRB v. Williamsburg Steel Products, 369 U.S. 736, 745 (1962); J. Hofert Co., 269 NLRB 520 (1984); Western Newspaper Publishing Co., 269 NLRB 355 (1984). Such failure of agreement is termed an "impasse."

In Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), petition for review denied sub nom. Television Artists AFTRA v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968), the Board set forth certain first principles relative to the concept of impasse, as follows:

> An employer violates his duty to bargain if, when negotiations are sought or in progress, he unilaterally institutes changes in existing terms and conditions of employment. On the other hand, after bargaining to an impasse, that is, after good-faith negotiations have exhausted the prospects of concluding an agreement, an employer does not violate the Act by making unilateral changes that are reasonably comprehended within his pre-impasse proposals.
> Whether a bargaining impasse exists is a matter of judgment. The bargaining history, the good faith of the parties in negotiations, the length of the negotiations, the importance of the issue or issues as to which there is disagreement, the contemporaneous understanding of the parties as to the state of negotiations are all relevant factors to be considered in deciding whether an impasse in bargaining existed.

In a fairly recent case the Board has demonstrated its adherence to the principles announced in Taft Broadcasting. See E. I. duPont & Co., 268 NLRB 1075 (1984).

It must be conceded that the issues stipulated by the parties as having been those that prevented agreement were each of extreme importance. Thus, it can not be said that the unfair labor practices of Respondent, in threatening its employees[7] and by engaging in surface bargaining have not fatally flawed Respondent's argument that it engaged in negotiations in good faith. In other words, no matter how deadlocked the negotiations appeared to have been on 1 June, they were tainted by the unfair labor practices of the Respondent. The evident deadlock was prevented thereby from ever ripening into a good-faith impasse, which would have privileged Respondent in its unilateral changes in the health and welfare system and pension plan. This is so because a deadlock that is caused by a party who refuses to bargain in good faith is not a legally cognizable impasse justifying unilateral action. Bethlehem Steel Co., 147 NLRB 977, 978 (1964); Northland Camps, Inc., 179 NLRB 36 (1969). See also NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 572 F.2d 1343, 1349 (9th Cir. 1978). Based on these considerations, I find that no impasse existed from and after 1 June and that, as a result, Respondent was not privileged to implement its last and final offer.[8]

[7] Two witnesses testified that while employees of Respondent, they were threatened with words indicating that they could not depend on the continued presence of their collective-bargaining representative in the workplace. I have found those threats violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. I find here that they also reached a very substantial portion of Respondent's work force, as, according to Grant's testimony, that work force consisted of approximately 19 employees at the time that the threats were made. Recalling that in addition to the two employees who heard the threats, there were also three or four others to whom one employee repeated the threats he had heard, it seems apparent that at least 20 to 25 percent of the Respondent's total work force was made aware of Respondent's threats. The impact of such threats on the Union's base of support among employees, including its ability to obtain strike authorization, can only be speculated on.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. L. W. Le Fort Company, Inc. is now, and at all times material has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers Lodge No. 92, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees in Respondent's plant located at 1136 Richfield Road, Placentia, California, performing work in manufacturing, fabricating, assembling, contract, and repair shops, including the operation of all machines, mechanical devices, and tools that may be required to properly perform and complete the work covered by the scope of (the collective-bargaining) agreement (that expired between the parties on 31 May 1985); excluding all employees who are presently represented through a collective-bargaining agreement with other unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO, office and clerical employees, technical and professional employees, guards and supervisory employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since at least on or about 1 June 1980, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the unit found appropriate above, for the purposes of collective bargaining, within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By engaging in collective bargaining without a real intent to reach agreement and by instead engaging in "surface bargaining," by unilaterally changing existing working conditions at a time when no valid impasse in negotiations existed concerning mandatory subjects of bargaining, and by threatening employees that their collective-bargaining representative would not be present to represent them in the future, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not violated the Act except as set forth above.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, and adverse effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has committed various unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Since the violations of the Act disclose an attitude on the part of the Respondent to behave without regard to the rights of its employees, I will recommend to the Board a broad remedy designed to suppress any and all violations of a like or related nature. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). It will be required that Respondent bargain collectively in good faith with the Union and, if agreement is reached, embody that agreement in a written, signed contract. Respondent will also be required to post the usual notice advising employees of their rights and the results of this case.

In order that the requirement to bargain in good faith may have meaning, Respondent shall be ordered to reinstate the wages, hours, and working conditions in effect at the expiration of the 1982-1985 collective-bargaining agreement between the parties on 1 June 1985, if requested by the Union, and to maintain such wages, hours, and working conditions in effect unless and until modified by agreement with the Union or reaching a valid impasse in negotiations.

Because I have found that Respondent violated the Act by discontinuing its payments to the health, welfare, and pension funds provided for the unit employees under the expired collective-bargaining agreement, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to restore, on the Union's written request, the health, welfare, and pension program that was in effect previously, and to make payments thereto identical to those that it would have paid had it not unlawfully discontinued payments up until the stipulated cutoff date of the parties of 1 December 1985. Respondent shall also be required to make whole any employees for additional expenses incurred, or insurance benefits lost by reason of its unilateral change in the insurance coverage, together with interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[8] Presuming, at this point, that the implementation of the last and final offer was sufficently "consistent" with the terms previously offered the Union.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 9, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified below.

The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to find that the Respondent's office manager, Ed Esther, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by informing Ken Love that he was not hired because of his union activities. We find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions.

The Respondent purchased its Hughson facility from Knudsen Corporation in November 1986.[3] The Respondent commenced operating the facility on December 2 with a supervisory staff and work force composed primarily of former Knudsen officials and employees. Ken Love, a former Knudsen production employee, was not hired by the Respondent. On December 24, Love spotted the cars of the Respondent's plant superintendent, Randy Ferguson, and office manager, Ed Esther, outside a local bar. Love entered the bar and bought Ferguson and Esther a beer. He then asked Ferguson why he had not been hired. Ferguson answered that there were a lot of factors and he did not care to discuss it. Ferguson then left.

Love sat down and drank several more beers with Esther. He then asked Esther to tell him the truth about why he was not hired by the Respondent. Esther stated, "just between me and you," the Respondent was "blackballing" Love because he was a "strong union man." Love replied that he was not a strong unionman and did not even attend union meetings.

The judge noted that Esther's authority was limited to office employees and that he had no authority or responsibility in the hiring of production and maintenance employees. He found that Esther had expressed a personal opinion. He also concluded that a conversation occurring at a bar after a few drinks should raise no reasonable expectation that Esther was acting on behalf of the Respondent. Accordingly, the judge dismissed this allegation of the complaint on the basis that Esther's remarks were nothing more than speculation or his personal opinion that could not be imputed to the Respondent. We disagree.

Although Esther did not supervise employees in Love's former department, he was an office manager with undisputed supervisory status. Therefore, his remarks to Love were bound to carry some weight—the degree of weight and the likely interpretation to be given the remarks depending on their context.[4] In this regard, Esther's comments occurred shortly after Love had initiated a conversation with Esther and Ferguson, who was responsible for the hiring of production and maintenance employees, about the failure to hire Love. Although the conversation continued in the social milieu of drinking at a bar, Love's inquiry about hiring to Ferguson and his reiteration of this inquiry to Esther do not appear to have been purely social, informal, or amicable. Furthermore, Esther's prefatory "just between you and me" would reasonably tend to indicate that he was communicating confidential information gained from a management source instead of merely expressing a personal opinion, even if that was what he actually was doing. Under these circumstances, Esther would reasonably appear to be acting as the Respondent's agent in making the clearly coercive statement that the Respondent had not hired Love because he was a strong unionman. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[5]

We agree with the judge, however, that Esther's remarks did not establish union animus with respect to the Respondent's hiring process. As the judge found, Esther had no authority or responsi-

There also is no evidence that he had any involvement in the decision whether Love or the other production and maintenance employees should have been hired. Accordingly, we do not find sufficient basis for inferring that Esther was speaking with actual knowledge of the Respondent's motive for not hiring these employees.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Add the following as Conclusion of Law 4.

"4. By informing an employee that it would not hire him because of his past union activities, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1)."

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, California Cooperative Creamery, Hughson, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Informing any employee that he would not be hired because of his past union activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its facility in Hughson, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT inform any employee that he would not be hired because of his union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

CALIFORNIA COOPERATIVE CREAMERY

William O'Connor, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Wesley Sizoo, Esq. (Moore, Sizoo & Cantwell), of Walnut Creek, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial at Modesto, California, on November 18 and 23, 1987. On June 29, 1987,[1] the Acting Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing, based on a charge filed on April 23 by Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Union Local No. 386, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union), alleging that California Cooperative Creamery (Respondent) has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq).

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by refusing to hire employees Tom Johnson, Jay Peeples, Charles Barker, Otis Hale, Ken Love, and Richard Smith because they had engaged in certain protected union activities. The complaint further alleges that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) by implying to an employee that other applicants had not been hired because of their protected union activities, and by informing an employee that he was not hired because he was "a strong union man."

The parties were permitted during the hearing to introduce relevant evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and argue orally. Posttrial briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent. On the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

[1] Unless otherwise stated, all dates occurred in 1987.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a California corporation with its office and principal place of business in Petaluma, California, with a plant located in Hughson, California, where it has been engaged in the nonretail processing, marketing, and sale of milk products.

During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent shipped goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. Respondent admits and I find that, at all times material, it has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Respondent admits and I find that, at all times material, the Union has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background and Issues

Respondent purchased its Hughson, California facility in November 1986 from Knudsen Corporation, which had gone into bankruptcy. The Union had represented the production and maintenance employees at the Hughson facility at least 10 years under Knudsen's ownership and Knudsen's predecessors, Foremost and Foremost-Mckesson. Knudsen ceased its Hughson operation on October 14, 1986.

On November 24, 1986, Respondent finalized its purchase of the Hughson facility. It agreed to recognize the Union and met on three occasions for contract negotiations but no agreement was reached. During negotiations, the Union took the position that the Respondent should hire the former Knudsen employees based on seniority. Respondent took the position that it would consider seniority but would not hire solely on the basis of seniority. No agreement was reached on this subject. Respondent began hiring in late November 1986, and its first employees began working on December 2, 1986. Respondent hired former Knudsen employees but did not hire on the basis of seniority. After three negotiation sessions, a decertification petition was filed in Case 32–RD–802. Negotiations were suspended at the suggestion of the Union, pending the outcome of the decertification election. On April 17, 1987, the Union lost the representation election and was decertified. Respondent continued to hire former Knudsen employees. At the time of the instant hearing, Respondent had only hired former Knudsen employees to work at Hughson with just three exceptions. Two of the exceptions were part-time summer employees who were sons of milk producers who sold products to Respondent. The other exception was an experienced employee who was hired on the basis of a recommendation of a supervisor.

Within this factual background, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent refused to hire Johnson, a union vice president and shop steward, Peeples, Barker, Hale, Love, and Smith because the employees filed grievances or otherwise sought to enforce collective-bargaining agreements between the Union and Respondent's predecessors. Further, the complaint alleges that during the interviewing processes, Tim Colbert, Respondent's plant manager, told Gary Guyer, an employee, that Respondent had not hired Johnson and Peeples because of their protected union activities. Finally, the complaint alleges that Ed Esther, Respondent's office manager, told Love that Love was not hired because he was "a strong union man." Respondent denies all allegations of the complaint.

B. The Hiring Process

In November and December 1986, Respondent received numerous job applications for employment at the Hughson facility. The applications were reviewed by Tim Colbert, plant manager, and Randy Ferguson, plant superintendent. Colbert had been plant manager at the Hughson facility since 1979. Ferguson had been plant superintendent at the facility since 1982 and had been a shift superintendent from 1979 to 1982. Colbert and Ferguson had received instructions from Douglas Hecker, Respondent's comptroller, to use the last seniority list from Knudsen and "pick the best possible employees" from the list. Hecker told Colbert that Respondent wanted a turnkey operation, meaning that the company wanted to start up as close to the date of the plant acquisition as possible. Colbert and Ferguson reviewed the applications and chose 28 former Knudsen employees for interviews. The 28 former Knudsen employees were interviewed by Colbert, Ferguson, Hecker, and Ralph Sartori, Respondent's plant manager at it Petaluma facility.[2] The 28 employees were all eventually hired by Respondent. After the initial interviews, Hecker and Sartori played no further role in the hiring process. There is no allegation nor any evidence that Hecker or Sartori had any union animus, or had any knowledge of union activities by any of the applicants for employment.

The first group of employees hired, the foremen, began working on December 2. Several others were hired to help clean up and prepare for a state inspection scheduled on December 7. The work force gradually expanded thereafter. As mentioned earlier, all employers hired were former Knudsen employees with only three exceptions.

The six alleged discriminatees all applied for employment with Respondent but were not hired. On November 28, Johnson, the shop steward and a union vice president, went to the plant and talked to Colbert. Colbert confirmed that Johnson was not one of the initial hires. Colbert said he had gone through the applications "with great emotions." Colbert said that the warehouse where Johnson worked would probably be the last department to start back up again. Colbert did not inform Johnson that he (Johnson) would not be hired.

Johnson attended the negotiating sessions and, in late December, raised the question why he, and other senior employees, had been passed over in the hiring process. Mike Nash, Respondent's CEO, indicated that he believed the employees were only qualified to perform the jobs listed on the seniority list given Respondent by the Union. Johnson took the position that the senior employee were qualified to perform numerous jobs in the plant based on their past experience with Knudsen. Nash answered that he would discuss the matter with Colbert.

C. The Alleged Threat by Esther

Ken Love, a former Knudsen employee, testified that on Christmas Eve, he spotted the cars of Ferguson and Ed Esther, office manager, parked outside the local bar near the Hughson facility. Love entered the bar with his son and brother. Love bought Ferguson and Esther a beer and then asked Ferguson why he was not hired. Ferguson answered that there were "a lot of factors" and he did not care to discuss it. Love's brother said that Ken knew every job in the plant and began to argue with Ferguson. Ferguson then left.

Love sat down with Esther and the two continued to drink and talk. After several more beers, Love asked Esther to tell him the truth about why he was not hired by Respondent. According to Love, Esther said, "just between me and you," Respondent was "blackballing" Love because he was a "strong union man." Love said he was not a strong union man and did not even attend union meetings.

Esther testified that after Love pressed him for an explanation for not being hired, he told Love that he did not know and that Love should "talk to his other friends." Love's version of this conversation is credited over Esther's denial. Esther is Respondent's office manager but has no authority with respect to production and maintenance employees. Further, he had no role whatsoever in the hiring of production and maintenance employees. Love admitted that Esther was giving his own opinion and not speaking on behalf of Respondent during this Christmas Eve conversation.

D. The Statement to Guyer

Gary Guyer, a former Knudsen employee who was hired by Respondent, was interviewed by Colbert and Ferguson in late December. Ferguson told Guyer that the employee should be prepared to work a lot of overtime and learn different jobs. Ferguson said there would be no job bidding and employees would have to work in different jobs and different departments. Colbert said that the plant was under new ownership and that only "the cream of the crop" had been hired. He said the plant was starting from scratch and that "there would be no Tom Johnsons or Jay Peeples." Respondent would not hire employees "who couldn't pull their weight," or who were "troublemakers" or "bad eggs." Colbert did not explain what he meant by troublemakers or bad eggs. There was some discussion about benefits, Guyer's skills, and assignments. At some point in the conversation, Colbert said he did not know if the plant would be union or not, but that it did not make any difference to him.

Ferguson testified that no reference was made to Johnson or Peeples in the interview with Guyer. He further denied that there was any mention of bad eggs or troublemakers. Colbert also testified that there was no reference to Johnson, Peeples, bad eggs, or troublemakers in the interview with Guyer. Colbert admitted that he told Guyer that Respondent did not know whether the Company would be union or not, and that it made no difference to Colbert whether the company was union or not.[3] I have decided to credit Guyer's version of this conversation over the denials of Ferguson and Colbert. Guyer, a current employee of Respondent, was unlikely to testify against his current supervisors unless his testimony was truthful.

E. The Activities and Work Records of the Six Applicants

Tom Johnson was the warehouse leadman at the time Knudsen closed the Hughson facility. Johnson was Knudsen's most senior employee and the union shop steward. It is undisputed that Johnson was an active steward and brought grievances on behalf of the Union and employees. In processing the grievances, Johnson dealt with both Ferguson and Colbert. However, there is no evidence that Colbert or Ferguson ever harbored any animus against Johnson for his union activities.

According to Ferguson, Johnson would stretch out his work to make it last a full day, and that he did not get along with Peeples, who worked in the warehouse under Johnson. Johnson admitted that he and Peeples did not get along. Although Respondent apparently was pleased with the end result of Johnson's work in the warehouse, it took issue with the amount of time, i.e., total man hours, it took for the work to be done. The employee Respondent now utilizes to perform the warehouse function performs the warehouse job in 20 hours per week elsewhere in the plant. With Johnson and Peeples working full time in the warehouse, Johnson still required additional assistance from other employees to perform the warehouse function.

Jay Peeples had been a warehouse helper since 1977 and was second in seniority to Johnson. The only union or protected activity that the General Counsel could point to was that Peeples took a bereavement leave in 1986.

Ferguson at first objected to Peeples' proposed leave but Peeples took the leave anyway. Peeples was paid for the full 2 days of leave without any protest by Ferguson or Colbert.

Ferguson testified that Peeples had a poor work record. The deficiencies listed were loss and damage of a product, the falsificaton of production figures, the failure to perform certain weighing procedures, and his lack of qualifications to operate certain machinery. The General Counsel apparently took isssue with Ferguson's conclusion that Peeples could not operate certain machinery. The General Counsel points out that early in his employment with Knudsen, Peeples operated such equipment. However, Peeples had not operated the equipment since 1977 and the equipment had been updated.

Charles Barker had been a mix helper since 1954. Barker had filed numerous grievance involving overtime, vacation pay, boots,[4] sick pay, and wage rates. He had a grievance pending at the time of Knudsen's closing. There was no evidence of any animus against Barker because of these grievance activities.

[3] The decertification petition had been filed and Colbert did not know whether the Union would be decertified or not.

Ferguson testified that Barker had made incorrect mixes, had falsified production reports, and was generally a marginal and unsatisfactory employee. Barker did not testify.

Otis Hale had been employed at the Hughson plant since 1967. His position at the time of the Knudsen plant closure was that of powder bagger. Hale had filed a number of grievances including grievances concerning boots, job duties, lunchbreaks, premium pay, and changes in work schedules. In May 1985, Hale filed a grievance concerning a job bid and a job awarded to another employee. Johnson discussed the grievance with Colbert and they disagreed over Hale's eligibility, to bid on the job in question. Colbert said in this discussion that it would be "a cold day in hell" before Hale was eligible, and that Hale would get the job over Colbert's "dead body." Johnson continued to pursue the grievance, and Hale was eventually awarded the job. In my view, this evidence establishes only that Colbert opposed the grievance on the merits. It does not establish that Colbert harbored any animus against Hale for utilizing the grievance procedure or any animus against the Union.

Ferguson testified that Hale had a record of excessive absenteeism, and a record of negligence in operating certain machinery. Ferguson concluded that Hale was a marginal and unsatisfactory employee. Hale did not testify.

Ken Love had been employed at the Hughson facility since 1975. At the time of the Knudsen closing, Love was working in the receiving department. Love had been involved in a number of grievances. On one occasion in 1984, Love refused to run a machine unless he was given boots. Love was sent to Colbert's office where he reiterated his position. The next day Love was given boots and he operated the machine in question.

Ferguson testified that not hiring Love was "a close call." Love was a marginal employee, although he was acquainted with most, if not all, jobs in the plant. According to Ferguson, Love was very poor about filling out charts and logs, and that Love essentially wanted to work days and bag powder with no responsibility. Ferguson made reference to Love's problems with absenteeism, although Love had no recent problem with absenteeism. In fact, Respondent hired some employees who had absenteeism records arguably worse that Love's.

Richard Smith had been employed at the Hughson facility since 1979. His positions included butter and powder packer, floorman churn operator, receiving, and loading and checking. Smith filed a number of grievances including a grievance concerning boots. In the fall of 1984, Smith was called to Colbert's office and told to perform the work and grieve the boot issue later. According to Smith, Colbert said that if Smith pursued the boot issue it would eventually cost Smith his job with the Company. Colbert testified that he the did not say that the grievance could cost Smith his job. Rather, he said that Smith should perform the work and grieve the matter later. Colbert explained that the failure to perform the work could cost Smith his job. Colbert's testimony on this point is credited.

In general, Respondent denies that union activities or union membership had any part in its hiring decisions. Respondent's witnesses, Hecker, Sartori, Colbert, and Ferguson, all testified that Respondent was looking for "multi-talented people that had good records, attendance, good attitudes, were good self-motivating employees, or were recommended from another plant like the Knudsen Modesto plant." It is undisputed that Respondent gave preference to Hughson employees and former Knudsen employees. These employees were known to be represented by the Union. In hiring operating engineers for the Hughson facility, Respondent hired only former Knudsen employees represented by the Operating Engineers. It hired qualified employees but did not hire on the basis of seniority. Respondent's employees at its Petaluma facility are represented by a union.

Respondent acknowledges that, among those employees actually hired, several had been involved with grievances, had received warning letters and been disciplined. The record establishes that the decison to hire an applicant was based on the personal observations and evaluations of Colbert and Ferguson. These two supervisors had personal experience with the employee-applicants based on years of experience with Knudsen and Foremost, and made the hiring decisions. Thus, in my view, it is the motivation of these two supervisors that is at issue here.

F. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel, relying on the testimony of Guyer that Colbert said Respondent would hire no Tom Johnsons or Jay Peeples, people who did not carry their weight, troublemakers, or bad eggs, argues that Johnson, Peeples, and the other discriminatees were union activists or union troublemakers. I find the remarks made by Colbert do not necessarily mean that Johnson and Peeples were union activists or union troublemakers. Peeples' activities were limited. The remarks could just as easily mean that peeples and Johnson were employees who were not "the cream of the crop," did not perform their share of the work, or were troublemakers in the normal sense of the word. "Absent a showing that the word is being used in a manner 'synonymous with lawful union activity' in the circumstances of a particular case, Employers may . . . hire . . . as they choose if they have sufficient lawful reason, which includes refusal to hire so-called trouble makers." Guarantee Savings & Loan, 274 NLRB 676, (1985); NLRB v. Aclang, Inc., 466 F.2d 558, 561 (5th Cir. 1972).

Neither Colbert nor Ferguson explained what he meant by troublemakers or bad eggs. The reference is ambiguous and could just as likely refer to the supervisors' views that Johnson and Peeples were employees who did not pull their weight, and did not get along with other employees. Under the circumstances, I find that Colbert's statement to Guyer would not reasonably tend to restrain, interfere with, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights. Sun Coast Foods, 273 NLRB 1642 (1985). I find no violation of the Act and, therefore, recommend dismissal of the 8(a)(1) allegation of the complaint. I further find this statement to be insufficient evidence to establish that Respondent sought to discriminate or discriminated against Johnson or Peeples because of union activities.

Further, I find that Esther's comments to Love do not establish a motive for Respondent's failure to hire Love or any other applicant. Esther had no authority or responsibility in hiring production and maintenance employees. His authority was limited to office employees and he had little or no contact with production and maintenance employees. Esther had been drinking and expressed a personal opinion to Love. However, it is clear that he was not speaking on behalf of the Employer. Rood Industries, 278 NLRB 160, 163 (1986). A conversation occurring at a bar after a few drinks should raise no reasonable expectation that Esther was acting on behalf of the Employer. Moreover, Esther had no responsibility for or authority over the hire of Love or the other production and maintenance employees. Under theses circumstances, Esther was not an agent of Respondent for hiring production employees, and his remarks were nothing more than speculation or his personal opinion, which cannot be imputed to Respondent. Zack Co., 278 NLRB 958 (1986); Abbey Island Park Manor, 267 NLRB 163 (1983).

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act expressly prohibits discrimination based on union considerations in the hire of employees. See Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 182–187 (1941). It is beyond question that the filing and processing of grievances by an employee, whether a union steward, is a protected by the Act. Mack Trucks, 242 NLRB 651, 656 (1979). Here, Colbert and Ferguson are the agents of Respondent who decided that applicants Johnson, Peeples, Barker, Hale, Love, and Smith would not be hired. Accordingly, it is on their motivation that the analysis must focus to determine whether the six alleged discriminatees were denied employment with Respondent because of activity protected by the Act. See, e.g., Guarantee Savings & Loan, 274 NLRB 676 (1985); Advanced Installation, 257 NLRB 845, 854 (1981), enfd. mem. 678 F.2d 1231 (9th Cir. 1982).

"Essentially, the elements of a discriminatory refusal-to-hire case are the employment application by each alleged discriminatee, the refusal to hire such, a showing that each was or might be expected to be a union supporter or sympathizer, and further showings that the employer knew or suspected such sympathy or support, maintained an animus gainst it, and refused to hire the applicant because of such animus." Big E's Foodland, 242 NLRB 963, 968 (1979); Hoboken Shipyards, 275 NLRB 1507 (1985).

Of the six alleged discriminatees, only Johnson had union activities that distinguished him from other job applicants. The other alleged discriminatees did not stand out from other bargaining unit employees hired by Respondent. During the period of over 7 years in which Colbert and Ferguson dealt with Johnson as shop steward, there is no evidence that either supervisor harbored any animus against Johnson because of his union or steward activities. The General Counsel produced some evidence that the supervisors disputed the merits of certain grievances, particularly the question of the Company's obligation to furnish boots. However, there is no evidence that the supervisors did not amicably resolve such disputes. There was no evidence of any subsequent animus or hard feelings. Under the circumstances, the evidence tends more to support a finding of a harmonious relationship between the supervisors and the Union than the union animus argued by the General Counsel.

Furthermore, prior to hiring any employees, Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union. In hiring employees, Respondent gave preference to its predecessors' employees represented by the Union.[5] Respondent continued to give preference to such employees even after the Union was decertified. Respondent voluntarily recognized the Union representing its operating engineers. In hiring engineers, Respondent hired only former employees of Knudsen's facility. Such conduct by Respondent strongly militates against a finding that Respondent harbored any animus toward the Union. See Sun Coast Foods, 273 NLRB 1642, 1644 (1985).

Based on the lack of animus against union members and supporters by Respondent, in general, and Colbert and Ferguson, in particular, I find that the General Counsel has not established a prima facie case. By failing to establish such union animus, the General Counsel has been unable to show that Respondent failed to hire the applicants because of union animus. Thus, the record evidence is insufficient to establish that Respondent failed to hire the six applicants for any reason other than those offered at the hearing. Under such circumstances, the burden does not shift to Respondent to justify its refusal to hire the six applicants. See, e.g., NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 399–403 (1983); Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982).

Finally, the General Counsel seeks to buttress this weak case by arguing that Respondent's reasons for not hiring the employees are pretextual. I find no merit in this argument. The reasons for not hiring the employees are subjective and based on Colbert's and Ferguson's observations and evaluations. None of the reasons were shown to be false. Some of the employees actually hired were not outstanding. However, there is no evidence that such evaluations were tainted by union considerations. The subjective reasons for not hiring the applicants cannot be used to substitute for the failure to establish a prima facie case. None of the employees was so outstanding that the failure to hire would raise an inference of discrimination. Under the facts of this case, I refuse to substitute my judgment for that of Respondent's supevisors.[6] It is not my place to second guess Respondent's hiring decisons. This point is best illustrated by the fact that Johnson and Peeples (two full-time employees) were replaced by one part-time employee.

[5] The existing legal principles establish that Respondent was not obligated to hire the employees of Knudsen merely because it purchased the assets of that company. Hoboken Shipyards, supra; Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel Employees, 417 U.S. 249 (1974).

[6] See, e.g., Hoboken Shipyards, supra; NLRB v. Ogle Protection Service, 375 F.2d 497 (6th Cir. 1967), cert. denied 389 U.S. 843 (1967).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent California Cooperative Creamery is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Union Local No. 386, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On May 28, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Claude R. Wolfe issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[2] and the General Counsel filed a response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) by failing and refusing to recall certain employees from layoff. In so doing we find that the General Counsel established a prima facie case and the Respondent failed to demonstrate that its refusal to recall would have occurred absent its desire to rid itself of Local 786 and perfect its relationship with Local 101. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982) (approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983)). However, in so finding, we do not rely on comments made by Rufus Cook, the Respondent's chief executive officer and counsel, during his cross-examination of one of the Respondent's employee/drivers.

Also, although we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(2) of the Act, we do not rely on the judge's discussion and rationale concerning the dues authorization cards. It is well established that the Act is violated where an employer recognizes and contracts with one union as its employees' exclusive bargaining representative at a time when the employer and another union are bound by a current contract that recognizes that union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the same employees and thereafter fails and refuses to recognize the latter union and to honor its contract. Ana Colon, Inc., 266 NLRB 611 (1983). Here, the Respondent recognized and contracted with Allied Workers Union Local 101, although bound to a current contract with Local 786 concerning the Respondent's same group of employees. We find, therefore, that by these acts the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(2).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Interstate Material Corporation, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Sheryl A. Sternberg and Steven L. Sokolow, Esqs., for the General Counsel.

Rufus Cook and Barbara J. Revak, Esqs., for the Respondent.

Leonard Samuels Sr., president, and Alvester Samuels, secretary-treasurer, for Allied Workers Union Local 101.

DECISION

CLAUDE R. WOLFE, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was litigated before me at Chicago, Illinois, on 26, 27, 28, and 29 January 1987 pursuant to charges filed by Local 786, Building Material, Lumber, Box, Shaving, Roofing and Insulating, Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Warehousemen and Helpers and Related Industry Employees, Watchmen and Security Guards Union, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Local 786) and complaint and amended complaint issued on 26 June and 30 July 1986, respectively. It is alleged that Interstate Material Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent denies the commission of unfair labor practices. On the entire record,[1] and the comparative testimonial demeanor of the witnesses testifying before me, and after considering the arguments of the parties during trial and in their posttrial briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint as amended alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that at all times material to this proceeding, Respondent, a coporation with offices and places of business at 1432 West 32d Street and 9050 South Green Street, Chicago, Illinois, until in or around January 1986, and thereafter at 4000 South Cicero Street and 2604 West Fulton Street, Chicago, Illinois, has been engaged in the business of supplying construction materials, including ready-mix concrete, to contractors, and during the past calendar and/or fiscal year, a representative

[1] On April 27, 1987, my Order to Show Cause why the record should not be corrected in numerous respects issued. The General Counsel filed a motion to correct the transcript on 21 April 1987. No response to my Order has been received, nor has any objection to the General Counsel's motion been received. Accordingly, the official record is corrected in the particulars set forth in the Order and motion.

period, in the course and conduct of these business operations, purchased and received at its Chicago, Illinois facilities products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from other enterprises located within the State of Illinois, each of which other enterprises had received the products, goods, and materials directly from points outside the State of Illinois and sold goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 to enterprises located in Illinois, which enterprises were themselves engaged in commerce and satisfied the Board's standards for assertion of jurisdiction other than the indirect inflow and indirect outflow standards. On these facts, I conclude and find, as Respondent admits, that Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Local 786 and Allied Workers Union, Local 101 (Local 101) are now, and have been at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. SUPERVISORS AND AGENTS

Rufus Cook and Renee Bradford, Respondent's president and vice president, are conceded by Respondent to be its agents. Respondent further agrees that Andre Duncan was its director of operations and a statutory supervisor from 29 July 1985 until 20 February 1986, and that Walter Mays was a statutory supervisor until 24 May 1986. Respondent denies responsibility for any statements made by Duncan or Mays relevant to the matters before me. The statements and conduct of an employer's supervisors are attributable to the employer,[2] and there is no evidence Respondent advised its employees that it was disavowing any statements or conduct of Duncan or Mays. The statements and conduct of Duncan and Mays referred to in this decision are therefore attributable to Respondent.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Complaint Allegations

1. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off or discharging employees represented by Local 786 at its 32d Street and Green Street facilities; by ceasing operations at these facilities and transferring work performed by these employees to its Cicero Street and Fulton Street facilities; and by failing and refusing to recall or reinstate the employees, all because the employees engaged in statutorily protected activities and in order to discourage such activities.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by denying Local 786 requests to bargain and withdrawing recognition from Local 786 since on or about 12 February 1986; and, by Andre Duncan, bypassing Local 786 and, on or about 8 April 1986, bargaining directly with employees concerning recall, transfers, wages, and other terms and conditions of employment.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(2) and (1) by recognizing and entering into a contract with Local 101 as the bargaining representative of Respondent's employees at a time when Local 101 did not represent a majority of the employees.

B. Preliminary Findings

Respondent is a minority business enterprise engaged in supplying ready-mix concrete to various projects conducted by agencies of the State of Illinois or the city of Chicago. Commencing in 1983, Respondent operated its business from leased premises at 1432 West 32d Street and 9050 South Green Street, Chicago, Illinois. The State of Illinois and the city of Chicago questioned Respondent's minority status because Respondent was leasing its trucks and equipment, as well as the above premises, from Prairie Material Sales, Inc. (Prairie) and also obtained its rock, sand, and cement from Prairie. In the opinion of the governmental authorities concerned, this demonstrated Respondent's lack of independence. To meet these concerns, Respondent commenced a search for different premises on which to conduct its business and contracted in August 1985 to purchase 11 trucks from Prairie. These trucks were subsequently delivered to Respondent in late September or early October 1985. Respondent then secured new premises at 2604 West Fulton Street, effective 1 January 1986, and at 4000 South Cicero, effective 1 February 1986, by leasing both locations from Cook Development Company, another business headed by Rufus Cook with corporate offices at 1331 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago. Cook Development leased the Fulton Street realty and purchased the ready-mix and related equipment there located from Colonial Brick Co. on 20 December 1985, and has purchase agreements with third parties on both locations. The move to a new quarters was not inspired by antiunion considerations, but resulted from lawful economic considerations unrelated to questions of union representation, and did not violate the Act as the complaint alleges.

On 26 November 1985, Local 786 filed a petition[3] with the Board's Region 13 requesting a representation election in a unit of Respondent's ready-mix truckdrivers. A hearing thereon opened on 12 December 1985. The representatives of Respondent and Local 786 present stipulated, subject to the agreement of Rufus Cook, Respondent's chief executive officer who was not present, that a representation election in a unit of all full-time and regular part-time ready-mix truckdrivers employed by Respondent at 1432 West 32d Street and 950 South Green Street, Chicago, Illinois, would be held on 10 January 1986. The hearing was recessed to 18 December 1985 for the purpose of either obtaining the signature of Rufus Cook to a written election agreement or continuing with the hearing in the event no signature was forthcoming.

Cook met with Board agent Daniel Murphy and Local 786 Business Agent Salvatore Badami at the Board's Chicago Offices on 18 December 1985. There Cook and Badami signed a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election that was recommended by Murphy and approved by the Regional Director. The appropriate collective-bargaining unit set forth in the stipulation reads as follows:

> Included: All full-time and regular part-time redimix truckdrivers employed by the Employer at its facilities located at 1432 W. 32nd Street and 9050 S. Green, Chicago, Il.
> Excluded: All office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Cook credibly testified that he was assured by Board agent Murphy that the bargaining unit description in the stipulation meant what it said. Salvatore Badami testified that the bargaining unit for the election was whatever was in the stipulation. Cook signed the stipulation. On the advice of Murphy and Badami that there would be no need for an election if Respondent entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 786, Cook told Badami he would enter into such an agreement. Cook and Badami then proceeded, in different cars, to the offices of Local 786 where Badami introduced Cook to Walter Hoff, the president of Local 786. Cook gives the following account of what then transpired:

> We started talking. Mr. Hoff pulled out an agreement which was a pre-printed version of what is here as I-2 and handed it to me and said, "This is the agreement, I understand that you are ready to sign it."
> . . . .
> And I said, "That's right, but let me look at it." And then I looked at it. It took me a few minutes to go over it. I asked him what happens, because I noticed that first paragraph there that says that the Northern Illinois Ready-Mix and Materials Association's Agreement. I asked him what happens if we are not a member of the association and we don't join, and thus as the time we sign it we are an independent. As he said, "Refer to the back of the agreement."
> [this referred to] Pages 10 and 11 with the provisions that are there under "Agreement for Adoption for Non-Association Employers." I had a copy of the stipulation with me, and I then looked at the stipulation and asked him what is the bargaining unit under this agreement. . . .
> . . . .
> Mr. Hoff said, "The bargaining unit is the plants that—and a non-association employer has at the time the agreement is signed." I said, "Well, that's different from the bargaining unit if it's the association because it seems to be the entire association if you are a member of the association." He said, "Yes, that's right."
> I then told him that we were interested in the training program for bringing minorities into the industry and so forth, and asked him about that and he said they were presently willing to do what was required to sign an agreement to enable us to get that.
> Q. Was there any other communications between the two of you?
> A. Not that I can recall, no.
> Q. At that point, you then signed the agreement?
> A. Yes.
> Q. After signing the agreement, did you leave the offices of Local 786?
> A. I did. I returned to my own office.

Hoff denies any knowledge of the stipulation when he met with Cook on 18 December 1985. He does not directly dispute Cook's version of their conversation, but states there was no discussion of what the bargaining unit at Interstate would be. Both men are credible. Hoff's narrow testimony that there was no discussion of what the bargaining unit at Interstate would be does not contradict Cook's broad testimony that Hoff told him the bargaining unit for a nonassociation employer was the plants the employer had at the time the agreement was signed. Here we have a question of perspective, and I am persuaded both men were testifyng to that which they honestly recalled. What probably happened is that Cook concluded, quite naturally I believe, that Hoff's comments on the bargaining unit were designed to convey this was Respondent's bargaining unit, but Hoff, also quite naturally, denies a specific reference to an "Interstate" bargaining unit but not a general reference to bargaining units. There is no evidence Cook advised Hoff of Respondent's intention to move its operations to other locations, and I conclude he did not.

The contract signed by Cook and Hoff on December was an agreement for adoption for nonassociation employers of Local 786's 1 May 1983 through 30 April 1986 agreement with Northern Illinois Ready Mix and Materials Association with special grievance procedure and delinquent payments provisions for nonassociation employers. Although I am persuaded the parties understood their agreement covered Respondent's ready-mix drivers, which were the only employees it then had, the agreement lists ready-mix truck chauffeur; quarry or pit chauffeur; other truck chauffeur; laborer or other employee operating fork lift or front end loader; chauffeur or laborer employed in yards, warehouse, or team track handling block, brick, and building materials; transit mix or hopper operator; and transit mix or hopper employer operating gasoline cranes loading or unloading materials as the classifications covered thereunder. That Respondent did not then employ some of these classifications does not alter the fact that the signed agreement is applicable to any employee working in those classifications.[4]

[4] I refused to permit Respondent to question Hoff regarding the meaning of certain articles in the collective-bargaining agreement. On reflection, I conclude I made a good ruling but gave a bad reason. The articles speak for themselves and Hoff's conjectures regarding their meaning would have no probative weight. I therefore conclude my ruling was correct.

When the contract was signed, Respondent was engaged in supplying ready-mix concrete to A. N. Ebony Co., which has the same corporate address and registered agent as Respondent and was then a subcontractor on a paving project at Chicago's O'Hare Airport. Respondent employed from 11 to 15 drivers, owned the same number of trucks, and utilized these trucks and drivers to pick up ready-mix from a supplier in Des Plaines, Illinois, and deliver it to A. N. Ebony at O'Hare. This work was suspended in late December 1985 when Andre Duncan,[5] Respondent's director of operations and the direct supervisor of the drivers, called them all together and told them the work was being stopped because it was too cold to pour concrete. He further told them they would be called back and the work would resume in the spring when the weather warmed up.

As previously noted, Respondent moved its operations to 2604 West Fulton and 4000 South Cicero effective 1 January and 1 February 1986, respectively. These newly obtained facilities required reconstruction for Respondent's purposes. To that end, Duncan offered Willie Hatter, Itiel Ammi (whose name was Donald Bolding at the time), Dennis Alford, and other drivers employment at lesser wages doing labor work readying the Cicero facility for use. Ammi and Alford accepted the offer. Ammi worked until 24 January 1986 at $4.50 per hour. Alford worked until 7 March 1986, apparently at the same wage. Throughout the winter, until Duncan left the position of director of operations in February and after he became the materials engineer, Duncan had several conversations with Ammi, Hatter, David Morgan, and David Canada where they inquired when the job would start up again and they would be recalled. He responded to these inquires with the assurance that they would be called back as soon as Renee Bradford, Respondent's vice president, authorized it. That Respondent considered the laid-off drivers to be its laid-off employees and contemplated recalling them as late as 11 March 1986 is shown by the minutes of a staff meeting held by Repsondent on that date and Duncan's credible explanatory testimony relating to that meeting. The minutes reflect that in discussing the status of Respondent's drivers, the participants noted, "We have a roster of ten experienced drivers that have not been called in yet." Duncan, who was present at the meeting, explains that the "ten experienced drivers" referred to the drivers Respondent planned on returning to work from layoff, including Ammi, Hatter, David Morgan, David Canada, and Steve Canada. Moreover, Walter Mays told David Canada on several occasions in March 1986 that Canada would be recalled back to work as soon as the reconstruction of the Cicero plant was completed. Mays obviously considered Canada to be a laid-off employee to be recalled. None of the drivers working for Respondent in 1985 were recalled to work as drivers in 1986. The statements to employees by supervisors and management's discussion of their status on 11 March 1986 is sufficient to show the drivers were not permanently laid off in December 1985, and did have a reasonable expectation of recall when work resumed in 1986. Respondent proffers no persuasive reason for its failure to recall its "ten experienced drivers" referred to in the March 1986 meeting. The statements of Cook[6] during his cross-examination of David Canada, 1 of the experienced 10 illustrate that Respondent most likely had no legitimate reason not to recall the men. That Cook, Respondent's chief executive officer as well as its attorney, was totally unaware of the reason Canada was not recalled and therefore sought at hearing to develop Canada's prior employment history for the purpose of ascertaining the reason Respondent did not recall Canada strikes me as highly improbable, and indicates, in my opinion, an effort to construct a colorable reason where none exists. The failure to proffer a valid reason for not calling the laid-off drivers, combined with what appears to be an effort to construct a pretextual reason, warrants an inference that Respondent had no legitimate reason, and I draw that inference.

Shortly after Respondent's acquisition of the new facilities, Local 786, by letter of 11 February 1986, advised Respondent the existing agreement was terminated effective 1 May 1986, and requested negotiation of a new [5] Duncan was a believable witness whom I credit.

[6] The statements were:

By Mr. [Cook]

Q. Mr. Canada, you say that you worked for the Material Service before you went to work for Interstate?

A. Yes.

Q. How long were you at Material Service?

. . . .

THE WITNESS: Approximatley six to seven years.

By Mr. [Cook]

Q. And you left when, sir?

A. 1983.

Q. For what reason did you leave?

A. I got fired.

. . . .

By Mr. [Cook]

Q. What were you fired for?

SHERYL STERNBERG: Objection.

JUDGE WOLFE: Sustained.

. . . .

RUFUS COOK: It is certainly possibly, Judge, that the reason that the man was not rehired was not a union affiliation, but had something to do with his prior record. I have no way of determining that without being able to question him.

JUDGE WOLFE: Now, are you telling me that from finding out from him, whether or not he was ever fired, I can conclude from that that the company did not call him back for that reason?

RUFUS COOK: I am not saying that—

JUDGE WOLFE: I have to have some affirmative evidence in the company that that is the reason. I don't understand here. All I am saying, I don't know from this, why he wasn't called back [at] this juncture. I don't know what reason the company will put forth but it seems to me that the reason that he was fired someplace else doesn't make any difference unless the company is prepared to show that he was, in fact, not called back because of that previous discharge. He could say, "Yes, I was fired." But the mere fact that he says he was doesn't mean that is the reason that he wasn't called back. I don't want to imply any recall rights. I mean that he wasn't hired. Let me put it this way.

RUFUS COOK: My point is this, I don't know this gentleman, I have never met him and I know nothing about his situation. However, if in fact, upon investigation, it is determined that the reason for which he was fired originally from Material Service, was also something that effected him at Interstate and we would have a problem of proof establishing why he was fired from Materials Service in the first place. In other words, we would have to call him back as our witness to simply establish why he was fired from Materials Service. [Emphasis added.]

agreement to be effective 1 May 1986. The letter also asked Respondent to advise when negotiation meetings could be had. Cook testified that Respondent did not reply to the letter because when he read it he noted it was signed by Richard Lein, the secretary-treasurer of Local 786, who was not familiar with the facts of the stipulation or the agreement between the parties. Cook continues that he assumed Lein would learn from Hoff what the provisions of the agreement were and that the letter was inappropriate.

Respondent recognized and entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 101 on 2 April 1986 that covers "all individuals other than supervisory, clerical and management employees" of Respondent, and contains union-security and checkoff provisions. According to Cook, in late March he received a phone call from Local 101 officials requesting a meeting to discuss organizing and representation. He agreed to meet with them. They then met on 2 April 1986. Cook requested evidence of their majority status. The union representatives said they had such evidence, but not with them, and asked for a recess to produce the evidence. Cook agreed. Later that day they met and, says Cook, presented him with authorizations signed that very day by a majority of Respondent's employees and designating Local 101 as their representative, whereupon Cook, on behalf of Respondent, entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 101. Leonard Samuels, the president of Local 101, was one of those meeting with Respondent on 2 April 1986. He testified the cards were secured by his business agent, and he did not personally solicit them. Neither the business agent nor the employees alleged to have signed the authorizations testified. No other proof that the cards were signed by those whose names appear on them was adduced. The authorizations have therefore not been properly authenticated and are not probative evidence of representative status. Stop-N-Go Foods, 279 NLRB 777 (1986).

During the hearing on 27 January 1987, Respondent, by its counsel Rufus Cook, offered the stipulation that the employees Respondent considered in the bargaining unit on 2 April 1986 were Mark Agic, John Weaver Jr., Robert Weaver, David Hole, John Ciciora, and Kenneth Rayon and explained that Stephen McIntire and Edward Cantrell were temporary employees brought to Chicago by John Weaver Sr., supervising consultant for Interstate, and returned to their place of origin as soon as the work they were hired for was done. The General Counsel agreed with the stipulation and it was received. Respondent had previously tendered photocopies of six signed cards authorizing Local 101 to represent the signer. The cards dated 2 April 1986 bore the names of Cantrell, Rayon, McIntire, John P. Weaver II, and William Thomas. The sixth card was dated 7 April 1986 and purportedly signed by Donald Brandy. Record summaries prepared by Respondent show that Brandy was not employed until 14 May 1986 and Thomas was first employed on 5 May 1986. Thus neither was an employee on the dates they purportedly signed cards. Respondent does not contend they were in the bargaining unit on 2 April 1986, and they obviously were not. Excluding the cards of Brandy and Thomas, as well as those of McIntire and Cantrell, who were represented by Respondent to be temporary employees, the cards of Rayon and John P. Weaver II are all that remain as valid designations by unit employees. Two is clearly not a majority in a unit of six.

On 28 January, Cook represented that his stipulation of the prior day was incorrect because McIntire, Cantrell, and Henry Little were also in the bargaining unit, thus expanding the unit to nine employees. In addition, Cook proffered a card purportedly signed by John Ciciora on 2 April 1986, and represented that it had just been furnished to Respondent by Local 101. Leonard Samuels, Local 101's president, testified that he had, on the first day of the hearing, 26 January, delivered copies of authorization cards bearing the signatures of Cantrell, Rayon, McIntire, and John P. Weaver II to the General Counsel in response to a subpoena duces tecum requiring delivery of originals or copies of authorization cards or other evidence of majority support obtained by Local 101 from Respondent's employees. Samuels further testified that when he arrived at the hearing he noted there was a card missing, but went ahead and gave the four to the General Counsel because that was all he had, but then, after the second day of trial, procured a copy of a card signed by Ciciora. The General Counsel objected to Respondent's withdrawal from its earlier stipulation regarding unit composition and to any consideration of the card of Ciciora.

Regarding unit composition, Cook's original position that Cantrell and McIntire were temporary was accompanied by a convincing recitation of the reasons for their hire and the duration thereof. The United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit long ago held:

> [T]he rule, in our judgment, is this: In a real and legitimate controversy, a party should be left within the knot of his averments in pleadings and admissions in testimony, unless the Court can find an absolute demonstration from other evidence in the case, or from facts within judicial notice, like the laws of physics, etc., that under no circumstances could the averments and admissions be true.[7]

The Board has also dealt with this problem, noting in Kroger Co., 211 NLRB 363, 364 (1974), "[I]t is generally accepted that a stipulation is conclusive on the party making it and prohibits any further dispute of the stipulated fact by that party or use of any evidence to disprove or contradict it." Cook's poststipulation effort to include Cantrell and McIntire in the unit for no reason other than asserted mistake, in the absence of any evidence that would convincingly demonstrate the stipulation is not or could not be true, is not persuasive. Accordingly, I find and conclude the unit was as stipulated by Cook on 27 January. It necessarily follows that even if the cards of Rayon, John Weaver II, and Ciciora be counted, these are not a majority in a unit of six employees. Parenthetically, I note that Respondent's possession of authorization assignments purportedly signed by Brandy and Thomas before they were employed does not inspire confidence in the validity of any of the authorizations. Moreover, I have concluded and find that the drivers laid off in December 1985 had been promised recall, were considered by Respondent to be its employees on layoff as late as its managerial meeting in March 1986, had a reasonable expectancy of employment when the work recommenced in the spring of 1986, and were and are employees of Respondent awaiting recall on and after 2 April 1986. None of these laid-off employees authorized Local 101 to represent them so far as the record shows. Respondent's assertion in its 3 June 1986 letter to the Board, and in an attachment to its answer to the complaint, to the effect that Local 101 was a union whose orientation was predominantly black and was therefore the choice of the Cicero plant employees who were predominantly black, is not supported by Respondent's records and Respondent's testimony showing that although all of its drivers, with the possible exception of David Morgan, in December 1986 were black, of those employees contended by Respondent to constitute the bargaining unit on 2 April 1986, seven were white (Agic, John Weaver Jr., Robert Weaver, Hole, Ciciora, McIntire, and Cantrell), and only two were black (Rayon and Little). Respondent's misrepresentation of the racial makeup of the 2 April 1986 employee complement in order to support its recognition of Local 101 further erodes confidence in Respondent's bona fides. For all the reasons set forth above, I conclude Local 101 did not enjoy majority status on 2 April 1986.

The first time that concrete was mixed and deposited into trucks at the Cicero plant for delivery was 4 April 1986. None of Respondent's employees who thereafter performed work covered by either labor agreement had been employees in 1985. Respondent's reasons for preferring the new employees and the new union over the old may be found in the statements of John P. Weaver Sr., a supervising consultant to Respondent who was clearly a supervisor and agent of Respondent when he made the statements. As related by Andre Duncan, during a staff meeting in early spring 1986 it was mentioned that another union was on the scene, and John P. Weaver commented that the people in this union could drive, do labor work, or do whatever else required and were not paid Teamsters wages. Weaver agrees that he spoke to Interstate personnel, including Duncan, about "the Allied Union" in mid-April after the Local 101 contract was signed, and expressed the view that connection with that union gave Respondent the flexibility of using employees for more than one task and benefited Respondent in other ways so as to give it a competitive edge. Both witnesses are credited, including those items mentioned by one but not the other.

By telegram of 5 May 1986, Local 786, by President Hoff, sent Respondent a telegram reading as follows:

> Local Union 786 hereby demands that you immediately recall all employees covered by our collective bargaining agreement and schedule negotiations regarding the successor agreement.

By certified letters of 6 and 7 May 1986, Local 786, by Salvatore Badami, requested Respondent to schedule a labor management committee hearing on the grievances of Ammi and Hatter that asked for their recall to work and to make them whole for losses. On 12 May 1986, Respondent, by Vice President Renee Bradford, delivered the following letter to Walter Hoff:

> It is the position of Interstate Material Corporation that, pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement between Interstate Material Corporation and Local #786 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Interstate is under no obligation to bargain with Local #786 regarding facility locations other than those bargaining units covered by the agreement.
> In December of 1985, as an offshoot of a proposed consent election, both parties to this agreement stipulated that the bargaining units covered were Interstate's 1400 West 32nd Street and 9050 South Green Street locations.
> Unfortunately, as the result of long and complex litigation, Interstate has terminated all leases for the Green Street and 32nd Street locations. Due to the limitation on location which comprise the bargaining unit covered by the agreement with Local #786, the contract provisions from this agreement did not survive Interstate's relocation. Therefore, the seniority and lay-off provisions, as well as the agreement itself have no applicability to the new locations.
> In reliance on the stipulation and agreement between the parties, Interstate has, at the request of its employees, entered into a labor agreement with another union regarding the facilities at 4000 South Cicero and 2604 West Fulton, under that union's authority as exclusive bargaining representative for the employees within this separate and distinct bargaining unit. As you are aware, Interstate is a black-owned and operated minority enterprise, and its employees have chosen to be represented by a union whose membership, leadership and orientation are predominantly black. Being mindful of the requirements of the City of Chicago that the work-force of minority companies be at least 51% black, the decision made by our employees to affiliate with a black union has positive implications in terms of aiding Interstate's efforts to comply with the City requirements. In any case, the choice of a union was solely up to our employees, and they made their choice.
> We appreciate the fine working relationship we have had with Local #786. Since we and a number of other minority businessmen are interested in expanding possible sources of financing for minority businesses, we would appreciate the opportunity to talk with the leadership of your union regarding possible pension fund loans. The lack of such loans, and the failure of predominantly white unions to address minority problems of this type, is one of the > reasons why black unions with black orientation are considered desirable by employees such as ours. Again, we would welcome the opportunity to discuss this aspect of the matter with you.

Respondent then, on 20 May 1986, dispatched the following letter to Salvatore Badami regarding the grievances:

> Pursuant to your written notice to Interstate, dated February 11, 1986, Local 786 terminated its collective bargaining agreement with Interstate, effective May 1, 1986.
> As I explained in my May 12, 1986 letter to your president, Mr. Hoff, the plant locations covered by this agreement are no longer operated by Interstate. The bargaining unit covered by this agreement was, as stipulated, location-specific. Therefore the agreement, which was terminated at your request, is not subject to re-negotiation, and its provisions, including grievance procedures, are no longer in effect.
> Although these two men may have been covered by the expired contract, at no time did either of them approach their former supervisors or any other agent of Interstate prior to the April 30, 1986 contract termination date. The first occasion Interstate had to become aware of the grievances was upon receipt of the written grievance reports, almost two weeks after expiration of the contract. As such, their grievances of May 6 and 7 are improper both in substance and procedure since there was no contract in effect at the time these were first brought to Interstate's attention.
> In sum, Mr. Badami, for the above-cited reasons it is our position that the Labor Management Committee has no authority or jurisdiction to issue any decision binding on Interstate in this matter.
> Further, as you are well aware, the same issue regarding the appropriate bargaining unit has been raised by yourself with the NLRB. It would seem reasonable on both of our parts to suspend action regarding a Committee hearing pending the determinaton by the NLRB.

Hoff wrote to Respondent on 1 August 1986 as follows:

> Enclosed you will find the current "Ready Mix Material" contract, in duplicate. On Page 11—Agreement of Adoption for Non-Association Employer, please fill in the exact name of your company and the addrees, date and sign both contracts, indicating the title of the person signing. Please return the two signed contracts to us for my signature and I will sign them and return one for your files.

The record contains no evidence of any further communications between Local 786 and Respondent.

C. Concluding Findings

The collective-bargaining agreement signed by Cook and Hoff on 18 December 1985 did not expire on its terms until 30 April 1986. During that period Local 786 enjoyed an irrebuttable presumption of majority status in the unit of employees covered by that agreement,[8] and a rebuttable presumption thereafter.[9] The presumption continues unrebutted by the evidence before me. Cook, an attorney, examined the agreement before he signed it. As he notes, "It took me a few minutes to go over it." How minutely he examined the document is a matter of speculation, but he raised no question regarding the job classifications covered. This is perhaps understandable because it appears that the only employees Respondent had at the time were drivers inasmuch as it purchased its cement from other employees who delivered it directly to the ready-mix trucks owned by Respondent and from here it was dispensed to A. N. Ebony employees. There is, however, no indication that Hoff made any effort to mislead Cook regarding the type of employees to be covered by the agreement, or that Cook had any objection to the job classification so covered. Respondent's contention is quite different. Simply put, Respondent asserts the unit set forth in the Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election was confined to the 32d Street and South Green Street locations, and therefore limited the application of the signed collective-bargaining agreement to those locations.

Respondent's contention is based on an erroneous conclusion that the stipulation and the collective-bargaining agreement with Local 786 are an integrated agreement. Contrary to Repsondent's posttrial brief, neither the execution of nor Regional Director's approval of the stipulation means that "Local 786 is certified by NLRB as the collective bargaining agent for 'all full time and regular part-time red[i]-mix truck drivers employed by employer at its facilities located at 1432 West 32nd Street and 9050 South Green, Chicago, Illinois." The stipulation on its face is simply a stipulated agreement by the parties thereto to proceed to a secret-ballot election among Respondent's employees in an agreed-on unit at an agreed-on time and place for the purpose of determining whether a majority of those employees wanted to be represented by Local 786 for purposes of collective bargaining. The Board issues no certification of representation unless the union party to such a stipulation receives a majority of the valid votes cast by the unit employees in the election provided for in the stipulation. In short, without a union election victory there is no union certification by the Board. The Board agent truthfully advised Cook of an option available to him, and Cook, on behalf of Respondent, elected to recognize Local 786 rather than to utilize the Board's election processes. When he did so, no question concerning representation remained to be resolved by the election, which was the purpose of the stipulation. The stipulation was therefore rendered a nullity with no legal force or effect. The correct advice given to Cook by Board Agent Murphy, with which Badami agreed, that the bargaining unit in the stipulation meant what it said cannot be construed as either an agreement by the parties or Board assurance that the unit stipulated for purposes of a Board-conducted election would control the composition of an employee unit in a collective-bargaining agreement voluntarily entered into in lieu of utilizing the Board's election processes. Moreover, neither the comments about the stipulation unit by Murphy and Badami, nor the discussion between Hoff and Cook regarding the coverage of the collective-bargaining agreement are sufficient to vary or contradict the content of the written and signed contract between Respondent and Local 786. There is no persuasive evidence that agreement is not complete and accurate on its face, and examination of the document reveals no ambiguities or other basis to warrant the use of oral testimony to explain its clear terms. The well-established rule that all prior oral understandings on the agreement are presumed to be merged in the final written agreement of the parties[10] is clearly applicable to the instant case. I therefore find that the collective-bargaining agreement Respondent executed with Local 786 on 18 December 1985 accurately and completely sets forth the agreements of the parties regarding all items, including the job classifications of employees covered, contained therein. I further specifically find there was no agreement to limit the coverage of the contract, which contains no limitation of the bargaining unit to specific locations, to Respondent's employees located at 1432 West 32d Street and 9050 South Green Street.[11]

The absence of geographical limitation does not completely answer the question of the contract's applicablity to new locations, specifically the Cicero facility where Respondent's ready-mix operation is now in progress.[12] The applicable rule in relocation cases has been succinctly expressed in Westwood Import Co.,[13] as follows:

> [A]n existing and effective collective-bargaining agreement remains in effect following a relocation, provided operations and equipment remain substantially the same at the new location, and a substantial percentage of the employees at the old plant transfer to the new location.

The only real change in operations as a result of the relocation to the Cicero facility is that Respondent's employees, rather than those of a supplier, now prepare and load the ready-mix into the trucks for delivery. There is no substantial change in either operations or equipment. The preparation and loading of cement at the abandoned facilities would not have changed the bargaining unit, and the performance of this work with the accompanying operation of the necessary equipment at the Cicero plant has no impact on the bargaining relationship.[14] Ready-mix trucks remain ready-mix trucks doing the same type work, and there simply is no showing of any substantial change in equipment. A substantial percentage of employees at the old facility obviously were not recalled to the Cicero facility. They did, however, remain employees of Respondent with a reasonable expectancy of recall, and have never, as far as the record shows, been told by Respondent they are no longer its employees. They continue to be employees on layoff and the refusal to recall them is alleged to be an unfair labor practice. Direct evidence of unlawful motivation is not to be found in this case. This is not surprising because such evidence is rarely available to the finder of fact who must therefore often rely on circumstantial evidence and legitimate inference from the record as a whole.[15] The record does, I believe, reveal sufficient evidence to warrant a finding the failure to recall was unlawfully motivated.

As late as 11 March 1986 Respondent treated the laid-off drivers as employees awaiting recall. This is consistent with the repeated assurances by Duncan and Mays that recall would coincide with the resumption of concrete delivery in the spring. Concrete delivery resumed on 4 April 1986. None of the laid-off drivers were recalled, instead Respondent initially utilized individuals as drivers who were hired to rehabilitate the facility, and then hired two new employees in April, 13 in May, 5 in June, 6 in July, 5 in August, 1 in September, and 2 in October 1986, but not one of its "ten experienced drivers" on layoff. Respondent does not begin to convincingly explain why this was so, nor what type of work those it did hire performed. Cook's comments during his examination of Canada show a conscious effort by Respondent to find a pretextual reason for failure to recall him, and, as I have found, provide reason to infer the true reason was unlawful. The failure to proffer reasons for the failure to recall others also warrants an inference Respondent had no valid reason to so do. Some of these new hires were surely drivers, given the fact Respondent had 11 to 15 trucks and by its own count 9 employees, including batchman Agic, at most, and the further fact that the sale and delivery of ready-mix concrete was what the business was all about. Accordingly, I conclude there was work available for the laid-off men. Why then were they not recalled? Consideration of all the evidence in the light of logical probability and common sense leads me to the following conclusions. Cook well knew when he contracted with Local 786 that the Respondent was about to transfer its operations to other locations. He did not tell Hoff this because he erroneously believed a mere change of location would relieve Respondent of its bargaining obligation. When Local 786, by Lein, its secretary treasurer, requested negotiations in a letter of 11 February 1986, Respondent simply ignored it. I do not credit Cook's testimony that he did not reply because he assumed Hoff would tell Lein that the letter was inappropriate. This explanation was not convincing when I heard it, and I think it more likely Cook had already decided, even though the drivers were still Respondent's employees, not to bargain further with Local 786. When Respondent elected to ignore the 11 February 1986 request to bargain, it refused to bargain in good faith as required by the Act and therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[16] What happened between 11 March 1986 and Respondent's recommencement of ready-mix delivery to cause "ten experienced drivers" on layoff not to be recalled or claimed as employees? The answer, I conclude is that Respondent, on being made aware of Local 101's organizing efforts in March 1986, as Cook testifies it did, and looking toward restarting its ready-mix operation in April, decided, for the reasons Weaver Sr. explained later in April, that Local 101 should be cultivated. To that end, Respondent invited Local 101 to meet and show their degree of employee support. When the Local 101 representatives showed up on 2 April, they had no evidence of support with them. After requesting and receiving a recess, they apparently returned with authorization cards purporting to bear employee signatures. Strangely, the cards on which Respondent seeks to rely as a basis for recognition are dated that very day, which suggests Local 101 had no proof of employee support prior to 2 April and gives rise to a suspicion that the completed cards came into being during the recess. Not one card has been shown to be signed by the person whose name it bears, and they are therefore invalid as unauthenticated. Moreover, the purported execution of authorization cards by Brandy and Thomas before they were employed is a further reason to suspect all the cards presented were invalid. The evidence dictates a conclusion that Respondent recognized and entered into a contract with Local 101, which included union-security and checkoff provisions, at a time Local 101 did not represent a majority of Respondent's employees in a unit appropriate for collective bargaining, and at a time when Respondent had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 786 covering those employees, and by so doing assisted Local 101 in violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act. Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731 (1961); Carbonex Coal Co., 262 NLRB 1306 (1982).

Turning to the issue of failure to recall, it must first be noted that the absence of specific evidence of intent to discourage union membership does not mean no violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act can be found. As expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Radio Officers v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17, 45 (1954):

> [A]n employer's protestation that did not intend to encourage or discourage must be unavailing where a natural consequence of his action was such encouragement or discouragement. Concluding that encouragement or discouragement will result, it is presumed that he intended such consequence.

The Court further stated (at 51):

> Encouragement and discouragement are "subtle things" requiring "a high degree of introspective perception." Cf. NLRB v. Donnelly Garment Co., 330 U.S. 219, 231.

Respondent, by assisting and thereby encouraging membership in Local 101, discouraged membership in Local 786. This conduct, together with what I perceive to be an attempt to perfect its relationship with Local 101 and assure the absence of employment for Local 786 by hiring new employees and refusing to recall the laid-off Local 786 employees was, I conclude, designed to discourage membership in Local 786, a predictable result, as well as encourage membership in Local 101. The refusal to recall therefore violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The laid-off drivers remain Respondent's employees who should have been recalled to the Cicero plant. The Westwood Import requirement that a substantial percentage of old plant employees transfer to the new plant would therefore have been met in the absence of Respondent's unfair labor practices. Accordingly, Local 786's collective-bargaining agreement was applicable to the Cicero facility, and Respondent refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it refused, by letters of 12 and 20 May 1986 as well as by its refusal to respond to Local 786's 11 February 1986 letter, to negotiate with Local 786.

As the General Counsel concedes, there is no evidence Andre Duncan bargained directly with employees on or about 8 April 1986 as the complaint alleges. The error on the date is not significant if, as the General Counsel contends, Duncan bargained directly with employees in December 1986 and February and March 1986.[17] Duncan's responses to employee inquiries regarding the possible day they would be recalled were innocent, and so far as the record shows, truthful estimations bereft of any bargaining element. He neither did nor said anything with regard to transfers or "other terms and conditions of employment" other than to advise them there was labor work available at less than the contract rate, but by so advising them, and by employing two at less than contract rates Duncan did, as Respondent's agent, engage in direct bargaining with the employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 786 and Local 101 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full time and regular part time employees employed by Respondent in the following work classifications: Ready Mix Truck Chauffeur; Quarry or Pit Chauffeur; Other Truck Chauffeur; Laborer or other employee operating Fork Lift or Front End Loader; Chauffeur or Laborer employed in yards, warehouse or team truck handling Block, Brick and Building materials; Transit Mix or Hopper Operator; and Transit Mix or Hopper Employee operating gasoline cranes loading or unloading materials.

4. Local 786 is the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 3, above, for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

5. By refusing to bargain with and withdrawing recognition from Local 786, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By bypassing Local 786 and bargaining directly with employees regarding wages, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. By recognizing, bargaining with, and executing a collective-bargaining agreement covering the unit of employees above described and containing a union-security clause with Local 101 notwithstanding the fact that Local 101 did not represent a majority of the employees and the employees were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local 786, Respondent assisted and supported Local 101 in violation of Section 8(a)(2) and (1) of the Act, thereby encouraging membership in Local 101 and discouraging membership in Local 786.

8. By failing and refusing to recall its laid-off drivers for the purpose of discouraging membership in Local 786, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

9. Respondent's layoff of drivers in December 1985 has not been shown by a preponderance of the credible evidence to be violative of the Act, nor has its transfer of unit work to different locations.

10. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

In addition to the usual cease-and-desist and notice-posting requirements, Respondent will be required to withdraw and withhold recognition of Local 101 as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees, and reimburse all former and present employees for dues, assessments, and other moneys, if any, paid by or withheld from them pursuant to the union-security and dues-checkoff provisions of the aforementioned collective-bargaining agreement, together with interest thereon. Vernitron Electrical Components, 221 NLRB 464 (1975), enfd. 548 F.2d 24 (1st Cir. 1977).

Respondent shall be further ordered to meet and bargain with Local 786 on request, reducing any agreements reached to a signed document, and to reinstate and make those ready-mix drivers laid off in December 1985 whole for any loss of earnings suffered as a result of Respondent's unlawful failure and refusal to recall them, the backpay interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[18]

[18] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

The visitatorial clause requested by the General Counsel appears unnecessary in the circumstances of this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[19]

ORDER

The Respondent, Interstate Material Corporation, Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in Local 786, or any other labor organization, by failing and refusing to recall employees from layoff.

(b) Assisting or contributing support to Local 101 by recognizing or bargaining with such labor organization as the exclusive representative of its employees for the purposes of collective bargaining unless and until Local 101 is certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees pursuant to Section 9(c) of the Act.

(c) Maintaining or giving any force or effect to the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and Local 101 effective 2 April 1986, or any extention or modification thereof; provided, however, that nothing in this Order shall authorize or require the withdrawal or elimination of any wage increase or other benefits, terms, and conditions of employment that may have been established pursuant to the performance of that contract.

(d) Withholding from the pay of any of its employees union dues or other union fees or assessments that have been deducted on account of any obligation of membership in Local 101, and paying to Local 101 any dues, fees, or assessments that have been deducted from the pay of its employees.

(e) Refusing to bargain in good faith with Local 786 as the representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described above for the purpose of dealing with Respondent concering grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or other conditions of work.

(f) Bypassing Local 786 and bargaining directly with employee members of the unit represented by Local 786 regarding wages or other working conditions.

(g) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw and withhold all recognition from Local 101 as the representative of its employees for the purpose of collective bargaining unless and until Local 101 is certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees pursuant to Section 9(c) of the Act.

[19] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Reimburse all former and present employees for all initiation fees, dues, assessments, and other moneys, if any, paid by or withheld from them on account of any obligation of membership in Local 101 in the manner provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) On request, bargain with Local 786 as the exclusive representative of all employees in the unit described below with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a written, signed agreement:

> All full time and regular part time employees employed by Respondent in the following work classifications: Ready Mix Truck Chauffeur; Quarry or Pit Chauffeur; Other Truck Chauffeur; Laborer or other employees operating Fork Lift or Front End Loader; Chauffeur or Laborer employed in yards, warehouse or team track handling Block, Brick and Building materials; Transit Mix or Hopper Operator; and Transit Mix or Hopper Employee operating gasoline cranes loading or unloading materials.

(d) Offer in writing immediate employment, without prejudice to any seniority or other rights and privileges, to each of the ready-mix drivers of Respondent who were laid off in December 1985 and whom it could have employed but declined to employ on or about 4 April 1986 and thereafter, if necessary replacing employees who had not been employed by Respondent on 18 December 1985 but who were hired by the Respondent after that date, such employment to be offered for the classifications, at the rates, and under the conditions previously enjoyed by the laid-off drivers, and make the truckdrivers whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful failure to recall them when ready-mix delivery resumed in April 1986. The backpay and interest thereon shall be computed in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of moneys due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at is corporate offices at 1331 South Michigan Street, Chicago, Illinois, and its facilities at 4000 South Cicero Street and 2604 West Fulton Street, Chicago, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Riley Electric, Inc. and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 68. Case 27–CA–7674

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 21, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Frederick C. Herzog issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief,[1] the Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a brief in support thereof and in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions, the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The facts are set out more fully in the judge's decision. The judge found that on March 26, 1980, the Respondent, an electrical contractor in the construction industry, executed a letter of assent-A with the Charging Party (the Union) to the "inside" agreement between the National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA) and the Union. On August 12, 1980, the Respondent executed a letter of assent-A with the Union to the "residential" agreement between NECA and the Union. The letters of assent authorize the Rocky Mountain Chapter of NECA to act as the Respondent's collective-bargaining representatives for all matters contained in or pertaining to the applicable collective-bargaining agreements between NECA and the Union.[2] By its execution of the letters of assent, the Respondent delegated bargaining authority to NECA and, as a consequence, bound the Respondent to the terms of the inside agreements effective April 1, 1980, to March 31, 1981, and April 1, 1981, to March 31, 1983, and to the terms of the residential agreements effective January 1, 1979, to December 31, 1980; January 1, 1981, to December 31, 1981; and January 1, 1982, to December 31, 1982. Nelson Electric, 241 NLRB 545 (1979); Reliable Electric Co., 286 NLRB 834 (1987).

From April 1, 1980, through May 19, 1981, the Respondent abided by all the terms and conditions of both the residential and inside agreements, including those relating to the payment of trust fund contributions and to the exclusive use of the Union's hiring hall. It is undisputed that on May 20, 1981, the Respondent ceased abiding by the terms of these agreements.

By letter of August 31, 1982, the Respondent notified the Union that it was terminating "all contracts and agreements" between the Respondent and the Union. By letter of September 1, 1982, the Respondent notified the Union of its intent to terminate the residential agreement effective December 31, 1982. By letters of September 1, 1982, the Respondent also notified the Union and NECA that it had terminated the residential letter of assent-A and the authorization of bargaining authority to NECA contained therein.

Applying the then applicable "conversion" doctrine, the judge found that the parties' 8(f) prehire contractual relationship had ripened into a "traditional" 9(a) majority relationship and that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by repudiating its bargaining agreements with the Union.

In John Deklewa & Sons, 282 NLRB 1375, 1377 (1987), the Board abandoned the conversion doctrine and decided to apply the following principles in 8(f) cases:

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

The Board also noted, at footnote 41 of Deklewa, that it will require the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship to prove it.

We find, in agreement with the judge, that the Respondent voluntarily entered into a contractual relationship with the Union by virtue of its execution of the letters of assent.[3] Under Deklewa, the

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The authorizations specify that they shall remain in effect until terminated by the Respondent giving written notice to NECA and the Union at least 150 days prior to the then current anniversary date of the applicable agreement.

[3] We find no merit to the Union's contention that the relationship between the Respondent and the Union was, from its inception, a 9(a) rela-

Respondent became bound for the term of the applicable residential and inside agreements under Section 8(a)(5) and (1). Accordingly, the Respondent's unilateral repudiation on May 20, 1981, when governing agreements remained "binding, enforceable, and not subject to unilateral repudiation" violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1). Deklewa, above. As the complaint and the record is directed to the repudiation of the residential agreements effective to December 31, 1981, and December 31, 1982, and to the repudiation of the inside agreement effective to March 31, 1983, we shall provide a make-whole remedy directed to the terms of these agreements.[4]

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order that it cease and desist and take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order the Respondent to comply with the terms of the "residential" agreements with the Union from May 20, 1981, to December 31, 1982, and to the "inside" agreement from May 20, 1981, to March 31, 1983. We also shall order the Respondent to make its employees whole,[5] as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the "residential" agreements from May 20, 1981, to December 31, 1982, and to the "inside" agreement from May 20, 1981, to March 31, 1983, with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[6]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Riley Electric, Inc., Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Repudiating the January 1, 1981–December 31, 1981, and January 1, 1982–December 31, 1982, "residential" collective-bargaining agreements between the Respondent and the Union and the April 1, 1981–March 31, 1983, "inside" collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole its unit employees, in the manner set forth in the remedy, for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to adhere to the "residential" agreements with the Union from May 20, 1981, to December 31, 1982, and to the "inside" agreement with the Union from May 20, 1981, to March 31, 1983. The appropriate unit is:

> Those employees of ours who perform work which is described in and covered by the January 1, 1981 and Janaury 1, 1982, Denver Residential Wiring Agreements and those employees who perform work which is described in and covered by the April 1, 1981, Denver Inside Electrical Construction Agreement, each such agreement being between the Rocky Mountain Chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association and the Local Union No. 68, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

(b) Pay to the appropriate funds, with interest, the health and welfare, pension, apprentice train-tionship. Rather, we find that the relationship between the Respondent and the Union was governed at all pertinent times by Sec. 8(f). The Union contends that the initial agreement executed by the Respondent was undertaken pursuant to Sec. 9(a) because the Respondent was a successor to an employer, Economy Electric (Economy), having an agreement with the Union. We note, however, that under Deklewa, the Union, as a party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship, has the burden of proving such a relationship. As the Union has failed to demonstrate that it attained 9(a) status with respect to either the employees of the Respondent or those of Economy by means of a Board election or voluntary recognition pursuant to a showing of majority support, it has not satisfied its burden under Deklewa. Moreover, the record establishes that Economy, the purported "predecessor," remained in operation after the Respondent, the purported "successor," commenced operations. Thus, it appears that the Respondent independently secured a construction project started initially by Economy, executed an 8(f) prehire agreement with the Union, and then hired employees formerly working at the project to complete the project pursuant to the hiring hall provisions of the newly executed agreement.

[4] Accordingly, we express no view regarding the applicability of any successor agreements pursuant to the terms of the letters of assent.

[5] In his decision the judge failed to order the Respondent to pay its employees wage benefits set forth under the terms of the repudiated agreements. We find merit in the cross-exceptions of the General Counsel and the Union that such a remedy is appropriate.

Whether there are any individuals entitled to be made whole because they were denied an opportunity to work because of the Respondent's failure to continue using a contractual hiring hall is best left to the compliance stage of this proceeding. See, e.g., Southwestern Steel, 276 NLRB 1569 fn. 1 (1985), and Wayne Electric, 226 NLRB 409 (1976). We recognize, in this regard, that enforcement of the hiring hall provisions contained in the applicable agreements may be at odds with the view of the court of appeals, expressed in Robertson v. NLRB, 597 F.2d 1331 (10th Cir. 1979). In this proceeding, however, the issue has been raised solely to remedy the Respondent's unfair labor practices and does not have a bearing on the merits of the unfair labor practices found.

[6] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Because the provisions of employees benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of the proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Therefore, any additional amount owed to the trust funds shall be determined in accordance with the procedure set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

ing, and other contributions required to be paid under the collective-bargaining agreements by which it has been found to have been bound.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of money due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Denver, Colorado, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 27, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix" for posting by the Union, if willing, in conspicuous places where notices to employees and members are customarily posted.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT repudiate the January 1, 1981–December 31, 1981, and January 1, 1982–December 31, 1982, "residential," and the April 1, 1981–March 31, 1983, "inside" collective-bargaining agreements between our company and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 68, during the term of those agreements.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, the unit employees who have incurred losses of wages and benefits because of our failure to abide by the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreements between our company and the Union, until the residential agreement's expiration on December 31, 1982, and the inside agreement's expiration on March 31, 1983. The appropriate unit is:

> Our employees who perform work which is described in and covered by the January 1, 1981 and January 1, 1982, Denver Residential Wiring Agreements and those employees who perform work which is described in and covered by the April 1, 1981, Denver Inside Electrical Construction Agreement, each such agreement being between the Rocky Mountain Chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association and Local Union No. 68 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

WE WILL pay to the appropriate funds the health and welfare, pension, apprentice training, and other contributions required to be paid by the collective-bargaining agreement or agreements to which we have been bound.

RILEY ELECTRIC, INC.

Ernest L. Duran Jr. and T. Michael Patton, Esqs., for the General Counsel.
Lawrence W. Marquess, Esq. (Bradley, Campbell & Carney), of Golden, Colorado, for the Respondent.
Philip Hornbein Jr., Esq., of Denver, Colorado, for the Charging Party Union.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

FREDRICK C. HERZOG, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case in trial on October 13, 1982, at Denver, Colorado. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 68 (the Union) filed an original charge on December 31, 1981, against Riley Electric, Inc. (the Respondent). Pursuant thereto, on April 16, 1982, the Regional Director for Region 27 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing against the Respondent.

The complaint alleges in substance that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by refusing to comply with and repudiating certain collective-bargaining agreements.

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posttrial briefs submitted on behalf of the parties, I make the following

Findings of Fact and Conclusions

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges and the answer[1] admits the following facts. The Respondent is now, and at all times material has been, a corporation duly organized and existing by virtue of the laws of the State of Delaware, and maintains its principal office and place of business in Denver, Colorado, where it is, and at all times material has been, engaged in electrical contracting in the construction industry. Further, the Rocky Mountain chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association (NECA), has been an organization composed of employers engaged in electrical contracting in the construction industry in the State of Colorado and which exists for the purpose, inter alia, of representing its employer-members and/or employers who have assigned bargaining rights to it in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with the Union. NECA's members annually purchase and receive goods and materials in the course and conduct of their combined business operations having a value in excess of $50,000 directly from points and places outside the State of Colorado. During the calendar year ending December 31, 1981, the Respondent in the course and conduct of its operations provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for other business enterprises, including the First National Bank of Longmont within the State of Colorado, over which the Board would assert jurisdiction on some basis other than indirect standards. Therefore, in accordance with the Respondent's admission at trial, I find and conclude that the Respondent and NECA are now, and at all times material have been, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Alfred and Bonnie Riley are man and wife. For several years preceding April 1, 1980, Alfred Riley was half-owner of a corporation known as Economy Electric Company, which was, and still is, engaged in work similar to that which has since been performed by the Respondent. Economy Electric Company was, and is, a party to the collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Union dealing with "inside" electrical work. Although he was half-owner of Economy Electric Company, Alfred Riley served as its vice president and was in charge of its field operations; evidently his co-owner, who bought him out, attended to administrative work and sales work.[2] Economy Electric Company was, and by all that appears may remain, a member of NECA, operating pursuant to NECA's collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

In April 1980 Alfred Riley became interested in setting up a separate business. He talked to the Union's business manager about becoming a union contractor, and was given a "laundry list" of things to do in order to carry out his plans. One of the items on the "laundry list" called for him to execute a "letter of assent" to the "inside" agreement between NECA and the Union.

For the first few months of its existence the Respondent was not incorporated. Instead it operated as a sole proprietorship, owned entirely by Alfred Riley's wife, Bonnie. Bonnie Riley, however, was nothing more than a figurehead in the business. She did whatever her husband told her to do, and she did nothing unless he told her to do it. Alfred Riley placed her in the position of ownership of the business as a means of "skirting around" certain union rules that might interfere with his desire to either obtain benefits from the Union or to continue work with the tools of the electrician's trade.

On March 26, 1980, Bonnie Riley, at Alfred Riley's direction, went to the Union's offices and signed a "letter of assent" to the "inside" agreement between NECA and the Union.[3]

Both of the Rileys professed to have little understanding of the meaning or significance of the act of signing the "letter of assent." Bonnie Riley claimed to have signed the "letter of assent" solely because her husband asked her to do so, though she did know that he would be enabled to hire union members. Alfred Riley claimed that despite his 20 years' experience as a member of the Union, and 3 years' experience as an officer and owner of a corporation that was a member of NECA and a party to a collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Union, his particular expertise lay only in performing electrical work rather than in understanding administrative or legal matters.

Around the same time that Bonnie Riley signed the "letter of assent," Alfred Riley began talking to employees of Economy Electric Company, who were then working on the Economy Electric's project know as Earth Science Institute, about "switching over" from Economy and going to work for his new business. (Alfred Riley had succeeded in taking over the Earth Science Institute project from Economy Electric Contingent on this ability to retain the same employees who had been working on it for Economy Electric.) He secured the employees' agreement and, as he had been advised to do by the Union's agent, instructed each of the [1] As amended at the hearing.

[2] The co-owner's wife was a full-time employee of NECA.

[3] The text of the "letter of assent" read, in relevant part, as follows:

> In signing this letter of assent, the undersigned firm does hereby authorize Rocky Mountain Chapter, NECA as it collective bargaining representative for all matters contained in or pertaining to the current approved Residential labor agreement between the Rocky Mountain Chapter, NECA and Local Union 68 IBEW. This authorization, in compliance with the current approved labor agreement, shall become effective on the 2 day of July 1980. It shall remain in effect until terminated by the undersigned employer giving written notice to the Rocky Mountain Chapter, NECA and to the Local Union at least one hundred fifty (150) days prior to the then current anniversary date of the aforementioned approved labor agreement.

employees "making the switch" to go down to the Union's office and notify the Union that they were no longer working for Economy Electric so that they could immediately be referred out to Riley Electric pursuant to the Union's hiring hall provisions with NECA.[4]

On or about August 12, 1980 Bonnie Riley once more went to the Union's offices and executed a "letter of assent." On this occasion the "letter of assent" related to the collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Union, which had to do with "residential" work. The "letter of assent" was made effective, retroactive to July 2, 1980, so that certain health and welfare benefit payments could be credited properly.[5]

The Respondent's corporation came into being in October 1980 when the sole proprietorship known as Riley Electric Company was issued articles of incorporation.

Respondent concedes that from April 1, 1980, through May 19, 1981, the Respondent hired only members of the Union and that it did so through the Union's hiring hall.[6] During this period of time the Respondent made trust fund contributions on behalf of all its employees as required by the relevant collective-bargaining agreement between NECA and the Union. Respondent paid its employees union scale and abided by all the terms and conditions of both the residential and inside agreement between NECA and the Union until May 19, 1981.[7]

On May 20, 1981, the Respondent, for the first time, hired a nonunion employee. Since then it has hired five additional electricians and at the time of the hearing, had employed six electricians. None were hired through the Union's hiring hall. Neither were they paid wages according to the NECA collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. No contributions to health and welfare trust funds were made on their behalf. Alfred Riley conceded that the work being performed by the nonunion electricians is the same work performed by the union electricians he previously employed, and is work governed by the collective-bargaining agreement. Those employees on the payroll, some seven in number, as of May 20, 1981, who had been previously referred to the Respondent by the Union were terminated on various dates between July 14, 1981, and January or February 1982.

The parties stipulated that the Respondent repudiated both the residential and the commercial, or inside, collective-bargaining agreements. Evidently this stipulation refers to a constructive repudiation, for it is clear that the Respondent did not terminate its delegation of bargaining authority to NECA for either agreement prior to the renewal dates previously mentioned. It was not until August 31, 1982, that Alfred Riley wrote a letter to the Union stating, "Let this letter serve as official notification for the termination of all contracts and agreements between Riley Electric Inc. and Electrical Workers I.B.E.W. Local Union #68." On September 1, 1982, he once again wrote the Union, as well as the Rocky Mountain Chapter of NECA, undertaking to serve notice of his intent to terminate the collective-bargaining agreement and offering to meet and confer with the Local Union for the purpose of negotiating a new contract. Alfred Riley conceded in his testimony that these letters were written as "safety valves," to guard against the loss of this case.

On February 10, 1981, the Union filed a grievance against the Respondent claiming that the Respondent had failed to pay the contractually agreed-on wage rate for overtime work. Alfred Riley appeared at the hearing on the grievance, when he neither sought nor was he offered advice from NECA in defense of the grievance. The grievance was decided in favor of the Union and the Respondent abided by the decision.

In October of 1980, the yellow pages of the telephone directory in Denver, Colorado, appeared. The Respondent's advertisement there included the NECA symbol. Shortly thereafter, according to Alfred Riley's testimony, he was called by an officer of NECA and advised that the NECA symbol would have to be removed from the advertisement. Riley agreed, saying that the symbol had been included erroneously. The symbol was removed at the next opportunity.

Respondent concedes that it was signatory to the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, but argues that neither the Respondent nor Bonnie or Alfred Riley had ever been members of NECA or applied for membership, or ever sought to or had any involvement in the negotiations between NECA and the Union, and that NECA is not party to either of the "letter of assent" signed by or on behalf of the Respondent.

Conclusions

Principles of industrial democracy embodied within the Act assure employees against the prospect of representation by a union except when the employees have freely chosen such representation for themselves. Section 9(a) of the Act provides that

[4] The parties stipulated at the trial that the following employees of those employers that are ultimately determined in this case to be part of a multiemployer collective-bargaining group represented by NECA constitute units appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

(a) Those employees who perform work which is described in and covered by the January 1, 1981 and January 1, 1982, Denver Residential Wiring Agreements between the Association and the Union.

(b) Those employees who perform work which is described in and covered by the April 1, 1981, Denver Inside Electrical Construction Agreement between the Association and the Union.

Each of the agreements referred to, plus others in evidence, stipulates that the agreements "shall apply to all firms who sign a 'letter of assent' to be bound by this agreement" between the Rocky Mountain Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, Inc. and Local Union 68, IBEW. Each agreement also made detailed provisions for matters such as union security, exclusive hiring hall or referral procedure, grievance, apprenticeship program, and many matters relating to wages and working conditions.

[5] Each of the "letter of assent" signed by Bonnie Riley on behalf of the business known as Riley Electric and/or her husband, Alfred, provided that they should remain in effect until terminated by Riley Electric giving written notice to NECA's Rocky Mountain Chapter and to the Union at least 150 days before the then current anniversary date of the relevant labor agreement.

[6] There was one exception insofar as membership was concerned, but even that employee was referred through the Union's hiring hall.

[7] The inside agreement in effect on March 26, 1981, was renewed on April 1, 1980, for a 1-year term, and renewed again on April 1, 1981, for a 2-year term. The residential agreement in effect on August 12, 1980, was renewed for 1-year terms on January 1, 1981, and again on January 1, 1982.

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

There are, of course, exceptions to the general rule. One of these is found in cases involving employers within the building and construction industry. The Act was amended in 1947, as Congress recognized the need to deal with problems that had a peculiar impact on the building and construction industry. Under traditional principles, construction industry employers and unions had been previously prevented from entering into collective-bargaining agreements before the establishment of the union's majority status.

Section 8(f) was included among the 1947 amendments to the Act, and was enacted in large part to immunize employers and unions in the building and construction industry from the strictures of Section 8(a) and (b) of the Act in situations where recognition is granted and a collective-bargaining agreement is entered into before the recognized labor organization's majority status has been established under the provisions of Section 9 of the Act. See NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 103, 434 U.S. 335 (1978); cf. Ladies Garment Workers v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731 (1961).

> It shall not be an unfair labor practice under subsections (a) and (b) of this section for an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry to make an agreement covering employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the building and construction industry with a labor organization of which building and construction employees are members (not established, maintained, or assisted by an action defined in section 8(a) of this Act as an unfair labor practice) because (1) the majority status of such labor organization has not been established under the provisions of section 9 of this Act prior to the making of such agreement.

There can be little doubt that when the Respondent executed the "letters of assent" with the Union it thereby entered into a contractual relationship with the Union. Apart from the difficulty I have in crediting the testimony of Alfred Riley to the effect that he was uninformed respecting the effects of such a contract, I find that the "letters of assent," themselves, have a clear and unambiguous meaning conveyed on their face. Neither the professed lack of understanding by Alfred Riley nor the alleged failure to explain the contract's import, as testified to by each of the Rileys, seems to be sufficient to warrant a finding that Respondent should be held to have entered into a contractual relationship without an adequate meeting of the minds. Indeed, even the Respondent, in its brief, concedes that the agreements between the Respondent and the Union were 8(f) agreements.[8] The essential question in this case is whether the 8(f) contract between the Respondent and the Union was ever transformed into a Section 9 relationship. For it is well established that during the term of an 8(f) contract an employer may withdraw recognition from the Union and/or unilaterally make changes in the contractual working conditions without violating Section 8(a)(5) unless the Union has obtained a majority status and a 9(a) bargaining relationship had developed. See R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), decision on remand 208 NLRB 615 (1974); Ruttmann Construction Co., 191 NLRB 701 (1971); Dee Cee Floor Covering, 232 NLRB 421 (1977); cf. Higdon Contracting, supra.

It seems clear that the complaint, which alleges a violation of Section 8(a)(5), can be found meritorious only if the 8(f) relationship was ever transformed into a Section 9 relationship. This issue will turn on whether the Union became the majority representative among the employees affected; since an 8(f) contract can exist without majority status there is no presumption of majority status that flows from the mere existence of an 8(f) contract. R. J. Smith Construction Co., supra; Dee Cee Floor Covering, supra. A union cannot rely on the mere passage of time to transform an 8(f) relationship into a majority 9(a) relationship. Instead, evidence is required showing that sometime during the parties' collective-bargaining relationship, the union obtained either actual majority status or at least a presumption of majority status in an appropriate unit.

The General Counsel contends that the necessary showing has been made in this case. He argues that by executing the "letters of assent" the Respondent not only entered into a relationship with the Union but also joined the existing multiemployer association unit. From that, he concludes that the Respondent's present and prospective work force was immediately merged into a multiemployer unit and simultaneously the Respondent's 8(f) relationship with the Union was merged into the 9(a) relationship already in existence between the Union and NECA, citing Authorized Air Conditioning Co., 236 NLRB 131 fn. 2 (1978), enfd. 606 F.2d 899 (9th Cir. 1979); Amando Electric, 238 NLRB 37 fn. 1 (1978). The Respondent argues vigorously for a contrary result, and a finding that the Respondent never became a member of the multiemployer unit.

Based on the record made that, among other things, the Respondent secured the services of each of its employees through the hiring hall of the Union, and that each such employee was a member of the Union during the time period immediately following the execution of the "letter of assent," I find clear warrant for the finding, which I make, that at relevant times after Respondent's 8(f) agreement was executed with the Union, the Union was the majority representative of the Respondent's employees. Consequently, I find that the 8(f) agreements ripened into traditional collective-bargaining agreements to which Respondent was bound. I note that throughout this period the Respondent was paying the wages called for in the Union's contract, was contributing to the health and welfare benefit programs that existed by virtue of the Union's collective-bargaining agreement with NECA, that the Respondent obtained all employees through the Union's hiring hall, and that the Respondent abided by the grievance machinery contained within the agreements between NECA and the Union. Under these circumstances it seems clear that the Respondent was not privileged to repudiate its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union when it did so. See Haberman Construction Co., 236 NLRB 79 fn. 1 (1978); and V M Construction Co., 241 NLRB 584 fn. 1 (1979).

[8] The General Counsel's position is similar, although the General Counsel contends that the relationship was immediately thereafter modified, as discussed infra. The Charging Party/Union advances the agreement that, for various reasons, the Respondent entered not merely into an 8(f) agreement, but one possessing all the attributes and entitled to all the protections accorded a collective-bargaining agreement entered into pursuant to Sec. 9(a) of the Act. In light of the General Counsel's decision not to pursue the several theories advanced by the Union, and in view of my decision, which grants the Union relief, albeit on the General Counsel's theory, I see no reason to decide each of the points raised by the Union.

I also conclude, in agreement wih the General Counsel, that the Respondent voluntarily joined the Rocky Mountain Chapter of NECA. In Ruan Transport Corp., 234 NLRB 241, 242 (1978), the Board stated several of the governing principles, as follows:

> The Board has consistently held that "the essential element waranting the establishment of multiemployer units is clear evidence that the employers unequivocally intend to be bound in collective bargaining by group rather than by individual action. The correlative standard for excluding an employer from such a unit is evidence of an intent to pursue an individual course of action with respect to labor relations." As a general rule, the Board has found that an employer does not become a part of a multiemployer bargaining group (i.e., it does not intend to be bound by group bargaining) where it merely adopts a collective-bargaining agreement in the negotiation of which it did not actually participate and which it did not authorize another to negotiate on its behalf.

Here the "letters of assent" signed by Respondent contained the sort of delegations of bargaining authority to NECA that had been repeatedly held to furnish sufficient evidence of the Employer's intent to join with NECA and to become part of the multiemployer bargaining unit. Indeed, there have been instances in which the language demonstrating the intent to be bound was identical to that which is found in this case. See Nelson Electric, 241 NLRB 545 (1979); and Hayden Electric, 256 NLRB 601 (1981).

Thus, the Respondent's repudiation of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union was clearly unlawful and violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[9] Finally it must be noted that the Respondent failed to give the sort of notice required by Section 8(d) of the Act before it repudiated its contract with the Union. By such a failure the Respondent must be held to have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Amando Electric, supra: Oak Cliff-Golman Banking Co., 202 NLRB 614 (1973), and 207 NLRB 1063 (1973).

On the basis of these findings of fact and on the entire record in this proceeding, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Riley Electric, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Those employees who performed work that is described in and covered by the January 1, 1981, and January 1, 1982 Denver Residential Wiring Agreements and those employees who perform work that is described in and covered by the April 1, 1981 Denver Inside Electrical Construction Agreement between the Rocky Mountain Chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association and Local Union No. 68 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, including those employed by Riley Electric, Inc., constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

4. At all times since on or about April 2, 1980, the Union has been and now is, the exclusive representative of all the employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(c) of the Act.

5. By on or about May 20, 1981, repudiating the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement negotiated between the Union and the Association, and by repudiating the Union as collective-bargaining representative of its employees, Riley Electric, Inc. has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[9] It must be remembered that this is not a case involving a question of whether timely notice was given. Here, the Respondent failed to give any notice whatsoever to the Union until months had passed after it repudiated the agreements. Even then, the notices given to the Union were not necessarily the sort of evidence of clear intent required, but rather were an effort by the Respondent to limit its losses should this case be lost.

DECISION AND ORDER REMANDING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On February 28, 1986, Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached Order dismissing the complaints. The General Counsel filed a request for review, and the Respondents filed an opposition.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the Order and the record in light of the request for review and the opposition and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

On October 5, 1983, Mike Benavidez filed a charge in Case 21–CB–8621 alleging that Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 75 (Local 75) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by imposing unlawful internal union disciplinary measures against him. The charge was later amended to allege that Local 75 was operating its dispatch hall in an unlawful and discriminatory manner. On January 10, 1984, Edward Lynn filed a charge in Case 21–CB–8717, later amended, alleging the same unlawful conduct, including an allegation that Local 75 unlawfully imposed internal union disciplinary measures against him. On February 6, 1984, the Acting Regional Director for Region 21 consolidated the two cases and issued a consolidated complaint, later amended.

On February 24, 1984, Local 75 filed an answer to the consolidated complaint denying the commission of any unfair labor practices and alleging as an affirmative defense that the allegations that Benavidez and Lynn had been unlawfully disciplined were barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

At the unfair labor practice hearing on December 5, 1984, the judge dismissed the allegations of unlawful discipline against Benavidez and Lynn, finding them to be barred by Section 10(b). The General Counsel took exception to the ruling on the record. The other portions of the consolidated complaint remained in effect.

At the same hearing, Local 75 moved for the General Counsel to make a more definite statement as to those individuals alleged to have been unlawfully dispatched. The judge directed the General Counsel to file a bill of particulars and indefinitely postponed the hearing pending the filing of such bill.

On August 21, 1985, the judge issued an Order and notice of resumption, ordering that the General Counsel file a bill of particulars by September 6, 1985. On September 4, 1985, the General Counsel filed the bill of particulars.

On September 13, 1985, Local 75 filed a motion to dismiss the consolidated complaint asserting that Local 75 had been dissolved effective March 1, 1985, and that, accordingly, the issues presented in the case were moot. The General Counsel opposed the motion, asserting that the motion was premature as there existed a question as to whether Local 75 had been succeeded by two different labor organizations and that that question involved factual matters necessitating a hearing before a judge. Meanwhile, on April 24, 1985, Benavidez had filed a charge in Case 21–CB–9209,[1] later amended, alleging that Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 108, AFL–CIO (Local 108) and Sheet Metal Workers' International Association, Local Union No. 509, AFL–CIO (Local 509) had become legal successors to Local 75, and as such were liable for remedying the unfair labor practices attributable to Local 75 in Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717. Furthermore, the charge alleged that Local 108 was implementing the internal union disciplinary measures imposed by Local 75 on Lynn and that Local 509 and the International had threatened to impose the internal union disciplinary measures previously imposed by Local 75 on Benavidez, thereby violating Section 8(b)(1)(A).

On October 11, 1985, the General Counsel issued a complaint in Case 21–CB–9209. On October 18, 1985, Case 21–CB–9209 was consolidated with Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717 and a hearing was set for December 17, 1985.[2] At the hearing, evidence was presented concerning the current status of Local 75 and whether Locals 108 and 509 were legal successors to Local 75 for purposes of

[1] The charge also named Sheet Metal Workers' International, AFL–CIO as a party.

[2] In his order of December 10, 1985, the judge dismissed the allegations in Case 21–CB–9209 relating to unlawful imposition of internal union discipline on the grounds that the allegations, like the allegations in Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717, were barred by Sec. 10(b).

remedying the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaints.

On February 28, 1986, the judge issued his order dismissing the complaints in their entirety. The judge concluded that Locals 108 and 509 were not legal successors to Local 75, that Local 75 was no longer an existing entity that could remedy an alleged violation of the Act, and that there was no evidence that the General Counsel requested a make-whole remedy that would warrant continuation of the case.[3] Finally, the judge concluded that there were no outstanding charges against the International.[4]

The General Counsel's request for review, which was filed on March 21, 1986, and the Respondents' opposition raise several issues. First we must consider whether the correctness of the judge's decision to dismiss the allegations of unlawful discipline on 10(b) grounds is an issue that has been timely raised to us. If we conclude that it is, we must then consider whether the judge properly determined that such allegations were barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. Finally, we must determine whether Locals 108 and 509 are successors to Local 75 for the purposes of remedying the remaining unfair labor practice allegations and whether the judge properly dismissed Local 75 as a party.

1. Turning first to the question whether the judge's dismissal of those portions of the complaints alleging unlawful imposition of internal union disciplinary measures is properly before us, we conclude that it is. At the initial hearing in this matter on December 5, 1984, in Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717, the judge dismissed the above-described complaint allegations, finding them to be time barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. The General Counsel orally excepted to this dismissal at that time but did not file an interim appeal with the Board. When the judge dismissed similar allegations in Case 21–CB–9209 against Locals 108 and 509, he did so reasoning that, upon his bench dismissal in Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717, he invited the General Counsel to take an interim appeal, and as the General Counsel did not do so, the bench dismissal, which effectively dismissed a discrete portion of the complaint, became final on December 26, 1984, because a request for review of that bench dismissal had not been filed within the time period set forth in Section 102.27 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The Respondents, relying on the judge's dismissal in Case 21–CB–9209, now assert that the matter has not been timely raised to us.

The Board's Rules and Regulations, Section 102.26, provides:

> All motions, rulings, and orders shall become part of the record . . . . [u]nless expressly authorized by the Rules and Regulations, rulings by the Regional Director or by the administrative law judge on motions and/or by the administrative law judge on objections, and orders in connection therewith, shall not be appealed directly to the Board except by special permission of the Board, but shall be considered by the Board in reviewing the record if exception to the ruling or order is included in the statement of exceptions filed with the Board pursuant to section 102.46.

Section 102.27 further provides:

> If any motion in the nature of a motion to dismiss the complaint in its entirety is granted by the administrative law judge before filing his decision, any party may obtain a review of such action by filing a request therefor with the Board in Washington, D.C., stating the grounds for review, and immediately on such filing shall serve a copy thereof on the Regional Director and on the other parties.

The judge's dismissal of the complaint allegations dealing with the unlawful imposition of internal discipline against Benavidez and Lynn was not an order dismissing the complaint in its entirety, since an extensive portion of the consolidated complaint in Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717 remained in issue. Therefore this situation is governed by Section 102.26 and not by Section 102.27. Pursuant to Section 102.26, a judge's ruling on a motion shall be considered by the Board when the Board reviews the entire record if an exception to the judge's ruling on that motion is included in the party's exceptions filed with the Board. Here, the General Counsel has expressly included in the request for review a request that we reconsider the judge's dismissal of the allegations concerning unlawful imposition of internal discipline. Consequently, we find that the General Counsel has acted in accordance with Section 102.26 and the 10(b) issue is properly before us.

2. The consolidated complaint against Local 75 alleges that on December 1, 1982, an International Trial Board rendered a written decision finding Benavidez and Lynn guilty of internal union charges and fining the two of them and barring them from attending any of the Respondent's meetings. On June 1, 1983, the International General

[3] The judge based this finding on the fact that the General Counsel did not attach the assets of Local 75.

[4] It was alleged that the International was only a party to the internal union discipline portion of the complaint in Case 21–CB–9209.

Executive Council upheld the decision of the International Trial Board, and on June 7, 1983, the Respondent began enforcing the decision of the International Trial Board as upheld by the International's General Executive Council. As stated above, Benavidez' original charge was filed on October 5, 1983, and Lynn's original charge was filed on January 10, 1984. In their motion for dismissal, the Respondents allege that the complaint allegations were time-barred under Section 10(b) because the discipline was imposed on December 1, 1982. The judge found that the portions of the complaint alleging unlawful internal discipline were barred by Section 10(b) on their face, and thus he did not afford the General Counsel an opportunity to present evidence concerning the facts and circumstances on which the allegations in question were based.

The General Counsel asserts that, if permitted, she would present the following evidence: The Charging Parties were active dissident members of Local 75 who were seeking election to office in the upcoming local union elections to be held in July 1983, and the Charging Parties were also active members of a dissident group of Local 75 members who monitored the incumbent officers' running of Local 75. In August and September 1982, internal union charges were filed against Benavidez and Lynn for allegedly engaging in conduct detrimental to the Local at an August 2, 1982 ratification meeting. The International's constitution provides that when local internal union charges are filed, the Local will select a local trial board, which will hear the charges and render a decision that is subject to ratification or rejection of the membership. In the instant case, however, Local 75's trustee requested that the International president appoint an International Trial Board to hold a hearing on the local internal union charges. The International Trial Board rendered its decision on December 1, 1982, finding Benavidez and Lynn guilty of the internal union charges. The International Trial Board imposed a $2000 fine on both Benavidez and Lynn and barred them from participating in any internal union activities in any manner for a period of 4 years. Benavidez and Lynn filed an appeal to the International president pursuant to the International's appellate procedure, and the president transferred the appeal to the International General Executive Council. While the appeal was pending, Benavidez and Lynn continued to campaign actively for local office and to attend all scheduled union meetings. On June 1, 1983, just 6 days before a scheduled union meeting for the nomination of Local officers, the General Executive Council upheld the ruling rendered by the International Trial Board. When Benavidez and Lynn showed up at the June 7, 1983 meeting, they were notified for the first time that Local 75 was going to start implementing the internal union disciplinary measures against them and that they were prohibited from attending the nomination meeting. As a direct result, Benavidez and Lynn were precluded from running for union office. Furthermore, from that time on, Benavidez and Lynn were barred from participating in any union proceedings.

The judge found that the 10(b) period commenced to run on December 1, 1982, when Benavidez and Lynn were notified of the disciplinary action being taken against them, and that the unfair labor practice charges were thus untimely filed. The General Counsel asserts that the 10(b) period did not begin to run until June 7, 1983, after the International Trial Board upheld the ruling and Local 75 notified the Charging Parties that the disciplinary measures would be implemented then. As Benavidez' charge was filed within 6 months of June 7, 1983, the General Counsel asserts that it was timely filed. With respect to Lynn's original charge, filed January 10, 1984, which is beyond 6 months of June 7, 1983, the General Counsel asserts that Benavidez' charge is sufficiently broad to support the allegations as they pertain to Lynn, because the unlawful conduct alleged to have been engaged in by Local 75 against Benavidez and Lynn is identical.

The Board has traditionally held that "a charge concerning union discipline is not time-barred until 6 months after the imposition of the discipline becomes final, regardless of when the disciplinary proceeding may have been instituted." Musicians Local 66 (Civic Music Assn.), 207 NLRB 647, 649 (1973), enf. denied on other grounds 514 F.2d 988 (2d Cir. 1975); see also Longshoremen ILWU Local 30 (U.S. Borax), 223 NLRB 1257 (1976), enfd. 549 F.2d 698 (9th Cir. 1977). The Board, however, announced a new policy in Postal Service Marina Center, 271 NLRB 397 (1984), stating: "Where a final adverse employment decision is made and communicated to an employee–whether the decision is nonrenewal of an employment contract, termination, or other alleged discrimination—the employee is in a position to file an unfair labor practice charge and must do so within 6 months of that time rather than wait until the consequences of the act become most painful." Postal Service Marina Center, supra at 400. The judge applied Postal Service Marina Center to the instant case and concluded that the charges here were time-barred as the 10(b) period began to run on December 1, 1982, the day Benavidez and Lynn were notified of the disciplinary action being taken against them. For the reasons stated below, we find that Postal Service Marina Center does not control the instant case and we conclude that the 10(b) period did not begin to run until June 7, 1983, when Local 75 notified the Charging Parties that the General Executive Council had upheld the International Trial Board's decision.[5]

In Postal Service Marina Center, an employer notified an employee of its decision to remove the employee from its employ at a specified future date. Subsequently, the employer terminated the employee's employment on the specified date and placed the employee on nonpay, nonduty status. Althought the employee had the right to appeal the employer's decision to the Merit Systems Protection Board, an external agency, the employer's decision to discharge the employee was from the employer's position a final adverse employment decision. Consequently, although the employee availed himself of the appeal procedures under the Merit Systems Protection Board, which did not render its decision until a date within the 10(b) period, the Board reasoned that the employee's charge should have been filed within 6 months after he received notification from the employer that he would be removed from his position.

In contrast to Postal Service Marina Center, in which the employer made a final, adverse employment decision, which was appealable, but only to an external agency, here the decision made by the International Trial Board was subject to challenge within the Union and, indeed, pursuant to the Union's constitution could not be final if appealed. Specifically, the International's constitution, which was admitted into evidence, provides for trials in local unions unless the general president, in his discretion, orders the accused to be tried by an International Trial Board. In such instances, the decision of the International Trial Board shall be final except for the right-of-appeal as provided under the constitution. Furthermore, the constitution provides that any member of any local whose constitutional rights are violated by any decision or order of any legally constituted tribunal of the local union or council shall have the right to appeal.

Consequently, it is apparent from the International's own constitution that a decision by an International Trial Board is not final when a party opts to exercise his right to appeal that decision. Here, both Benavidez and Lynn exercised their right and appealed the decision against them to the International General Executive Council. Thus, under the Respondents' own constitution, the decision of the International Trial Board was not final. Rather, the final adverse decision involving the intraunion charges did not come until June 1, 1983, when the General Executive Council upheld the International Trial Board's decision.[6]

This case is further distinguishable from Postal Service Marina Center in that here, after the International Trial Board rendered its decision fining Benavidez and Lynn and barring them from participating in any internal union activities, the Charging Parties were not notified of a specific date when the discipline would be implemented against them, nor was there any attempt made to implement that discipline prior to June 7, 1983. Rather, Local 75 waited until the General Executive Council upheld the International Trial Board's decision before barring the Charging Parties from participating in union meetings. Thus, Benavidez' and Lynn's status with the Union remained unchanged while their appeals were pending, and at no time during that period were they given notice of a specific date on which their status would change.

Under these circumstances we find that no final decision was made until the General Executive Council upheld the International Trial Board's decision to discipline Benavidez and Lynn. Thus, we find that Benavidez' charge was filed within 6 months of the date when he was notified of the final adverse decision by the General Executive Council and it was thus timely filed.

We further find that on the record here Lynn's allegation, although filed more than 6 months after the notification of the International General Executive Council's decision upholding the disciplinary measures, may be closely related to the conduct alleged in Benavidez' timely filed charge, if the General Counsel's evidence is credited. See Broadcast Employees NABET Local 531 (Skateboard Productions), 245 NLRB 638 (1979). Because the judge did not permit the General Counsel to present her evidence about the circumstances surrounding Lynn's situation, it is not possible to be sure that Lynn's allegation is closely related. Therefore, we remand Lynn's allegation to the judge for further evidence and findings both on the merits and on whether it relates back to Benavidez' charge and thus is timely.

3. Turning to the successorship question, the record shows that Local 75 was chartered in 1974

[5] As Chairman Stephens finds Postal Service Marina Center distinguishable from the instant case, he does not pass on whether Postal Service Marina Center was properly decided.

[6] See Machinists Local 68 (Holmatic), 274 NLRB 757 (1985), in which the Board adopted the judge's conclusion that a union trial committee's findings and recommended discipline did not constitute a final adverse decision by the union because the union's constitution specifically provided that the union membership had to vote whether to accept the trial committee's findings and recommended discipline.

pursuant to the International constitution to represent trade jurisdictions in the industrial, sign, and kitchen segments of the sheet metal industry, segments that previously had been represented by Locals 108, 509, 170, and 420. Local 75 succeeded and took over administering the collective-bargaining agreements to which the predecessor Locals had previously been signatory. Local 75 received a prorated share of the general funds of the affected locals in proportion to the contributions made by the members transferred to Local 75.

It is undisputed that in 1984 the International was aware that Local 75 was having internal and financial problems. Thus the International appointed Leon Razee to investigate the situation. On December 20, 1984, Razee met with officers of Local 75 and determined that Local 75 was operating at a monthly deficit of approximately $5000. Razee further determined that there was a strained relationship between the officers of Local 75 and the business manager and business representative.

After meeting with Razee, the officers voted to perform their duties without pay and further voted to put before the general membership a recommendation to increase dues. Razee concluded that this would probably be "too little too late" to save the Local.

In early 1985, Razee met with representatives of Locals 75, 108, and 509 to discuss the assets and liabilities of Local 75. During these discussions, Locals 108 and 509 agreed that in the event of a merger, they would "in some way take care of the liabilities," including any and all future costs in connection with the Benavidez-Lynn case.

Although Local 75 expressed an opinion that if a merger were necessary it would like to merge completely with Local 509, Edward Carlough, the International president, determined that Local 75 would be merged in part with Local 108 and in part with Local 509 and "[i]n view of the fact that both locals are receiving members from former Local 75, it was determined that it would be fair to pro rate equally any present and/or future expenses or liabilities . . . between local unions."

Pursuant to the merger terms, Local 509 obtained trade jurisdiction over the industrial and sign segments of the industry, and Local 108 obtained trade jurisdiction over the kitchen segment of the industry. Members of Local 75 employed by an employer in one of the affected segments were automatically transferred to the appropriate local. Local 75's sole business representative was transferred to the staff of Local 509, as were two executive board members, one from the sign and one from the industrial segment of the industry. Local 509 was instructed to retain one of the three clericals previously employed by Local 75, and Local 509 received the titles and two automobiles owned by former Local 75. The merger further provided that Locals 108 and 509 assumed the responsibility for representing the members previously represented by Local 75, and that they were to assume the collective-bargaining relationships previously enjoyed by Local 75.

Effective March 1, 1985, Locals 108 and 509 commenced representing the members previously represented by Local 75 and stepped into Local 75's shoes with respect to administering the collective-bargaining agreements to which Local 75 had been signatory. Locals 108 and 509 thereafter contacted the signatory employers to negotiate successor contracts; however, in several instances the signatory employers refused to recognize Locals 108 and 509 as the collective-bargaining representative for their employees. In such instances the Respondents filed unfair labor practice charges against the employers alleging a refusal to bargain. The General Counsel refused to issue any complaints; however, concluding that Locals 108 and 509 were not Section 9 representatives because, under what was then Board law regarding voter eligibility in union merger and affiliation elections,[7] Locals 108 and 509 could not demand recognition from the employers who had recognized Local 75.

The judge, in considering the above-described facts, found that Locals 108 and 509 were not legal successors to Local 75 and thus could not be found liable to remedy Local 75's unfair labor practices. The judge acknowledged that the Board had applied the successorship doctrine to a labor organization in one instance,[8] but he distinguished that case from the instant case and reasoned that the successorship logic simply does not fit well when applied to labor organizations. For the following reasons, we disagree.

In Perma Vinyl Corp., 164 NLRB 968, 969 (1967), enfd. sub nom. U.S. Pipe & Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 398 F.2d 544 (5th Cir. 1968),[9] the Board established its successor doctrine holding that "one who acquires and operates a business of an employer found guilty of unfair labor practices in basically unchanged form under circumstances which charge him with notice of unfair labor practice charges against his predecessor should be held responsible for remedying his predecessor's unlawful conduct." The Board reasoned that although the successor was not party to the unfair labor practices, significant policy reasons mandated that the successor be held responsible for remedying the predecessor's unlawful practices. Thus the Board in Perma Vinyl, supra at 969, reasoned:

[7] The General Counsel relied on Furrs Cafeterias, 268 NLRB 988 (1984), and F. W. Woolworth Co., 268 NLRB 805 (1984). The holding in those cases that a union merger or affiliation vote violated due-process standards if nonmembers were not eligible to vote was overruled by the Supreme Court in Financial Institution Employees Local 1182, 475 U.S. 192 (1986).

[9] See also Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973).

> When a new employer is substituted in the employing industry there has been no real change in the employing industry insofar as the victims of past unfair labor practices are concerned, or the need for remedying those unfair labor practices. Appropriate steps must still be taken if the effects of the unfair labor practices are to be erased and all employees reassured of their statutory rights. And it is the successor who has taken over control of the business who is generally in the best position to remedy such unfair labor practices most effectively. The imposition of this responsibility upon even the bona fide purchaser does not work an unfair hardship upon him. When he substituted himself in place of the perpetrator of the unfair labor practices, he became the beneficiary of the unremedied unfair labor practices. Also, his potential liability for remedying the unfair labor practices is a matter which can be reflected in the price he pays for the business, or he may secure an indemnity clause in the sales contract which will indemnify him for liability arising from the seller's unfair labor practices.

The Board's successorship doctrine was extended to an international union's acquistion of another international union in Metallic Lathers Local 46 (Cement League), 259 NLRB 70 (1981), enf. denied on other grounds 727 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1984). There, the Board concluded that there was no policy reason not to apply the Perma Vinyl doctrine in the context of union affiliation because the policy reasons for having a successorship doctrine remain the same—victims need a meaningful remedy, the successor organization is the only organization capable of remedying the unfair labor practices, and the "employing industry" has not changed—that is, in the eyes of the victims, the union remains the same.[10]

The judge distinguished Cement League from the instant case on the grounds that there the Lather International Union merged with the Carpenters International Union but was able to remain virtually intact as a subdivision of the Carpenters. Here, Local 75 merged into two different unions and did not retain any separate identity in either union. The judge further found that in the situation here, several of the Perma Vinyl considerations are missing because: (1) Locals 108 and 509 cannot be seen as "beneficiaries" of Local 75's unfair labor practices; (2) the locals are not part of an "employing industry to be regulated"; and (3) although Locals 108 and 509 are a "source of redress," they did not have the opportunity to adjust the "price" of accepting Local 75's liabilities. Thus, although they accepted Local 75's liabilities under Carlough's directive, that acceptance was voluntary and unsupported by contractual consideration. The judge finally concluded that any attempt to find that Local 75 was merged into Locals 108 and 509 by means of a third-party beneficiary contract executed by the International and Locals 108 and 509 must fail because the International did not have the authority to transfer Local 75's Section 9(a) representative status to a different local. Therefore, since the International's transfer of Local 75's assets (i.e., membership, contracts, and dues-checkoff authorizations) was less than perfect, it would be unfair to conclude that the acquiring Locals were, nevertheless, required to perform their contractual obligations.

We find the judge's analysis unpersuasive. First, we find the distinction made between this case and Cement League to be inconsequential. The Board's decision in Cement League in no way centered on the fact that the Lathers continued to exist as a subdivision. In fact, although the administrative law judge in that case had issued an order against the Lathing Subdivision of the Carpenters, the Board expressly rejected that order and found that the existence of the Lathers, as a subdivision of the Carpenters, was neither alleged nor litigated. Thus, the Board found that the Carpenters' liability was based solely on its status as a successor to the Lathers.

We further find, contrary to the judge, that the Perma Vinyl considerations are present here. Here Locals 108 and 509 may indeed be the beneficiaries of unlawful labor practices allegedly committed by Local 75. Although in the employer-successor cases the successor may benefit from the antiunion atmosphere created by the predecessor, in the union-successor case, such as the one here, the successor may benefit from the unlawful antidissident atmosphere created by a predecessor union. If indeed the Charging Parties were unlawfully disciplined because of dissident activities, Locals 108 and 509 could benefit because such practices would certainly dissuade dissident activity among their members.[11]

[10] The Board recently applied its successorship doctrine in Local Mine Workers Local 9639 (Beth-Elkhorn), 284 NLRB 323 (1987), in which it found that Local 5741 became a successor to Local 9639, when, after Local 9639 entered bankruptcy proceedings, Local 5741 assumed Local 9639's representation obligations with respect to the same employees at the same location; Local 5741 administered the same collective-bargaining agreement without any hiatus; Local 5741 succeeded to the only asset of Local 9639—the future dues obligations of its former members; some Local 9639 leaders, particularly mine and safety committee members, continued to serve for Local 5741; and Local 9639's members transferred to Local 5741.

Although the "employing industry to be regulated" language from the Perma Vinyl decision may not literally apply in the union-successor situation, we find that the reasoning behind the language is just as applicable in the union setting. Granted the Unions here are not functioning as employing industries with respect to Lynn and Benavidez. However, as entities that represent employee interests, they are subject to regulation under the National Labor Relations Act and are susceptible of being found guilty of violating employees' Section 7 rights, just as employers are. In either case, when one entity succeeds another but continues to operate in a manner that is substantially unchanged from the perspective of employees, it is appropriate to call on the successor entity to remedy at least those violations of employee Section 7 rights of which it has knowledge.

Finally, although Local 108 and 509 may not have bargained over their "purchase price" for the assets of Local 75, we find that it nevertheless would advance the purpose of the Act to find that Locals 108 and 509 provide a "source of redress" in the instant case. Although Locals 108 and 509 may not have bargained in the traditional sense for the assets of Local 75, they clearly were involved in the discussions concerning Local 75's problems, and in fact the record reveals that they both agreed to assume the liabilities of Local 75 in the event Local 75 was merged into Locals 108 and 509. Furthermore, there was consideration for their assuming such liabilities in that they also obtained the assets of Local 75. Hence, as Locals 108 and 509 were clearly aware of Local 75's potential liabilities, there is no indication that they were surprised by this action. As the judge found in Beth-Elkhorn:

> It is true, unlike in employer successorship situations, Local 5741 could make no "adjustment in purchase price" to compensate for the backpay obligation of the predecessor. However, it was not compelled to assume representation of former Local 9639's members with their employer, and may not in equity now escape that Local's remedial obligations of which Local 5741 was aware. [284 NLRB at 327.]

Accordingly, we find that Locals 108 and 509 can be held as a "source of redress" to remedy the unfair labor practices allegedly committed by Local 75.

Therefore, we find that Locals 108 and 509 are successors to Local 75, and we remand this case to the judge for consideration of the merits of the complaint allegations.[12] We also reverse the judge's dismissal of the complaint against Local 75—a dismissal that had been predicated on the apparent absence of any entity that could remedy any violations that might be found. Because we have found Locals 109 and 508 to be successors for remedial purposes, there is no reason for dismissing the complaint against the entity that allegedly committed the unfair labor practices that Locals 108 and 509 would be called on to remedy.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the complaints in Cases 21–CB–8621, 21–CB–8717, and 21–CB–9209 be reinstated and this proceeding be remanded to Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy in accordance with this decision.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a supplemental decision containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a recommended Order in light of the Board's remand. Following service of such supplemental decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

ORDER DISMISSING COMPLAINTS

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding originally consisted of a consolidated complaint against Local 75 alleging that it had committed three discrete types of unfair labor practices: 1. hiring hall violations against undetermined victims, 2. independent threats and coercion against Charging Parties Lynn and Benavidez, and 3. unlawful union discipline imposed on Lynn and Benavidez. At the initial hearing, on December 5, 1984, I dismissed the union discipline allegation on 10(b) grounds. I then granted Local 75's motion for a bill of particulars regarding the hiring hall while indefinitely postponing the hearing until the General Counsel issued the bill. The bill was not issued until September 4, 1985, on my setting a deadline on August 21, 1985.

[11] Although the judge seems to find that the transferees' ability to decline to transfer to Locals 108 or 509 in some way lessens Local 108 and 509's ability to benefit from the unfair labor practices allegedly committed by Local 75, we question how free the transferees were to decline membership in Locals 108 and 509. It is likely that they obtained employment through their respective hiring halls and may well have been referred to jobs under contracts with union-security clauses. Furthermore, we see little relevance in this factor, if indeed true. Employees likewise always have the option of not working for a successor employer, but the Board does not find that that diminishes the successor's ability to benefit from a predecessor's unlawful labor practices.

[12] We note that the Respondents have filed a motion for dismissal or in the alternative a more definite statement concerning the alleged hiring hall violations. We do not address the merits of that motion and leave it open for the judge's consideration on remand.

On September 16, 1985, Local 75's counsel moved to dismiss the original complaint on mootness grounds asserting that Local 75 had been dissolved on March 1, 1985, and that no entity existed capable of remedying the unfair labor practices even if they had been committed. The General Counsel opposed asserting that Locals 108 and 509 had become legal successors. I decided to hold a hearing on the motion to dismiss. That hearing was held on December 17, 1985.

In the meantime, on October 11, 1985, the General Counsel issued a complaint in Case 21–CB–9209 against Locals 108 and 509 as well as their parent International Union. I granted the General Counsel's motion to consolidate the two complaints. The new complaint realleged that Local 75 had committed the same three discrete unfair labor practices: 1. the hiring hall violations (expanded to track the recently filed bill of particulars); 2. the same restraint and coercion; and 3. the same union discipline matter. Locals 108 and 509 moved to dismiss the last (joined by the International in its answer) on 10(b) grounds. On December 10, I issued an order granting that motion and partially dismissed the complaint in Case 21–CB–9209.

Still remaining for resolution in both cases are the first two issues, Local 75's alleged hiring hall abuse and certain questions of its supposedly having illegally restrained and coerced Lynn and Benavidez. Locals 108 and 509 are not alleged to have committed any of these violations in the first instance. The International is alleged only as a party to the internal union discipline portion, previously dismissed. Insofar as these three entities are concerned they are not accused of being involved in Local 75's remaining alleged misconduct,[1] although the General Counsel contends Locals 108 and 509 are responsible as successors to make whole any individual who lost an employment opportunity due to Local 75's alleged mishandling of its hiring hall.[2] These two locals deny they are successors to Local 75 and they have moved for dismissal of the entire second complaint.

II. THE FACTS

At the December 17, 1985 hearing regarding the current status of Local 75 and whether Locals 108 and 509 are legal successors, the facts may be summarized as follows:

International President Carlough's Directive

Local 75 was chartered as a local union by the Sheet Metal Workers International Association, AFL–CIO in 1974. It drew its membership from several sister locals in the greater Los Angeles area. It represented employees in three different industries, the food equipment manufacturing industry, the electric sign industry, and the so-called industrial industry. Its business office was in Santa Fe Springs.

In late 1984 Local 75's financial and internal political problems became so severe that International President Edward J. Carlough assigned a representative from Phoenix, Leon Razee, to review the situation and to make recommendations to resolve them. In December and January, Razee filed reports showing that Local 75 was operating at a $5000-per-month loss which it was unlikely to correct. He also estimated that it had assets of about $110,000 cash,[3] nearly 700 active members, 2 automobiles, and an interest in a training facility "wholly owned" by the joint apprenticeship training committee, a separate entity. Its liabilities included the salaries of one business representative and three clericals, office rent, two strikes costing $1200 per week, and the potential liability in the instant NLRB case (which had just begun). Razee reported that the current leadership was ineffectual and could not deal with the problems.

Razee recommended transferring the industrial shops, the business agent, the cars, and the training facility to Local 509. He recommended transferring the sign shops and the food equipment shops to Local 108. He made other detailed recommendations as well. Carlough, however, did not follow them all, particularly the trade jurisdiction recommendation.

On February 8, 1985, by letter to all three locals, Carlough announced that on March 1, 1985, he was transferring the trade jurisdiction over the industrial and sign shops to Local 509 and the trade jurisdiction over the food equipment manufacturing shops to Local 108.

He did follow Razee's recommendation that retired members be given their choice of locals and determined that each member be transferred with full membership credit. He also directed an audit of Local 75's books and records for the purpose of determining a pro rata distribution of assets and liabilities to Locals 108 and 509. In addition he transferred the Local 75 business representative to Local 509, honoring a request from Local 509's business manager. The business representative's employment terms were to be the same as those of other Local 509 representatives.

Carlough also directed that Local 509 allow two of Local 75's executive board members to become executive board members of Local 509, one each to represent the two segments being added to Local 509. He did not issue a similar directive to Local 108.

He also directed the acquiring locals initially to honor the Local 75 dues structure, but said they must meet the minimum dues as set forth in the International constitution no later than July 1, 1985. Because this involved averaging building trades pay scales with those in other industries, as dues are tied to the hourly pay rate, it meant a dues increase to all former Local 75 members within 3 months.

[1] With the dismissal of the internal discipline allegation, and in the absence of any further allegation against it, there is no outstanding complaint against the International Union.

[2] It should be noted that nowhere has the General Counsel stated the name of any potential hiring hall dispatchee who is allegedly entitled to backpay. His bill of particulars names only individuals who were actually dispatched, not those denied job referrals.

[3] Roughly two-thirds of that amount consisted of a strike fund raised by special assessment. That fund cannot be considered as part of Local 75's general fund for it is not the product of dues or operating assessments. It is, instead, an employee asset.

Local 509 was given the two automobiles and the office furniture and equipment. Carlough directed that Local 75's office lease be canceled if possible and, if not, the rent shared by both locals on a pro rata basis. He directed Local 509 to hire one of Local 75's three clericals, but did not direct Local 108 to hire any. Severance expenses of the clericals were to be borne by each on a pro rata basis.

He concluded by directing Locals 108 and 509 to adopt Local 75's contracts in their newly acquired trade jurisdictions and required them to assume joint responsibility for Local 75's debts and obligations, unpaid rent, or judgments for backpay "in suits or other administrative proceedings," i.e., NLRB Cases 21-CB-8621 and 21-CB-8717 involved here. Finally Carlough stated that the books, records, securities, titles, bank accounts, etc., were to be transmitted to the International's general secretary-treasurer for later apportionment to Locals 108 and 509.

He concluded his directive by asserting Local 75's dissolution was necessary because it had become an ineffective representative due to internal strife, had lost members, and had failed to assist its employers in meeting nonunion competition. He could find no effective leadership at Local 75. He said the transfer to Locals 108 and 509 would improve work prospects and provide those employees with strength and capable, self-sufficient leadership. He also asserted that merging various trade jurisdictions in single, larger locals was consistent with the International's current policy of having fewer, but stronger, local unions having the financial resources adequately to represent the membership.

The Dissolution of Local 75

To carry out his directive, International President Carlough ordered his Representative Razee to oversee the dissolution and transfer of the membership and property as he had directed.

Beginning on February 8, 1985, Razee took control of Local 75 and began to dismantle it. The collective-bargaining agreements in all three industries were about to expire. In late February he wrote letters to all the employers advising them of the "merger and division" of Local 75. He notified each employer that its unit employees' union memberships were being transferred to either Local 509 or Local 108 as appropriate and said that the acquiring local would be charged with servicing those employees, the firm, and the remainder of the collective-bargaining contract. He advised that contract renewals and extensions were to be the responsibility of the acquiring union. He concluded by telling the employers the name of the acquiring local's business manager, his address, and his telephone number.

Similarly, Razee sent letters to the Local 75 membership advising them of the change. Most appeared to have accepted it without protest, although approximately 80 sign shop employees filed a petition asking to be placed in Local 108 rather than Local 509. Their petition failed. On March 1, 1985, Locals 108 and 509 began collecting dues from former Local 75 members, principally by Razee's having asked the employers to treat the Local 75 checkoff authorizations as authorizations to the acquiring locals.

He also asked the trustees of the joint apprenticeship program to merge Local 75's program with that of Local 509, and they did so.

Razee then transmitted to the International's secretary-treasurer Local 75's receipt books, union labels, minute books, the official seal (after destroying it), its original charter, credit cards (after destruction), bank statements, canceled checks, other financial records, and a copy of the final audit. In addition he transmitted the strike fund balance of $66,710 to the International. It is not entirely clear whether this fund was later remitted to Local 108 or 509 on a pro rata basis but it appears to have been. On March 12, Razee forwarded the last amount of cash, $6742, left in Local 75's bank accounts to the International. In May, an additional $40 was discovered and also transmitted to the International. Beginning in June, the International began sending checks to Locals 108 and 509 representing moneys formerly held by Local 75. The International sent Local 509 a total of $34,545. In July it sent $38,955 to Local 108. Although the documentation is less than clear, most of this seems to have been strike fund money and seems to have remained earmarked for that purpose.

Razee discharged all three clericals on March 2, 1985, although one was transferred to Local 509. Both Locals were told to honor a severance pay grievance later filed on behalf of the clericals by their Union, Local 30, OPEIU. Likewise all the elected officers were released.

With respect to the collective-bargaining process, Local 509, with its original office in Riverside, had been directed by Carlough to hold meetings on an alternating basis in both Riverside and Buena Park to better accommodate the new members. In early March it sent a questionnaire to its new members asking what they wanted in the new contract. It also advised the employers bound by the Local 75 contract of the merger and attempted to open them for renegotiation. Local 108 sent similar letters to the employers in its new trade jurisdiction.

Local 75, until its dissolution, had been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative as defined by Section 9(a) of the Act of the sheet metal employees employed by 56 or 57 employers. Twenty-five were food equipment shops, whose jurisdiction was given to Local 108; 19 or 20 were industrial shops, and 11 were sign shops whose jurisdiction was given to Local 509.

All of the Local 75 collective-bargaining contracts were due to expire on June 30, 1985. Assuming that Local 75's demise did not cancel its collective-bargaining contracts on March 1 by operation of law, they had only 4 months left when Local 75 was dissolved.

The parties have stipulated that Local 509, as of the date of this hearing, December 17, 1985, had signed collective-bargaining contracts with all but two of the sign shops; furthermore, it appears that it now has contracts with all but seven industrial shops. Local 509 sought to be declared Local 75's successor under Section 9(a), by filing refusal-to-bargain charges against two employers with the Regional Director. However, the Regional Director rebuffed that effort on the ground that the membership had not been permitted to vote on the issue. She held that Local 509 was not the 9(a) representative of the employees of those two employers, Industrial Sheet Metal and Benner Sheet Metal. Local 509's majority status was also challenged by S & R Industrial Sheet Metal, Industrial Sheet Metal Fabricators of California, Brother's Sheet Metal, and Kruse Metals Mfg. Co.

Local 509 filed election petitions with the Board seeking elections at Kruse and Industrial Sheet Metal Fabricators of California. Although elections were conducted, Local 509 lost each.

At the time of this hearing Local 108 would not stipulate that it had reached contracts with any of the food equipment manufacturers. The General Counsel made no other effort to prove their status except to ask for the stipulation. The record is silent regarding the status of those negotiations, if any, although American Food Service has challenged Local 108's claim to 9(a) successorship.

Furthermore, the dissolution was not done in secret. The Board's Regional Office was notified in January 1985 that dissolution was under consideration and later that it was being carried out. Despite that notice the General Counsel did not seek to seize Local 75's assets to preserve them to satisfy any backpay claims.

II. CONCLUSIONS

A. Dissolution of Local 75

The first question to be answered is whether Local 75 still exists in any form. After the above evidence was received counsel for the General Counsel was asked if he now conceded that Local 75 had been dissolved. He refused. Nonetheless, in his brief he makes no contention that it has not been dissolved. In fact, the entire focus of his brief is to argue that Locals 108 and 509 are Local 75's legal successors. It appears that he now concedes, by implication, the facts of dissolution.

Certainly the evidence to that effect is overwhelming and clearly demonstrates that Local 75 has been dissolved. Since March 1, 1985, it has had no officers, no members, no money, no employees, and is no longer in the business of negotiating and/or administering collective-bargaining contracts on behalf of employees it represented. On June 30, those contracts expired and were not renewed by Local 75. Even the very symbol of its existence, its seal, has been destroyed. I have no hesitation in finding that Local 75 was dissolved on March 1. Moreover, the dissolution seems to have been the result of an honest purpose and has not been shown to be an effort to evade any responsibilities under the Act. Indeed, the General Counsel does not so contend. I find, therefore, that Local 75 was dissolved on March 1, 1985.

B. The Successorship Question

The harder question is whether Locals 108 and 509 may be found to be legal successors to Local 75 for the purpose of remedying Local 75's alleged misconduct. Before its 1967 decision in Perma Vinyl Corp., 164 NLRB 968 (1967),[4] the Board had held that "bona fide purchasers" of ongoing businesses were not obligated to remedy the unfair labor practices of the seller. Symns Grocer Co., 109 NLRB 346 (1954). In Perma Vinyl the Board, persuaded by the apparent injustice to illegally discharged employees, noted that successors, even with knowledge of the predecessor's unfair labor practices, were not obligated to reinstate those employees, much less pay them any backpay. It decided that the Symns Grocer Co. policy was too harsh, for it did not offer such employees a meaningful remedy. Finding authority to extend liability to the purchaser in the discretionary remedy language of Section 10(c) of the Act, as well as in the successors and assigns language found in Rule 65(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure,[5] the Board asserted that it would effectuate Federal labor policy to overrule Symns, saying:[6]

> To further the public interest involved in effectuating the policies of the Act and achieve the "objectives of national labor policy, reflected in established principles of federal law," we are persuaded that one who acquires and operates a business of an employer found guilty of unfair labor practices in basically unchanged form under circumstances which charge him with notice of unfair labor practice charges against his predecessor should be held responsible for remedying his predecessor's unlawful conduct.

It buttressed that language noting that the purchaser, though not a party to the unfair labor practice, nonetheless had become part of the "employing industry" to be regulated. The Board asserted that when a new employer has been substituted for the old in the same employing industry no meaningful change in the employing industry occurs insofar as the victims of the unfair labor practices are concerned. It observed that the purchaser was in the best position to remedy a discharge, by reinstatement to the "employing industry" and by making a backpay payment. The Board said this would work no real hardship on a purchaser because when he substituted himself for the perpetrator of the unfair labor practices, he became the beneficiary of the illegal conduct. Finally, it concluded, since the purchaser had knowledge of those unfair labor practices, he could easily adjust the price in the contract for the business being purchased to cover such liability. Both the predecessor and successor were to be held jointly and severally liable under this doctrine. Ultimately the Supreme Court agreed with the Board's logic in Golden State Bottling v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973).

That same logic, however, when applied to local labor organizations simply does not fit well. It is true that the Board has applied the Perma Vinyl doctrine in the one reported case involving union mergers, Metallic Lathers Local 46 (Cement League), 259 NLRB 70 (1981), enf. denied on other grounds 727 F.2d 234 (2d Cir. 1984).

The facts of that case, however, are dissimilar to those presented here. The case involved the merger of the Lathers International Union with the Carpenters International Union. As a result of extensive negotiations between the two, the Lathers remained virtually intact as a subdivision of the Carpenters though no longer a separate legal entity. The continued visibility of the dissolved union in Cement League easily led the Board to conclude that the Carpenters International Union was a Perma Vinyl successor.

Unlike Cement League the so-called merger here did not result in a shadow Local 75 appearing within either the Locals 108 or 509 frameworks.

Although Carlough directed Local 509 was to hire Local 75's business representative, its business manager had requested him, and could have hired him without Carlough's directive. The directive did force Local 509 to accept two of Local 75's executive board members (who volunteered). None of these three was involved in Local 75's alleged unfair labor practices and none was taken on Local 75's terms. Local 108 was not even required to accept any of Local 75's officials except as rank-and-file members.

Moreover, significant Perma Vinyl considerations are missing. First, Locals 108 and 509 cannot be seen as beneficiaries of Local 75's unfair labor practices. In the employer-successor cases such as Perma Vinyl the successor benefited from the antiunion atmosphere created by the predecessor. That atmosphere disadvantaged the Union in collective bargaining and tended to chill employee conduct protected by Section 7, thereby lessening the risk of unionization. No similar impact can be seen here. The substitution of the two unions here created entirely new intraunion atmospheres. Officers new to the transferred membership, unbeholden to Local 75's officers, were presented to the old Local 75 membership. Moreover, those transferees were free to decline Locals 108 and 509's offer of membership altogether. Thus, even if these two locals benefited by an expanded membership base, they cannot be said to have gained an advantage created by Local 75's unfair labor practices.

The second dissimilarity is the "employing industry to be regulated" concept. In Perma Vinyl and similar cases one business entity substituted itself for another and the affected employees continued to work without significant interruption or change. It is true that in Cement League the Board paid lipservice to that concept, yet its use seems most inappropriate there as it does here. Labor unions are not members of the employing industry as the concept was used in Perma Vinyl. They are not, first of all, commercial businesses. Instead of profiting from the gross product of the industry, they seek to regulate the employment conditions of the employees they represent. Their business is one of employee representation, not employment itself. Thus, while it is easy to refer to the employing industry in substitutions of business entities for one another, it is not so easy to say the same when one employee representative is substituted for another. When that happens the employment of represented employees simply remains with the same legal and economic entity, the employer.

Indeed, the Board itself is in the business of providing a means of changing bargaining representatives through the election process. It conducts representation elections and grants or denies 9(a) status based on the outcome. It also will recognize or deny those rights based on an uncoerced proof of majority without an election. If those procedures are followed and a new 9(a) representative is selected, it is beyond doubt that the "successor" becomes insulated from any Perma Vinyl liability created by the unfair labor practices of the ousted union. Such changes are hardly of the technical variety with which Perma Vinyl is concerned. Similarly, here, the International's attempt to reassign Local 75's 9(a) status to Locals 108 and 509 was hardly a meaningless change of bargaining representative. All three "acquirers" are entities separate from Local 75 for it has long been held that local unions are not simply arms of their parent international union. Electrical Workers IBEW (Franklin Electric), 121 NLRB 143 (1958), citing Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U.S. 344, 395 (1922). That "separateness" forced Local 509 to organize some employers ab initio. It is clear, therefore, that a concept of economic continuity similar to the Perma Vinyl employing industry concept is not to be found here.

The last stated Perma Vinyl consideration is "source of redress." It is true that Locals 108 and 509 are on the scene and could be viewed as an equitable source of redress, but unlike the Perma Vinyl successor they have had no opportunity to adjust the "price" of their accepting Local 75's remains. As previously noted this was not a commerical buy-sell contract. It was an effort by the International to correct a representational vacuum being created as Local 75 followed a path of self-destruction. Two choices faced the International. It could either have let Local 75 destroy itself, leaving its members high and dry or it could try to save what was left by transferring members to other locals. It chose the latter course but in doing so gave the acquiring locals few options. They could accept or reject President Carlough's mandate, but if they accepted they could not adjust any purchase price as can buyers falling under the Perma Vinyl doctrine. It was a take-it-or-leave it proposition. Indeed, if they had any input at all into the takeover process it was only through statements to Razee or Carlough. After considering their limited input, Razee made independent recommendations which Carlough did not fully follow. Locals 108 and 509's requests, which were minimal, can hardly be characterized as the sort of negotiations leading to a sale. Their subsequent acceptance of Carlough's terms is more in the nature of accepting a gift than it is in the nature of a purchase.

Thus, although Carlough required the Locals to assume Local 75's liabilities, including those Local 75 might suffer as a result of these unfair labor practices, it cannot be said that the Locals had contractually obligated themselves to assume Local 75's debts or judgments. In fact Locals 108 and 509's acceptance of the liabilities under Carlough's directives appear to me to be the acceptance of a volunteer, unsupported by contractual consideration. Volunteers are not usually liable for the debts of others, absent some sort of detrimental reliance, not seen here. Moreover, the preexisting debts of another are insufficient consideration to make such a promise an enforceable contract.

The General Counsel argues, however, that one should not be able to accept the assets of the perpetrator of unfair labor practices without also accepting its liabilities and that Locals 108 and 509's acceptance of Carlough's terms is a recognition of that obligation.

This raises the final Perma Vinyl consideration, unsaid there or in any of the cases in its line, but clearly present. That is the presence or absence of privity between the successor and the predecessor.[7] First, I should observe that in every Perma Vinyl type successor case, including Cement League, there is direct privity between the predecessor and the successor. This is usually found in the buy-sell contract, but is sometimes present through operation of law, i.e., a bankruptcy trustee or takeover by a secured creditor. Clearly, here, Locals 108 and 509 had no privity of contract with Local 75. They were separate entities. Franklin Electric, supra. Both acquired their rights, such as they are, from the International. They had no negotiations whatsoever with Local 75. It is true that both looked at Local 75 with some care after the International began to sense that Local 75 was failing. Both knew they were likely recipients of Local 75's remains and wished to assure themselves that they would not be saddled with an albatross. Presumably they could have rejected the International's largesse had they wished. Even so, unlike the Perma Vinyl successors they did not negotiate with their predecessor. Consistent with the privity requirement is Southland Mfg. Corp., 186 NLRB 792, 805 (1970), a case dismissing a claim of successorship liability. In that case the successor acquired a moribund business from a middleman, the Small Business Administration, well after the predecessor had stopped operating. As the successor had no privity with the predecessor, the Board held the successor was not obligated to remedy the unfair labor practices committed by the previous operator. A study of the Perma Vinyl line of cases, therefore, clearly mandates the conclusion that privity between the predecessor and the putative successor is necessary before Perma Vinyl remedial liability will attach.

Accordingly, since it has been shown that Locals 108 and 509 had no privity with Local 75, I cannot agree with the General Counsel that one cannot accept the assets of a moribund entity from a middleman without also accepting its liabilities. Southland Mfg. Co., supra. Specifically, I conclude that Locals 108 and 509 are not successors within the meaning of the Perma Vinyl doctrine.

The General Counsel's final argument is based on the "contractual assumption of liability" cases such as Liberty Electronics Corp., 143 NLRB 605 (1963), and Emerson Electric Co., 176 NLRB 744 (1969). In those cases, applying third-party beneficiary contract concepts, the Board found that the successor had agreed with the predecessor, as part of the purchase agreement, to pay the predecessor's liabilities arising from its unfair labor practices. In these cases not only can privity be readily found, but they may even be characterized as foreshadowing the Perma Vinyl price adjustment factor, for the parties had foreseen the liability and had adjusted the price to accommodate it. In any event there was a clearcut contract supported by bargained-for consideration designed to benefit third parties—the victims of the unfair labor practices.

The same cannot be seen here. I have already found that this transaction was more in the nature of a gift, conditional perhaps, but certainly less than a contract. As noted above, there was no privity between Local 75 and the two acquiring unions. Moreover, there was no bargained-for consideration creating a contractual relationship. Thus no third-party beneficiary contract was created.

I should add one final observation here. Even if one might find an effort to reach a third-party beneficiary contract here, it appears incomplete. The International, in its directive, told Locals 108 and 509 to administer Local 75's contracts for their duration (120 days) and tried to posit them as new 9(a) representatives. Furthermore, it tried to hand over to the acquiring Locals, through both the contracts and the checkoff authorizations, the mandatory right to collect dues. Neither of those efforts could legally have been performed because the International could not transfer the 9(a) relationship enjoyed by Local 75 to anybody. It could not even seize it for itself. That is a right reserved for the employees; they, and only they, have the right to determine who their exclusive collective-bargaining representative shall be. No one else, including the president of an International union, may lawfully transfer that status to another representative without proof of uncoerced majority status. Likewise, the International could not force former Local 75 members to pay dues to Locals 108 or 509. Neither the union-shop provisions of the Local 75 contracts nor the dues-checkoff authorizations to Local 75 permitted the acquiring locals to demand dues from those members being transferred. Thus, the International could not, in reality, transfer these Local 75 assets in the same form in which Local 75 had enjoyed them. The International Union's transfer of such assets was therefore less than perfect. That being the case, one can reasonably question whether the alleged third-party contract had sufficiently matured to obligate the acquiring locals to perform their obligations under this supposed contract, payment of Local 75's liabilities. I suggest that the "contract" was not fully performed by the International and therefore the Locals are not obligated to perform either.

In any event this transaction is, at best, a conditional gift. If the donees of the gift honor its terms, well and good. If not, the donor may have its own redress. Either way, third parties, such as the Board or Local 75 backpay claimants have no enforceable rights against the donees. I therefore reject the General Counsel's argument that Locals 108 and 509 are obligated by contract to remedy Local 75's unfair labor practices.

[7] The Supreme Court actually does discuss privity as a requirement but easily found it in the case before it. Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, supra at 179, 180. Thus it found the rule 65(d) "successor and assigns" language applicable. Had privity been absent it seems likely that the Court would not have found successor liability.

As Locals 108 and 509 are neither Perma Vinyl successors nor bound by contract to remedy Local 75's unfair labor practices it follows that the motion to dismiss the case against them, Case 21–CB–9209, should be granted.

C. The Case Against Local 75

Remaining to be decided is the question of whether it would serve any purpose to resume the prosecution of Local 75. It has been held that the Board is entitled to a remedy even as against an entity which is no longer in business. See for example Southport Petroleum Co. v. NLRB, 315 U.S. 100, 107 (1942); NLRB v. Electric Steam Radiator Corp., 321 F.2d 733, 738 (6th Cir. 1963); Armitage Sand & Gravel, 203 NLRB 162, 166 (1973). These cases are bottomed on the premise that it serves the public policy of obtaining a remedial order against a wrongdoer and that a source of economic redress may be found. Assets can be chased and seized and the private rights involved may obtain at least partial satisfaction.

Is that consideration present here? First we should look at the order the General Counsel is seeking. Is it seeking a cease-and-desist order, a make-whole order, or both? To the extent that it seeks a cease-and-desist order dealing with the alleged hiring hall improprieties and the alleged restraint and coercion, Local 75's dissolution renders that remedy meaningless. The Board has held cease-and-desist orders against dissolved labor organizations moot and unnecessary. Steelworkers Local 14055 (Dow Chemical), 229 NLRB 302 (1977). Thus the policy is clear that the Board will not issue such an order where, as here, it would be totally ineffectual. I see no reason to proceed for the purpose of issuing such a remedy.

With respect to backpay, however, the policy is not as clear. It may be that Local 75 assets could be found if one were to make a thorough search. Yet is counsel for the General Counsel seeking such an order? I note that he has had in his possession since December 1984 all of Local 75's hiring hall records, he has known since approximately January 1985 that Local 75 was in danger of being dissolved, and he has known since February 1985 that dissolution was occurring. Yet at no time did the General Counsel take steps to prevent the dispersal of Local 75's assets. Moreover, he has never, even in his bill of particulars, named a single person believed to be entitled to backpay.

In light of these facts can it be said that counsel for the General Counsel even seeks a backpay order? I conclude, despite any remonstration to the contrary, that he does not. If the General Counsel truly sought backpay he would have attempted to obtain a protective order in the United States district court and would have promptly issued a bill of particulars naming at least some hiring hall users supposedly entitled to that remedy. Compare the remedy issued in Polis Wallcovering Co., 262 NLRB 1336, 1339 (1982). There the Board affirmed an administrative law judge who ordered backpay for the named discriminatee, but not for hiring hall users who were not named but who belonged to the class being discriminated against. This case would result in a similar remedy, only a cease-and-desist order.

Even if the General Counsel now seeks a backpay order one may ask if it is truly worth it. The bill of particulars asserts 174 to 175 referrals, about 85 percent, to have been improper. Local 75's remaining assets, if traced, appear to be small. As a result no private rights would be adequately satisfied while the expense in seeking to satisfy them would be enormous. In this age of shrinking agency budgets, this pursuit would not be cost-effective. Moreover, the public interest has in fact been served. To the extent Local 75 may have been a wrongdoer, it no longer exists and cannot continue to harm referral applicants. I conclude, therefore, that continued processing of the case against Local 75 would not effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, I shall grant the motion to dismiss Cases 21–CB–8621 and 21–CB–8717.

Hemisphere Broadcasting Corporation (WBCN) and Lesley E. Warren. Case 1–CA–23094

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 26, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found, and we agree, that the General Counsel has failed to sustain her burden under Wright Line[1] of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination in the discharge of Lesley E. Warren based on her union or other protected concerted activities. It is, therefore, unnecessary to resolve whether the Respondent would have discharged Warren in the absence of these activities. We also find, however, that a preponderance of the evidence does support a finding that Warren's discharge was discriminatorily accelerated. Her former coworkers, Stephen Berger and Judy Carlough, both of whom were promoted to supervisory positions shortly before Warren's discharge, harbored strong animus against Warren because of her position on withdrawing sales personnel from the collective-bargaining unit. They influenced a reversal of a management decision made prior to their promotions to defer the date of Warren's termination until a replacement for her position could be found. We agree with the General Counsel that the issue has been fully and fairly litigated.

The judge acknowledged that, if Berger and Carlough in their newly attained capacities as supervisors participated in the Respondent's decision to discharge Warren (i.e., had their promotions predated the discharge decision), that would provide a substantial basis for inferring that the discharge was unlawfully motivated. This is because Berger and Carlough were in the forefront of efforts to sever the sales division from the unit. Berger, at least, was found to have harbored substantial hostility toward Warren for her resistance to those efforts. The judge further found that Warren's resistance risked, but did not ultimately prejudice, Berger and Carlough's promotional opportunities. The judge declined to pass on the General Counsel's alternative theory, finding that Berger and Carlough's request for Warren's immediate termination was a "sincere and legitimate benevolent expression." We disagree.

In sales department shop meetings and informal discussions Warren and Berger heatedly debated the issue of severing that department from the unit. Berger and Carlough had both long advocated withdrawal from the unit and voiced their concerns to the shop. Based on representations they had received from management, they viewed their proposal as facilitating both sales department access to management information (from which they had been barred so long as the information could be used in negotiations) and a restructuring of the department to increase the number of supervisory positions, of which Berger and Carlough were both the ultimate beneficiaries when the latter aspect of their proposal was implemented. Warren, on the other hand, opposed the proposal and expressed her intentions to continue to be covered by a union contract.

As Carlough described it, "it was an emotional thing," with Warren pitted against the rest of her shop on the issue, particularly against Berger whose arguments with Warren were loud and bitter. Warren abstained from voting on the proposal at the first union membership meeting, which vote was conducted by a show of hands. Warren spoke against the proposal and also abstained from voting at the second membership meeting and, although the vote was by secret ballot, she revealed her abstention—the only one. Warren further credibly testified to Berger and Carlough's adverse reaction after their proposal was defeated. At a March 15, 1985 meeting between membership and management, Warren attacked the same proposal when it was presented by management and, after other proposals affecting compensation for sales representatives and the additional management slots were later negotiated, Warren vigorously opposed ratification. The judge concluded that Warren's union activities were open and notorious.

Berger and Carlough acknowledged having urged Sales Supervisor Robert Mendelsohn to terminate Warren immediately on learning that Mendelsohn intended to do so when her replacement was hired, and it is undisputed that he adopted their suggestion. The explanations for opposing deferral of her termination were not consistent. Thus, both Berger and Carlough stated they had favored an immediate termination in a spirit of compassion and fairness toward Warren so as not to foster her false expectations that she would fit into the new departmental structure. Carlough stated as her first concern, however, a perceived interference with the Respondent's ability to sustain Warren's current accounts if her pending vacancy became public knowledge in the course of interviewing candidates to replace her.

First, the intense hostility between Warren and her former colleagues belies any claim that their motives flowed from any genuine spirit of compassion. As to the "publicity" motive advanced by Carlough, the record shows that the interviewing process for Warren's replacement was already well underway at the time Carlough allegedly voiced concern that the news would spread within the industry. Further, Berger mentioned no such expressed concern over publicity, and Mendelsohn's testimony in that regard conflicted as much with Carlough's as corroborated it. Thus, Mendelsohn testified that Berger and Carlough feared not that the spread of news of Warren's pending termination would threaten accounts, but that "word would get back to Lesley."

We therefore reject the reasons advanced by the Respondent's witnesses for urging an acceleration of Warren's termination and find the real reason was the evidenced hostility toward Warren's protected activity of resisting withdrawal of her shop from the bargaining unit. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by acceding to unlawful motivation from its supervisors to accelerate an already planned lawful discharge.[2]

Having found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designated to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Lesley E. Warren's discharge on May 14, 1986, was accelerated because of her union activities, but that the Respondent intended to terminate her lawfully when a replacement could be hired, we shall not order that she be offered reinstatement, but only that she be made whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of her discharge prior to the hiring of that replacement, by payment to her of a sum of money equal to the amount she would have earned in wages and other benefits from the date of her termination to the date of her replacement, less net interim earnings. The amount of backpay shall be calculated in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Hemisphere Broadcasting Corporation (WBCN), Boston, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Accelerating the timing of employees' terminations for engaging in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Lesley E. Warren whole for any loss in earnings and other benefits, plus interest, she may have suffered because of the discrimination against her in accordance with the provisions set forth in the remedy sertion of this decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its Boston, Massachusetts facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[2] See Ohio Valley Graphic Arts, 234 NLRB 493 (1978).

[3] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

WILFORD W. JOHANSEN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with my colleagues that the General Counsel failed to sustain her burden of establishing a prima facie case of discriminatory motivation in the Respondent's discharge of Lesley E. Warren. Unlike my colleagues, however, I find based on the credited testimony that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by the timing of Warren's discharge. Accordingly, I dissent from the finding of a violation and would dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT accelerate the timing of termination of our employees because of their activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make Lesley E. Warren whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the unlawful acceleration of her discharge, less net interim earnings, plus interest.

HEMISPHERE BROADCASTING CORPORATION (WBCN)

Anthony D. Dadalt, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Mary L. Marshall, Esq. (Stoneman, Chandler & Miller), of Boston, Massachusetts, for the Respondent.
John J. McDonough, Esq. (DiMento & Sullivan), of Boston, Massachusetts, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NORMAN ZANKEL, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on various dates between 29 January and 19 February 1986 in Boston, Massachusetts.[1]

The charge was filed by Lesley E. Warren against Hemisphere Broadcasting Corporation (WBCN) (the Employer) on 5 August 1985.[2] The case was heard pursuant to a complaint that issued on 7 October.

In substance, the complaint, as amended at the hearing, alleges that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by discriminatorily discharging Warren on 15 May.[3]

All parties were afforded the opportunity to present oral and documentary evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to present oral argument. Posthearing briefs have been received from counsel for the General Counsel and from the Employer.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses,[4] I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction is uncontested. The Employer, a corporation, at all material times, has been engaged in the operation of a radio broadcasting station, WBCN, with a place of business, and offices, in Boston, Massachusetts. The Employer's gross revenues exceed $100,000 annually; and in the same period, it purchases and receives at its WBCN facility products, goods, and materials exceeding $5000 in value directly from points outside Massachusetts. Also, at all material times, the Employer was a member of, or subscribed to, various interstate news services and advertised nationally sold products.

The Employer admits, the record reflects, and I find it has been, and is, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The parties agree, the record reflects, and I find that Local 262, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) (Local 262) has been, at all times, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] The parties completed presentation of evidence on 19 February, but the hearing was adjourned for administrative purposes. The hearing was closed by my written order issued 3 March 1986.

[2] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise stated.

[3] The complaint contains no allegation that the Employer engaged in conduct independently violative of Sec. 8(a)(1).

[4] All witnesses, except Warren and Robert Mendelsohn, the Employer's general sales manager, were sequestered. I perceive no critical credibility conflicts between Warren and Mendelsohn, although each presented extensive testimony as a witness for opposing parties.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background[5]

Warren was hired as an account executive in the Employer's sales department on 4 September 1984.[6] At that time, the salespeople were represented by Local 262 for collective-bargaining purposes. The Employer and Local 262 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement, which became effective in May 1982. The termination date of the agreement was 17 March. The bargaining unit consisted of all nonsupervisory WBCN employees, including the salespeople.

Warren and Marc Woolf both became salespeople in September 1984. Seven other individuals were then employed as salespeople. They are Stephen Berger, Judy Carlough, Tracie Christmas, Jeff Messerman, O'Connell, Helene Wexler, and Scott Zeien.

In September 1984 the Employer's relevant supervisory hierarchy at WBCN consisted of Tony Berardini, general manager, and Mendelsohn. Mendelsohn was the immediate supervisor of the salespeople. In May, Berger, Carlough, and Messerman became supervisors.

The effective date of Berger's and Carlough's supervisory status is important. In part, the General Counsel's prima facie case relies on the knowledge possessed by Berger and Carlough of Warren's protected activity and on their purported hostility toward her. I find that Berger and Carlough became supervisors on 10 May. Berardini issued a memorandum to that effect to the Employer's staff on that date (G.C. Exh. 8). Berger testified Mendelsohn advised him of the promotion a day or two before Berardini's memorandum was issued. The record shows, also, Berger and Carlough attended and participated in management meetings immediately after announcement of their appointments as supervisors. All relevant evidence regarding the promotion date is undisputed.

Berger, Carlough, and Wexler advocated changes in the sales department for years before the 1985 contract negotiations. A principal objective was the creation of management positions. Another was to disseminate some of the Employer's confidential financial information among the salespeople. Removal of salespeople from the Union was urged by Berger and Carlough to accomplish these goals. These objectives were discussed among the salespeople during prenegotiation meetings conducted on 7 and 11 January. Warren openly opposed the objectives. These matters also were discussed during meetings conducted among all bargaining unit employees on 8 and 17 January.[7]

The Employer and Local 262 engaged in negotiations between the third week of February and 15 March. On the latter date, Mel Karmazin, president of WBCN's parent company, met with all employees. Berardini and Mendelsohn were present. This meeting preceded the collective-bargaining session of that date.

Later, on 15 March, the Employer and Local 262 reached tentative accord on terms of a new collective-bargaining agreement. Thereafter, Local 262 conducted a ratification meeting among its membership. Warren said she was expressly opposed to the contract. She was the only person who voted against ratification. The contract was ratified by membership vote 2 or 3 days later. The new contract is effective 17 April through 17 March 1988.

On 15 May, Mendelsohn discharged Warren. She has not worked for the Employer since that date. The Employer admits its refusal to reinstate Warren at all times after her discharge.

B. The Instant Dispute

1. Warren's employment and termination

The operative facts are substantially undisputed.[8] Revenues derived from sale of advertising comprise the Employer's principal income source. The salespeople are responsible for selling advertising, servicing advertisers, and collection of accounts. Salespeople are compensated on a commission basis. When Warren was first employed, the salespeople's commission rate was established in the 1982–1985 collective-bargaining agreemen..

Salespeople develop their workload in two ways: (1) assignment of particular accounts by the Employer's management; and (2) acquisition of accounts as "new business" by personal solicitation. Two methods generally result in new business. In one, salespeople use personal initiative to identify and solicit potential advertisers. In the second method, salespeople nurture the interest of new advertisers by following up on inquiries regarding advertising made by the potential customer. This second method is known as "call-ins."

Warren applied for her position with the Employer in late summer 1984. At that time, she had at least 2-1/2 years' experience as a radio advertising account executive. Mendelsohn interviewed Warren three times. They discussed a variety of matters relevant to the functions and expectations of salespeople. Mendelsohn told Warren salespeople needed to maintain sales levels and relationships with existing accounts and to develop new business. Mendelsohn said that Warren's emphasis should be to attract and retain stable and established businesses. Warren told Mendelsohn she had prior experience servicing concert accounts. Specifically, Warren named two such major accounts: Tea Party (also called Don Law) and Gemini Concerts. Warren said she thought her experience with those accounts would be useful to WBCN. She asked Mendelsohn to assign those accounts to her.

During Warren's third interview, she and Mendelsohn discussed Local 262. Mendelsohn said, "Oh, by the way, did I tell you about the Union?" Warren answered that she had been on strike, but reluctantly, at one of the radio stations of previous employment. Warren said she did not want to be on strike. Mendelsohn responded it was "as though there were no union" at WBCN; that everything was "very amicable"; and that "the only thing that the Union did was lock in your commission rates and that it also prohibited management from having house accounts."[9] Warren said this assurance from Mendelsohn was "very acceptable" to her.

[6] Hereafter, account executives will be called salespeople.

[7] Details of the union meetings will be reported below.

[8] Not every bit of evidence, or argument of counsel, is described. However, each has been considered. Omitted material is deemed irrelevant, superfluous, or of little significant probative worth. Unless otherwise stated, events and conversations reported by me are unrefuted, admitted, or corroborated by opposing witnesses or documentary evidence.

Mendelsohn assigned a group of accounts to Warren when she assumed her position as a salesperson. Tea Party Concerts was among those accounts. That account represented the largest sum of advertising revenue among those assigned to Warren.

Neil Jacobsen is and, at all material times, has been employed by Don Law. He is responsible for all the advertising placed for Tea Party. Jacobsen resisted Warren's assignment to the Tea Party account. Salesperson Wexler formerly serviced that account. Jacobsen told Mendelsohn he was satisfied with Wexler's performance and did not want a new salesperson assigned to him. Mendelsohn prevailed on Jacobsen to accept Warren as the Tea Party representative. Jacobsen agreed.

Jacobsen was consistently unhappy with the way Warren serviced his account. Jacobsen testified that "fairly soon" after Warren took charge of his account, he felt she was not going to work out. Specifically, Jacobsen reported to Mendelsohn that Warren failed to play advertising commercials for his review before they were played on the air. He also told Mendelsohn Warren had not reserved advertising space as Wexler had done.

Mendelsohn received adverse comments from salespeople Wexler and Christmas about Warren's personal appearance in late September or October 1984. Each complained that Warren was not dressing professionally. Wexler personally advised Warren her appearance was the subject of discussion among other employees. Wexler suggested Warren improve her appearance on the job and offered to assist Warren in selecting appropriate clothing. Wexler reported her conversation with Warren to Mendelsohn. Mendelsohn did not personally confront Warren concerning her appearance, although he claimed, in testimony, he was not pleased with it. Mendelsohn claimed he was satisfied that Wexler had addressed the subject with Warren. The discussion between Wexler and Mendelsohn occurred in October or November 1984.

In mid to late December 1984, Jacobsen told Mendelsohn that he would not renegotiate the Tea Party contract in Warren's presence. In the past, WBCN's salesperson designated to service the Tea Party account participated in the annual rate-setting negotiations for an advertising contract in the ensuing year. In fact, the 1984 negotiations took place in December only among Jacobsen, Mendelsohn, and Don Law, the owner of the Tea Party account.

Mendelsohn conferred with Warren on the day following the Tea Party negotiations. He told Warren that Don Law and Jacobsen were not pleased with how she serviced their account. Mendelsohn told Warren to do whatever necessary to improve her relationship with Jacobsen and the Tea Party account. Warren said that she would try to do so.

During the first week of January, Mendelsohn again conferred with Warren. He told her that he was dissatisfied with the amount of new business she had generated. Advertising rates quoted by salespeople to new clients regularly were reviewed by Mendelsohn. By the end of 1984, Mendelsohn concluded that Warren was not aggressively pursuing new business. His conclusion was derived from the dearth of requests from Warren for Mendelsohn to review quoted advertising rates. After their discussion, Warren apparently made lists of certain prospective clients. Warren personally called on several business establishments in the suggested areas of new business, but was unable to bring any of them into the station as new accounts.

Also, in early January, Warren gave her sales projection for the first quarter of 1985 to Mendelsohn. They reviewed these projections together. He told Warren the dollar amounts were disappointing. Mendelsohn also said that the sources from which she anticipated revenue were not the most remunerative.

On 18 January Mendelsohn discussed sales performance with Warren. He said he was concerned about her sales performance on a project known as "expo." Salespeople were responsible for selling booth space. Mendelsohn told Warren he expected her to sell more than only two booths.

Warren raised Local 262 during the 18 January conversation. Warren told Mendelsohn she found "the whole union procedure very distracting."[10] Mendelsohn gave no suggestions. He merely told Warren he did not want those distractions to interfere with Warren's performance of her job.

On approximately 30 January, Mendelsohn and Jacobsen met. Jacobsen requested the meeting. He again told Mendelson he was unhappy with the way Warren serviced his account. Jacobsen reiterated earlier objections to how Warren handled the account. Mendelsohn agreed that Jacobsen's complaints were valid. He said they would be relayed to Warren. Mendelsohn told Jacobsen, however, that he believed that Warren yet could satisfy Jacobsen's requirements with more effort on Warren's part.

Later, on 30 January, Mendelsohn met with Warren. He told Warren that Jacobsen was still complaining about how she handled the Tea Party account. Warren told Mendelsohn she believed she was complying precisely with Jacobsen's requests, and could not understand why Jacobsen was still not content. Mendelsohn said it was her job to assuage a client's perception. Mendelsohn said he was concerned when a major account perceived inadequacies in service. Warren said she believed she was already doing everything she could to keep Jacobsen's account happy.

In early March, Berardini asked Mendelsohn to investigate the reasons for a shortfall in achieving the sales department revenue projections for the first calendar quarter in 1985. Mendelsohn compared actual sales to the projected sales of each of the Employer's salespeople, except Christmas.[11]

Mendelsohn's analysis revealed unexpected deficiencies in the amount of business actually generated. To offset these deficiencies, most salespeople showed unanticipated increases in advertising among existing accounts or acquired unexpected new business that had not been projected (R. Exhs. 10(a)–(f)). Mendelsohn then factored in his personal knowledge of the reasons certain of the projections were deficient.

Mendelsohn's comparison of Warren's first quarter projections to actual sales for the period led him to conclude that there existed more disappointing, than positive, statistics. Specifically, Mendelsohn observed the sources of new business developed by Warren were (1) from the less preferable, "life-style" business; (2) derived mostly from call-ins, previous accounts of the Employer, or leads developed by individuals other than Warren; and (3) of low volume.

Mendelsohn combined these observations and conclusions together with his knowledge of Warren's overall sales level throughout her employment as a salesperson with WBCN (R. Exhs. 2 and 3). He concluded Warren was not succeeding as a salesperson. Mendelsohn ascribed this conclusion to the following factors: (a) overall sales; (b) lack of new business; (c) unable to satisfy existing clients; (d) inability to get along with other salespeople; and (e) continued unprofessional appearance.[12]

The General Counsel challenges Mendelsohn's method of evaluating Warren's performance. Specifically, the General Counsel contends comparing Warren's projected sales to her total sales is only one possible measure of her performance and should "not be a valid basis" of judging her. I have assessed the various reasons propounded by the General Counsel to support the quoted assertion (G.C. Br. 21–32). Those reasons are numerous and varied. To enumerate each in this decision would serve no useful purpose. It would unduly lengthen this decision. It suffices that I conclude, in combination, the General Counsel's contentions concededly create suspicious circumstances. However, I find them unpersuasive when viewed in the totality of relevant circumstances.

Some of the General Counsel's contentions complain that Warren inappropriately was held to standards that are inapplicable to her. Such arguments are not impressive. They improperly seek to substitute the personal judgments of the trier of fact for those managerial judgments exercised by WBCN supervision. In this connection, I have considered the General Counsel's arguments that Warren's sales statistics and laudatory comments from certain accounts, compiled and received after Mendelsohn conducted his March evaluations, "may well have changed his judgments." I acknowledge that these events are complimentary to Warren. Conceivably, if a review of Warren's work occurred in May, the decision to discharge her (which I shall find was actually made in March) could have been reversed. But the failure to reevaluate the situation, at best, can be said to be unreasonable.

Unreasonableness, in the instant context, I find cannot be equated with unlawfulness. I recognize that there may be circumstances in which an employer's failure to consider an employee's job performance until the very moment of discharge casts suspicion on the employer's motivation. I have earlier noted that there is no contention the Employer engaged in any conduct independently violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In the absence of proven direct evidence of unlawful motivation, I am unable to use whatever suspicious circumstances exist as a basis for either making an inference that Mendelsohn's analysis and conclusions are a sham; evidence of unlawful motivation; or that the Employer's stated reasons for Warren's discharge are pretextual. Suspicions, alone, "cannot serve as a basis for finding a violation." See Mason & Hanger-Silas Mason Co., 270 NLRB 383, 385 and cases cited at fn. 7 (1984).

Mendelsohn testified that he decided to discharge Warren. He asserted his decision was based on the five factors described above. I find it unnecessary to analyze the validity of each reason attributed by the Employer to warrant discharge. That task would be required only to establish whether the Employer satisfied its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). I shall find, below, that the preponderance of evidence is insufficient to establish the requisite prima facie case. Accordingly, the Employer is relieved from showing it would have discharged Warren even absent her having engaged in protected activity.[13]

The Employer claims (as noted above) Mendelsohn's decision to discharge Warren was made in March. The General Counsel contends the discharge decision was made on or about 14 May, a few days after Berger and Carlough became supervisors. The Employer asserts the decision was independently made by Mendelsohn. The General Counsel also contends Berger and Carlough, as supervisors, were instrumental in the discharge decision.

Resolution of the date on which the Employer decided to discharge Warren is, perhaps, the most critical and seminal issue in this case. A conclusion in favor of the General Counsel's position would provide a substantial, legitimate base for an inference that Warren's discharge was unlawfully motivated. This is so because I conclude, in agreement with the General Counsel, that the evidence shows that Berger, at least, harbored animosity toward Warren because (as will be described below) she opposed the separation of salespeople from Local 262. I find Warren's opposition might have, but did not, prejudice Berger's and Carlough's promotional opportunities. This latter finding tends to support the General Counsel's position.

[11] I accept Mendelsohn's uncontradicted assertion that Christmas was omitted because her retention as a salesperson was part of a continuing obligation of the Employer to maintain certain minority composition on its professional staff.

[12] The Employer adduced evidence purporting to show Warren exhibited an inability to get along with other salespeople and neglected to enhance her professional appearance. I shall not evaluate this evidence because I consider it not critical to the disposition of this case.

[13] By finding the evidence does not establish a prima facie case, I do not mean to convey there is any validity to the Employer's contention that Warren was less than a satisfactory worker.

A determination consistent with the Employer's contentions renders impotent the argument that Warren's protected activities were connected with, or a consideration in, the discharge decision.

I conclude the decision to terminate Warren's employment was made in March by Mendelsohn. I find it was based on his perception and judgment of Warren as a salesperson. The following bases exist for this result.

a. Documentary evidence supports a finding that the discharge decision was made in March

At approximately the time Mendelsohn reviewed sales projections against actual sales, he also was asked by Berardini to prepare various configurations for the sales department that would reflect the potential agreements that might emanate from the collective-bargaining negotiations then in progress.

Mendelsohn complied. He submitted a draft of such alternatives to Berardini in mid-March. Mendelsohn's proposal is entitled "Sales Department Scenarios for 4/1/85" (Exh. 9). It included three alternatives. Each alternative explicitly included language that encompasses a decision to terminate Warren. Thus, Mendelsohn's mid-March memorandum explicitly contains the phrase "replace Leslie Warren" in the first alternative; and the phrase "replace Leslie, as above" in the second and third alternatives.

A second document, generated later, bears the same import, namely, that the Employer had decided to operate without Warren's services. Mendelsohn prepared this memorandum (R. Exh. 14) after the 1985–1988 collective-bargaining agreement was ratified by the membership of Local 262. This memorandum, dated 29 April, is entitled "Restructuring of Sales Department." This document reflects the earlier decision to operate without Warren on its last page. There, Mendelsohn listed each of the salespeople who would be employed in the restructured department. Warren's name was not listed. Instead, the document contains the letters A, B, and C. These letters indicate it was Mendelsohn's intention to add three, yet unknown, salespeople to the staff.

b. Mendelsohn's deferral of Warren's discharge is logical

The General Counsel strongly urges the delay of Warren's discharge until 15 May makes it unlikely the decision was made in March. However, Mendelsohn's testimony reflects his decision was made before the Employer and Local 262 had concluded their negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement. Mendelsohn claimed he deferred implementation of Warren's discharge because the new commission rates were still unresolved in negotiations and any replacement for Warren would need to be informed of the new rate of hire. I find Mendelsohn's explanation reasonable. It is consistent both with the cessation of negotiations and the Employer's efforts to develop structural changes in the sales department through Mendelsohn's memoranda.

There is no evidence Warren was such a disruptive force in the Employer's operations as to raise the expectation her discharge should have been effectuated concurrent with the decision to take that action. Indeed, the uncertanties of the collective-bargaining results, I conclude, militate in favor of delaying implementation of Mendelsohn's discharge decision until new commission rates were established and a final revised configuration of the sales staff was adopted.

c. The timing of preemployment interviews of individuals for positions as salespeople tends to confirm the Employer's contention that the decision to terminate Warren was made before Berger and Carlough became supervisors

Mendelsohn testified, without contradiction, that three persons were interviewed before 10 May for salesperson positions. He explicitly identified each by name. That three individuals were interviewed is significant. That number exactly corresponds to the potential individuals identified in Mendelsohn's 29 April memorandum as A, B, and C (R. Exh. 14). Undisputedly, the interviews occurred before the dates Berger and Carlough were advised they were promoted to their managerial positions and before those promotions were announced to the other salespeople. I conclude that these interviews, coupled with the omission of Warren's name in Mendelsohn's second reconfiguration memorandum, support the conclusion that the decision to terminate Warren's services preceded the promotion of Berger and Carlough.[14]

Mendelsohn's proposal for restructuring the sales department became operational during the first week in May. The 10 May promotions of Berger and Carlough to supervisory positions resulted from those revisions.

On 14 May, Mendelsohn, Berger, and Carlough together met with each sales person. They met with Warren that day. She was the last salesperson scheduled. Mendelsohn outlined the structural revisions, advised Warren of new commission rates and that all salespeople would be assigned either to Berger or Carlough, but the specific supervisory assignments were still uncertain. Mendelsohn told Warren she could continue to deal directly with him in the interim. The meeting lasted only approximately 5 minutes. There is no evidence Warren said anything significant to the litigated issues.

Later, on 14 May, Mendelsohn met with Berger and Carlough. Mendelsohn told them that Warren would be terminated. They asked when Mendelsohn planned to take that action. He said he intended to discharge Warren when he had replacements. Berger and Carlough told Mendelsohn the delay was cruel and unfair to Warren. They urged Warren's immediate termination. Mendelsohn said he had deferred telling Warren of his termination decision to avoid a gap between the termination and hiring of replacement personnel to represent the Employer's accounts. Berger and Carlough offered to be responsible for Warren's accounts until replacements could be hired.

On 15 May, Mendelsohn conferred with Warren. Mendelsohn discharged Warren on this occasion. Each of them testified as to what was said during this conference. I found each of them forthright, candid, and spontaneous. They gave consistent versions of events when testifying regarding identical subject matter. Warren's testimony was more comprehensive. Accordingly, my factual findings concerning the 15 May conversation track Warren's account.

Mendelsohn began the 15 May conversation. He told Warren "I'm afraid the news isn't good. I'm going to have to ask you to leave." Warren asked, "You're firing me?." Mendelsohn answered, "I'm afraid so."

Warren told Mendelsohn she thought this was a sudden move. She asked whether she would get any warnings. Mendelsohn said "No." Warren remarked she did not understand the reason for Mendelsohn's action. He said that he did not believe Warren would fit into the new system. Warren noted that the system was in effect for only 1 day and they had not yet given it a chance. Mendelsohn said the decision had been made the previous evening during a meeting attended by Berardini, Berger, and Carlough.

Warren testified that Mendelsohn "was trying to be nice about" discharging her. In this connection, Mendelsohn related how he had been terminated from a job several years earlier and "it wasn't the end of the world."

Warren asked whether her difficulties with the Tea Party (Don Law) account "had anything to do with " her discharge. Mendelsohn said "No, it didn't."

Finally, Warren and Mendelsohn discussed severance pay and recommendations that would be made to any of Warren's potential employers.

Warren's last day at work for WBCN was 15 May. Warren continued to receive commission payments for any orders placed by her and aired before 24 May.

2. Warren's protected activities

Union activity increased among the salespeople in January. They were anticipating the forthcoming collective-bargaining negotiations. One of the issues debated among the bargaining unit employees concerned what position Local 262 negotiators should take during negotiations regarding the inclusion of salespeople. This issue was inextricably connected to the objectives of creating management positions and obtaining the Employer's confidential financial information to which I have alluded in section II,A, above. The meetings at which this issue was raised, and Warren's participation, are summarized below.

7 January: The salespeople met among themselves, separate from other bargaining unit employees. They discussed the possibility of withdrawing from the bargaining unit. Warren said she did not agree the salespeople should leave the Union. A majority of the group voted in favor of asking the membership to permit the salespeople to withdraw from the Union. Warren abstained from voting.

8 January: The Union conducted a general membership meeting. The issue of withdrawal of the salespeople from the Union was among the matters discussed. Open debate ensued on that issue. Salespeople spoke for and against the proposal. A vote was taken by a show of hands. The proposal was defeated. Warren abstained.

11 January: The salespeople met among themselves. They discussed whether to ask the Union's general membership to reconsider the issue of salespeople's withdrawal from the Union. Warren credibly testified that Berger and Carlough said they were unhappy with the results of the 8 January union meeting. Other salespeople orally agreed.

Warren (in her words) "repeated . . . [her] . . . opinion" (Tr. 121). The salespeople voted to request the union membership to permit them to present their withdrawal proposal at another general membership meeting scheduled for 17 January. Warren abstained from voting on 11 January.

17 January: The Union conducted another general membership meeting. The salespeoples' withdrawal proposal was discussed. Berger presented prepared specific arguments to support the withdrawal. He fielded questions.

Warren addressed the withdrawal issue.[15] Warren said she agreed with the employees who said they were opposed to the withdrawal proposal. (That opposition was expressed basically by unit employees who were not salespeople.) Warren declared it was she, among the salespeople, who abstained from voting on the issue. She asked for the 17 January vote to be cast by secret ballot. The withdrawal proposal was again rejected.

Berger spoke with Warren two or three times between 8 and 17 January regarding the withdrawal proposal. He tried to convince Warren that withdrawal from the Union would benefit the salespeople. During these conversations, Warren questioned and opposed Berger's viewpoint. These conversations generally occurred in Warren's work area approximately between 5:30 to 6 p.m. Occasionally, those discussions progressed in a loud tone of voice.

Mendelsohn and Berardini regularly met in Berardini's office at times that coincided with the Berger-Warren discussions. Berardini's desk was located about 2 feet from Warren's desk. However, an 8-foot-high wall approximately 6 inches thick separated them. The wall did not reach from floor to ceiling. About 2 to 3 feet of open space existed between the wall's top and the ceiling.

Carlough testified, that she heard Berger and Warren engaged in the 8 to 17 January conversations. Carlough was at her desk, about 12 to 15 feet from Warren's desk, at those times. Carlough, however, claimed only that she heard Berger and Warren talking in loud voices. She said she was "not aware of the exact conversation" (Tr. 713).

Mendelsohn unequivocally denied he knew of Warren's position on the withdrawal issue at times critical to establishing Employer knowledge of her protected activity. Warren testified she could hear voices from Berar-

[15] The General Counsel claims the record does not clearly show whether Warren spoke during the meeting of 8 or 17 January. I find she did so on 17 January.

Warren's recollection of the occasions on which certain events occurred was not as specific as other witnesses'. For example, the Employer's Traffic Director Hahesy (a unit employee) was more comprehensive and sure about what took place on 17 January.

I accept Hahesy's recollection that Warren spoke at that meeting. Hahesy's account is consistent with that part of Warren's testimony that Warren asked that the 17 January vote be conducted by secret ballot.

dini's office when voices were raised. There is no evidence the precise words were discernible.[16]

15 March: The Employer conducted a general meeting among the employees. Mel Karmazin, the Employer's president, addressed the attendees. Mendelsohn and Berardini were present.

There was some discussion regarding the proposition of salespeople being removed from the Union. (The Employer had proposed, during collective-bargaining negotiations then pending, that salespeople be eliminated from the bargaining unit. When Karmazin spoke, the Union already had rejected that proposal. The rejection, presumably, was pursuant to the 17 January general membership vote.) Karmazin gave his reasons in support of the Employer's proposal. Warren expressed an opposite view. She said she believed that Karmazin's goals could be achieved even if the salespeople were involved in a union contract.

Later on 15 March, the Employer and Union held a negotiating session. Union negotiating committee members Carlough and Wexler proposed creation of new sales department management positions. The Employer agreed. Further, the parties agreed the new positions would be funded by house accounts. This agreement effectively removed the prohibition against house accounts. Also, the parties agreed to modify the contract's economic terms for salespeople. Specifically, the Union agreed to the Employer's proposal that salespeoples' commission rates no longer be established in the collective-bargaining agreement.

Thereafter, the Union conducted a meeting for ratification of the new collective-bargaining agreement. Warren vigorously objected to ratification. She said she was surprised that the union negotiators agreed to the above-mentioned terms. Warren expressed disbelief that the contract contained nothing regarding sales commissions "except that it's up to somebody." Warren also said she thought it was dangerous for the salespeople to "open up house accounts as a means of compensation for managers." (Tr. 133.) The ratification vote was taken by raise of hands. Warren was the only unit employee to vote against ratification.

I find that the preceding discussion regarding Warren's activities provides ample evidence that she was engaged in protected union activities between 7 January and 15 March; and that activity was open, notorious, and reasonably could not have escaped Mendelsohn's attention before he decided to discharge Warren.[17]

3. Analysis

The General Counsel must prove the Employer was motivated by unlawful considerations in its discharge of Warren. Discriminatory motivation is a critical element and essential ingredient of a prima facie case. WMUR-TV Co., 253 NLRB 697, 703 (1980).

I have stated above, in various places, that the evidence is viewed in a light most favorable to the General Counsel, for analysis purposes. I conclude the preponderance of evidence does not sustain a finding that Warren's discharge was discriminatorily motivated, even when all critical questionable areas are resolved consistent with the General Counsel's arguments and contentions.[18]

Concededly, there are two factors that militate in favor of finding Warren's discharge was motivated by discriminatory considerations. Those factors are

1. Mendelsohn's denial to Warren during her 15 May termination interview that her handling of the Don Law account was a factor in the discharge contradicts the vast evidence adduced by the Employer designed to show that Warren failed in her responsibility to service that account; and

2. The discharge appears to be precipitous because it occurred without warning only 1 day after new rates and supervisory changes were discussed by Mendelsohn with Warren.

In other circumstances, these elements would be strong and persuasive factors on which I would make an inference that discriminatory reasons caused Warren's discharge. However, in the entire context of the instant case, I conclude the above factors present only suspicious conditions. They do not convincingly support an inference adverse to the Employer because they are rebutted by the more direct and tangible evidence, which demonstrates Mendelsohn made the discharge decision in March. I find Mendelsohn's deferral of implementing his decision supported by extrinsic events; the need to settle new contract terms with Local 262 and to develop revisions of the Employer's sales department.

I find Mendelsohn's failure expressly to warn Warren her job was in jeopardy, and to engage her in a review of the department's revisions a day before the discharge, fully plausible as consistent with his overall demeanor.

The General Counsel characterizes Mendelsohn as possessing and exhibiting a "nonconfrontational personality." I agree with this description. Mendelsohn was soft-spoken, mild-mannered, and of moderate temperament during his lengthy testimony at the instant hearing. The record reflects Mendelsohn transmitted these traits to his managerial style. For example, Mendelsohn personally avoided criticism of Warren's appearance at work. Apparently, Mendelsohn was content that Wexler had raised that issue with Warren.

I find, contrary to the General Counsel's contention, that Mendelsohn's personality is consistent with deferral of Warren's discharge beyond the date of decision and [16] There is no direct evidence to show either Berardini or Mendelsohn became aware of Warren's activity or her position as a result of these conversations between her and Berger. Nonetheless, for purposes of assessing the nature of a prima facie case, I shall assume that the Employer knew of Warren's activity at least as early as 17 January.

[17] Also, for analysis purposes, I find the record shows Warren's views on exclusion of salespeople from the Union were firmly opposite from those shared by Berger and Carlough. They were similarly inconsistent with the views expressed by the Employer's president.

[18] I find all other elements of a prima facie case have been proved by at least the evidence indicated below

(a) Protected activity: Warren's conduct regarding withdrawal of salespeople from the Union;

(b) Employer knowledge: By inference derived from the notorious character of Warren's activity and directly from her 15 March challenge to Karmazin;

(c) Unlawful effect of discharge: Warren's discharge signaled to others their employment might be in jeopardy unless they remained, or wanted to remain, in the Union.

also accounts for his 14 May failure to advise Warren of the decision.[19]

Mendelsohn's character, personality, and demeanor make it reasonable to expect he would have denied the discharge was related to how Warren serviced the Don Law account. Warren's question, which elicited that response from Mendelsohn, was asked after Mendelsohn told Warren she was being fired.[20] Clearly, a negative answer to Warren's question was less likely to induce controversy than giving an answer that would raise the spectre of factual disagreement. In view of Mendelsohn's undisputed character, I find his denial that Don Law was involved in the discharge a remark reasonably anticipated. In the total scenario of events, that denial bears no sinister import.

In making my conclusions I am mindful that, on 15 May, Mendelsohn told Warren the discharge decision had been made the previous night. I consider that remark, also, one which is readily anticipated to come from Mendelsohn. In all the instant circumstances, I conclude this statement is another way Mendelsohn avoided controversy. To ascribe the decision to the previous evening establishes an implied explanation for including Warren in his 14 May review of the new sales commissions and system. The record as a whole does not warrant me to find, from Mendelsohn's false statement about when the discharge decision was made, either that Mendelsohn is generally not credible or that he admitted he had not decided to terminate Warren until 14 May.

On the foregoing, I am unwilling, and virtually unable, to infer the existence of unlawful motivation from either of the two best factors presently under discussion.[21]

I find the following additional evidence and arguments relevant to the element of discriminatory motivation noteworthy. But, I find each unpersuasive.

(a) The General Counsel contends that Berger and Carlough disliked Warren, and their animosity may be imputed to the Employer. Unquestionably, Berger and Carlough were in the forefront of the effort to withdraw the salespeople from the Union. Considerable evidence was adduced to show that their attitude toward Warren changed after she expressed her opposition to withdrawal from the Union. I need not decide either the nature of Berger's and Carlough's attitude changes (if any) or whether their attitudes can be imputed to the Employer.

However, even assuming Berger and Carlough harbored actionable animus toward Warren, I find it improper to transmit their hostility and animus to the Employer. This is so because the evidence clearly shows the decision to discharge Warren was made long before Berger and Carlough became supervisors. I conclude neither of them had any effective input on the discharge decision. I simply find neither of them was involved in the decision to terminate Warren.[22]

(b) The General Counsel claims that the Employer's failure to warn Warren that her job performance jeopardized her employment is evidence of unlawful motivation. In other circumstances, this would be true. In the present circumstances, I find this argument contrary to the facts. I concede there is no evidence that Warren received explicit warnings that she might be discharged. However, the undisputed evidence shows that Mendelsohn counseled Warren on various occasions (enumerated above in section II,B(1)) as early as December 1984. Those discussions involved, among other things, Mendelsohn's expressions of disappointment with Warren's revenue production and ways and means by which she could improve it. Income production is a salesperson's principal objective. In my view, explicit criticism of results regarding that objective bears the implication that the producer's tenure is tenuous unless there is improvement in production.

(c) The General Counsel asserts that Warren was treated in a disparate manner, and that treatment is evidence of unlawful motivation. I conclude the evidence does not show Warren was subjected to the claimed disparate treatment. The claim is based on a comparison of Warren's performance to that of salesperson Christmas.

In fact, a comparison of the total sales of Warren and Christmas between October 1984 through April 1985 shows that Warren outsold Christmas by an average of approximately $8000 per month. Nonetheless, I find no merit to the claim of disparate treatment.

Two reasons exist for my conclusion. First, I have noted earlier in this decision that Christmas was maintained by the Employer on its sales staff to achieve and maintain compliance with requirements for minority employment. Mendelsohn excluded Christmas' production from the performance evaluations that Berardini required him to make in early 1985. I credit Mendelsohn's testimony this omission reflected Christmas' special status. In any event, Warren was a considerably more experienced salesperson than Christmas. It is reasonable that the Employer would have expected her to produce more than she did.

Second, I find a more appropriate comparison of sales statistics would be to compare the production between Warren and Woolf. As earlier stated, both of them began their sales careers with the instant Employer in September 1984. Woolf essentially worked from September through December 1984.[23] Woolf's total sales during the [19] I reject the General Counsel's argument that the decision was tentative until 14 May. Mendelsohn's personality does not necessarily affect his ability to make aggressive, prompt decisions (R. Exh. 9), where Mendelsohn unequivocally definitively recommended, three times, that Warren be replaced.

[20] Mendelsohn's personality was evident in the language used to inform Warren of the discharge. He only said he was asking "her to leave"; and, even when Warren asked whether "You're firing me?", Mendelsohn characteristically answered, "I'm afraid so."

[21] I have considered the absence of any allegation or evidence of an independent 8(a)(1) violation in making this conclusion.

[22] I need not deal with the General Counsel's alternate theory (expounded in his posthearing brief) that Berger's and Carlough's hostility prompted them to urge Mendelsohn, on 14 May, to terminate Warren immediately and thus the discharge was accelerated by their hostility at a time when they were clearly supervisors. In the absence of direct evidence of unlawful motivation or independent 8(a)(1) activity, and in all the instant circumstances, I find the request for immediate termination a sincere and legitimate benevolent expression.

[23] Based on the Employer's records (R. Exh. 3), I presume Woolf worked very little in January 1985. There is no evidence to show the circumstances of Woolf's departure.

last calendar quarter of 1984 exceeded Warren's by $3000. Interestingly, Christmas' last quarter, 1984, sales exceeded Warren's by $77,303 (R. Exh. 2). These statistics negate the validity of the contention that Warren was treated in a disparate manner.

I find, based on the foregoing analysis, that the record contains insufficient evidence on which to conclude there exists a prima facie case of discrimination against Warren.[24]

[24] As earlier stated, this conclusion renders it unnecessary to decide whether the evidence shows that the Employer satisfied its burden of persuasion under Wright Line, supra.

On the above findings of facts, and on the entire record in the case, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Hemisphere Broadcasting Corporation (WBCN) is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Employer has not committed any of the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

Pacemaker Driver Service, Inc., Carrier Corporation, Carrier Trucking Service and Robert C. Barnes, Teamsters Local Union No. 519, AFL-CIO.[1] Case 10-CA-16850

July 29, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 20, 1987, Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached supplemental decision.[2] The Respondent Carrier and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and Carrier filed a reply brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions as modified, and to adopt the Supplemental Order as modified.

We agree with the judge, for the reasons set forth in his decision, that Carrier is not obligated to reopen its Knoxville domicile because it has shown that it would have closed the domicile for legitimate business reasons at a time subsequent to the unlawful closing on March 31, 1981. Contrary to the judge, however, we find that Carrier is not obligated to offer reinstatement to the four discriminatees and that Carrier's backpay liability to these individuals was tolled as of February 10, 1985.[4]

In finding that Carrier was under a continuing obligation to offer reinstatement to the four discriminatees, the judge found that Carrier had failed to establish that it had a policy of terminating employees when a truck domicile closed. Specifically, the judge found that Carrier failed to show that its current drivers had not been transferred from one of its closed domiciles. We find, contrary to the judge, that in the circumstances of this case Carrier has successfully met its burden of proof showing that the discriminatees would have been terminated for economic reasons.

According to facts set forth in the underlying Board decision, Carrier is operated as an in-house transportation service, leasing both the trucks and drivers. Although Carrier at one time utilized its own employee-drivers, in 1977 it contracted with Pacemaker Driver Service, Inc. (Pacemaker) to provide drivers for a number of its domiciles, including Knoxville. At the time of the events in question, the four Knoxville drivers were leased from Pacemaker.

Carrier's testimony at the backpay hearing, as set forth in the judge's decision, shows that Carrier did not normally relocate drivers when it eliminated or redomiciled equipment; rather, the driver-leasing company generally reassigned them to another account.[5] Carrier also presented evidence that since March 1981 it permanently has reduced the fleet of trucks necessary for its operations.

We find that this testimony, when viewed in the context of Carrier's practice of using drivers who are leased from and employed by another company, demonstrates that Carrier has, in fact, no transfer policy.[6] In the absence of evidence of a transfer policy and in light of Carrier's reduction in its fleet of trucks, we find that Carrier has established that it would have terminated the Knoxville drivers in conjunction with a legitimate closing of the Knoxville domicile.[7] Accordingly, we find that Carrier is under no current obligation to offer reinstatement to the four discriminatees.

Carrier further contends that the discriminatees' backpay should be tolled as of the date their jobs would have been eliminated by a legitimate closing of the Knoxville domicile. It also contends that the judge erred in failing to find that the Knoxville domicile would have closed by November 1982 at the latest, with the expiration of the lease of the last truck domiciled in Knoxville. We find no merit to Carrier's contention that the Knoxville domicile would have been closed as early as November

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The original Decision and Order is reported at 269 NLRB 971 (1984). On July 30, 1985, the Sixth Circuit granted enforcement of the Board's Order, but limited backpay liability to Respondent Carrier Corporation, Carrier Trucking Service. 768 F.2d 778.

[3] The evidence shows that the Mansfield, Ohio domicile was closed on May 1, 1983, rather than May 1, 1985, as set forth in the judge's decision. We correct this inadvertent error.

[4] Member Johansen would adopt the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions regarding the reinstatement, backpay, and benefits of employees Gates, Ridley, Bales, and Donaldson.

[5] We note, in this regard, that the testimony of Pacemaker's manager, Joe Weisenburger, set forth by the judge, substantially corroborates the testimony of Carrier's manager, Henninger.

[6] Although Carrier and Pacemaker have been found to be joint employers of the discriminatees, we do not find that this relationship, by itself, necessarily establishes that Carrier is responsible for transferring leased Pacemaker drivers once Carrier has made a decision—in which Pacemaker played no part—to eliminate a certain domicile. Rather, we find that the evidence demonstrates that Carrier has no transfer policy and that it was Pacemaker's responsibility and practice to reassign its drivers located at a particular Carrier domicile in the event Carrier closed that domicile.

[7] Regarding the burden of proof on this issue, we find that it was initially incumbent on Carrier to produce evidence regarding its termination policy with respect to the leased Pacemaker drivers. Here Carrier presented evidence that it did not transfer the drivers in the event of a closing of a domicile. With the presentation of this evidence, the burden then shifted to the General Counsel to show that a transfer policy existed. We find that the General Counsel has not made this showing. Compare Boland Marine, 280 NLRB 454 (1986).

1982. We agree, however, that Carrier's backpay liability should be tolled as of the date the domicile would have closed for legitimate reasons, which we find is February 10, 1985.

The record fails to establish that the expiration of truck leases automatically resulted in Carrier's decision to close a domicile. Rather, and as argued by Carrier in its brief to the judge, the selection of the current domiciles was based on several factors, including the locale's capability of servicing Carrier's assembly and distribution program as well as the amount of less-than-truckload freight generated in a particular area. Although the judge found that these factors did not establish a certain date for the closing of the Knoxville domicile, he nevertheless found that they established that the Knoxville domicile would have been closed on or before February 10, 1985—the date on which Carrier closed its Springfield, Massachusetts domicile, the last of the domiciles which were adapted to Carrier's reorganized assembly and distribution programs.[8] In view of the uncertainty regarding the date of a legitimate closing of the Knoxville domicile, and because it is the Board's policy to construe any uncertainty against the wrongdoer, we find that the Knoxville domicile would have closed as of the latest of the possible dates, i.e., February 10, 1985. Accordingly, we shall toll the discriminatees' backpay as of that date.[9]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Carrier Corporation, Carrier Trucking Service, Knoxville, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall Make whole each of the employees named below by payment to them of backpay in the amounts set forth opposite their names, plus interest computed in the manner described in New Horizons for the Retarded,[10] and accrued to that date of payment, minus tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws:

Jonah C. Gates	$ 70,983
Hickman S. Ridley Jr.	59,012
Donnie Bales	26,710
David Donaldson	64,910

[8] The record shows that Carrier had operated 12 domiciles, not counting Knoxville, in March 1981. It opened an additional domicile in Springfield, Massachusetts, in November 1982. The judge found that the six domiciles still operating as of the date of the hearing (Indianapolis, Nashville, Memphis, Syracuse, Cleveland, and Atlanta) were selected to remain open because of "their unique ability" to handle the LTL shipments generated through Carrier's assembly and distribution programs. Between 1981 and 1985, Carrier had closed its domiciles in Fort Wayne, Indiana; Tyler, Texas; Cincinnati; Morrison, Tennessee; Detroit; and Mansfield, Ohio. As noted, the Springfield, Massachusetts domicile was opened in 1982 and closed on February 10, 1985.

[9] The judge recommended that the discriminatees be made whole in the amounts set forth in the attachment to his decision marked "Appendix," which represents backpay owed through December 1985. In light of our decision to toll backpay as of February 10, 1985, we shall direct Carrier to make the discriminatees whole in the amounts set forth in the "Appendix" through December 1984, and leave to further compliance proceedings the computation of any amounts due to the discriminatees for the period January 1 through February 10, 1985. We also make the following corrections to the backpay amounts owed through December 1984. For Jonah C. Gates, net backpay for the second quarter of 1981 is $8778, rather than $8497. For David Donaldson, the amount of interim earnings for the third and fourth quarters of 1982 in both instances is $2981, rather than $2891; the amount of net interim earnings for the fourth quarter of 1984 is $4187, rather than $3340; and net backpay for the fourth quarter of 1984 is $3340.

[10] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This is a proceeding for determination of backpay liability. On 30 March 1981, Respondent (CTS) and Pacemaker Driver Service, Inc. illegally discharged four employees at CTS' truck domicile in Knoxville, Tennessee. That action was found to violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) in an administrative law judge's decision that issued 12 October 1982, and by the National Labor Relations Board in a 13 April 1984 decision (269 NLRB 971).

On 30 July 1985 the Sixth United States Court of Appeals granted enforcement and directed CTS only (not Pacemaker) to comply with the Board Order. Carrier Corp. v. NLRB, 768 F.2d 778 (6th Cir. 1985).

As noted in the underlying decision, Carrier Corporation operates CTS as part of its corporate operations. Carrier Corporation is primarily engaged in the manufacture and sale of heating and air-conditioning units. CTS handles a portion of the total freight transportation needs of Carrier and Carrier's affiliated companies. CTS is headquarters in Knoxville, Tennessee.

On 30 March 1981, CTS operated 22 trucks from 12 cities. Two of those trucks, each with a crew of two drivers, operated out of Knoxville. On that date CTS illegally terminated four Knoxville drivers and removed the domicile of the two trucks from Knoxville to Cincinnati. Before that date Cincinnati was not the domicile of any of Respondent's 22 trucks. CTS did not own any of its trucks, all were leased.

Through the above-mentioned Board and court orders, CTS was directed to reinstate the four Knoxville drivers (Jonah C. Gates, Hickman S. Ridley Jr., Donnie Bales, and David Donaldson) with backpay and to reopen its Knoxville truck domicile.

CTS has not complied with the Board and court orders. Instead it disputes whether it is now obligated to reopen its Knoxville truck domicile or to reinstate the four discriminatees.

Before 30 March 1982 CTS operated what is known as a "truckload" private carrier operation. The term truckload indicates that there is one consignee and one consignor, and a truckload of goods is taken from a shipper to a designated location. A private carrier is an in-house carrier. One that works exclusively or almost exclusively, for a parent corporation that is generally engaged in an enterprise other than trucking.

Carrier operates CTS in order to move goods at a cost below the available cost of for-hire trucks. Until after March 1981, CTS found that it could operate most efficiently as "truckload" as opposed to "less than truckload" (LTL). LTL operations involve several consignees and/or consignors with several loads per truck. Truckload operations do not require extensive terminal facilities whereas LTL operations necessitate terminals with distribution facilities. CTS contends that because of a required change from being a TL (truckload) operation to becoming an LTL operation, it would have closed its Knoxville trucking operation after 30 March 1981 for reasons not protected by the NLRA. Additionally, CTS alleges that because it was not its practice to transfer drivers on closing its facilities, it would have legally terminated the four discriminatees when it legally closed its Knoxville facility. For that reason, Respondent argues, it no longer has a reinstatement obligation and its backpay obligation terminated on the date it would have legally removed the respective Knoxville trucks from Knoxville.

The court granted full enforcement to the Board Order, which included, inter alia, a requirement that CTS:

> Offer immediate and full reinstatement to its employees, Jonah C. Gates, Donnie Bales, David Donaldson, and Hickman S. Ridley, Jr., to their former positions of employment or, if those positions no longer are available, to substantially equivalent positions . . . .

The enforced Order requires that Respondent offer reinstatement to Gates, Bales, Donaldson, and Ridley absent a showing that neither their former positions nor any substantially equivalent positions exist.

The record shows that Respondent has not offered Gates, Bales, Ridley, or Donaldson reinstatement to their former positions or to substantially equivalent positions.[1]

Respondent, in a backpay proceeding, has the burden of demonstrating that unlawfully discharged employees would have been terminated for economic reasons. Midwest Hanger, 221 NLRB 911, 917 (1975).

In support of its position Respondent contends that it did not transfer drivers to another city when it closed a domicile. Respondent's evidence is found in the following testimony:

> Pacemaker's Manager Weisenburger testified:
> Q. What happened to the drivers at the location where the truck was eliminated?
> A. They usually were laid off. And we recruited—put new drivers on the new location. Normally . . . .
> Q. To your recollection, was there an instance where Carrier transported employees from one location to another as a result of redomiciling of trucks?
> A. I don't believe so.
> Respondent's manager Henninger testified:
> Q. In the process of trimming the fleet, what happened to the drivers whose trucks were eliminated from the system in the process?
> A. Their respected employer or driver leasing company would generally assign them to another account.

I find that the above testimony does not establish a policy of Respondent terminating drivers when a tractor was redomiciled. That testimony shows only that drivers were usually reassigned by the truck lessor.

As held by the Board in Boland Marine, 280 NLRB 454 (1986), in which evidence of Respondent's practice is "peculiarily in the possesssion of and available to Respondent," the burden falls to Respondent to prove by convincing evidence that the discriminatees would have been terminated at a subsequent date for legitimate business reasons. Respondent currently employs about 25 to 26 drivers using 13 tractors. The record does not show that those drivers were transferred to their current domicile from one of Respondent's closed domiciles. It is not the General Counsel's burden to show that he discriminatees would have been permitted to transfer to one of the six current domiciles when Knoxville closed. Respondent failed to show that any of its current drivers have not previously transferred from another domicile.

[1] Respondent argues that the discriminatees were offered employment by Pacemaker Area Manager Joe Weisenburger. All the discriminatees denied that Weisenburger offered employment at any time after they were discharged.

Weisenburger testified:

> I talked to each of them shortly after I'd sent them a letter and I'd called them or left word for them to call me to tell them that it was being closed and that we didn't have anything in the immediate area. If they wanted to work on the casual board or a possible reassignment whould probably require a relocation at that particular time and they probably should touch base with either my office or out of other office in Greenville since it was closer, actually, to this location.

Weisenburger also testified that he believed J. C. Gates told him in a telepone conversation that Gates could not work for Pacemakers:

> Because it would jepordize the case or something to that effect.

I credit the testimony of the discriminatees, including Gates, who all denied that they were offered employment by Weisenburger. Their testimony in that regard was positive. On the other hand Weisenburger admitted that his recollection was not good.

Moreover, even if I should credit Weisenburger's testimony, it is clear from the above quoted testimony that Weisenburger did not extend an offer of employment. Weisenburger simply held out the hope of casual or permanent employment.

Respondent presently operates 13 tractors at 6 locations; Indianapolis, Indiana (3 tractors); Nashville, Tennessee (2); Memphis, Tennessee (2); Syracuse, New York (2); Cleveland, Ohio (3); and Atlanta, Georgia (1). As was the case during 1981, teams of drivers are employed to operate Respondent's 13 tractors.

Regarding the question of Respondent's obligation to reinstate the discriminatees in locations other than Knoxville, the Board has traditionally ordered that type reinstatement in cases where it finds that an employer need not return its business to the former location. See for example Garwin Corp., 153 NLRB 664 (1955), enfd. in part 374 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1967); Burroughs Corp., 214 NLRB 571 (1974).

As shown below, I find that Respondent would have closed its Knoxville domiciles at some time after 30 March 1981 for legitimate business reasons. Nevertheless, that finding is speculative. It cannot be established with certainty that Knoxville would have closed if in fact the Knoxville domiciles had existed when Respondent switched from TL to LTL operations. Correspondingly, it cannot be established with certainty that the discriminatees would not have been terminated when the Knoxville domiciles closed for legitimate business reasons. In situations of this nature it is the normal practice to decide in favor of the innocent party and against the wrongdoer. Here the discriminatees continue to suffer substantial harm because of Respondent's unlawful action.

I find that the record does not show that the discriminatees would have been terminated for economic reasons. Therefore, Respondent's mandate to reinstate all alleged discriminatees continues regardless of Respondent's obligation to reopen its Knoxville truck domicile.

Is Respondent Obligated to Reopen its Knoxville Truck Domicile?

In response to the above query, the Sixth Circuit agreed that Respondent has a right "to move the domicile for legitimate business reason . . . ." (Carrier Corp. v. NLRB, 768 F.2d 778, 784 fn. 5 (1985)). Therefore, I shall apply the test inherent in the court's comment, i.e., does the record prove that Respondent would have removed its Knoxville domicile at some point after March 1981, for legitimate business reasons.

Respondent argues that because of business factors it changed from a TL (truckload) operation to an LTL (less than truckload) operation. The record shows that the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 had a deregulation effect on the trucking industry. Because of that law more entities were able to qualify as interstate motor carriers.

The evidence illustrates that from 1980, the number of TL carriers significantly increased. TL carriers frequently operate with little more capital investment than their trucks because it is not necessary to have extensive terminal or distribution facilities. Because of added competition as a result of more carriers, the TL rates have decreased since 1980.

The record shows that truckload rates available to Carrier Corporation decreased from $1.37 per mile in 1981, to $1.30 in 1982, to $1.28 in 1983, to $1.14 in 1984, up to $1.19 in 1985, and to $1.08 in 1986.

However, the 1980 Motor Carrier Act did not have a similar effect on LTL operations, LTL revenues have varied from $2.97 per mile in 1981, to $2.57 in 1982, to $3.27 in 1983, to $2.48 in 1984, to $2.23 in 1985, and to $2.66 in 1986.

During the same period Respondent's operating costs have increased from a $1.15 per mile in 1981, to $1.21 in 1982, to a $1.33 in 1983, to $1.37 in 1984, down to a $1.34 in 1985, and to $1.36 in 1986.

Respondent argues, and the above figures support, that from 1983 the available rates for which it could use for-hire TL truckers, were less than its costs. Therefore, from that point in time, Respondent was unable to justify continuation of its TL operations. It simply costs more to run its own trucks than it would cost to pay outside TL operators.

In interoffice communications as early as 6 July 1981, Respondent recognized that CTS could not continue as a viable truckload operation. During July 1981 it was announced that CTS would increase its LTL operations by 65 percent. Although LTL rates were also falling in July 1981, there remained a wide range of profit opportunity in LTL operations (i.e., verses the cost of $1.15 per mile at that time, LTL rates were running about $2.97 per mile.

In 1981 Respondent decided that its increased LTL operations[2] could be handled with 13 trucks. Respondent established through record evidence that it followed the most economical procedure to reduce its fleet from 22 to 13 tractors by simply returning the 9 excess tractors as their leases expired. Therefore, on 2 August 1981, 3 trucks were turned in as their leases expired and Respondent's fleet was reduced to 19 tractors; on 24 August 1982 the leases expired on 3 additional tractors and the fleet was reduced to 16; and on 20 November 1982 Respondent's fleet was finally reduced to 13 when the leases of 3 tractors expired.

As it reduced its tractor fleet Respondent closed its trucking domiciles in several cities.

Manager Clyde Henniger testified that the six current domiciles of CTS were selected due to their unique ability to provide service to LTL assembly and distribution programs. In selecting the six domiciles Henninger testified that he also considered the volume of LTL traffic generated in various cities including Knoxville and other former domiciles.

The evidence shows that Carrier's distribution warehouses are located in Syracuse, 444,000 sq. ft.; Nashville, 1,049,000 sq. ft.; Memphis, 666,000 sq. ft.; Indianapolis, 434,000 sq. ft.; Tyler, 303,000 sq. ft.; City of Industry, 303,000 sq. ft.; Little Rock, 101,000 sq. ft.; and Knoxville, 75,000 sq. ft. In 1981 Respondent had distribution center warehouses located in Syracuse, 707,000 sq. ft.; Nashville, 1,074,000 sq. ft.; Memphis, 666,000 sq. ft.; Indianapolis, 281,000 sq. ft.; City of Industry, 333,000 sq. ft.; and Tyler, Texas, 214,000 sq. ft. Distribution programs have been established by Respondent in Syracuse,

[2] Respondent's current operations function as LTL operations even though a portion of its business remains "truckload." The truckload operations are primarily backhauls, used to provide some offset to the cost of returning the trucks to their originating terminal.

Cleveland, Indianapolis, Memphis, and Atlanta plus two on the west coast, Los Angeles and Oakland. Carrier's assembly programs are located in Memphis, Nashville, Indianapolis, Cleveland, and Syracuse. As shown above the current domiciles of Respondent are located in Indianapolis (three trucks); Nashville (two); Memphis (two); Syracuse (two); Cleveland (three); and Atlanta (one).

Additionally, the record shows that during 1981 and 1982 when the decisions were being made to close the former domiciles, Knoxville generated a low volume of LTL shipments. In a selected 3-month period in 1981 Knoxville generated significantly fewer LTL shipments than Tyler, Cincinnati, or Fort Wayne (267,529 as opposed to 592,329, 1,766,772, and 4,895,027, respectively). During 3 months in 1983 Knoxville generated 300,512 LTL shipments; Tyler, 447,110; Cincinnati, 1,481,098; Memphis, 2,631,346; Indianapolis, 4,697,788; and Syracuse, 5,518,312. It is noteworthy that Respondent no longer has domiciles in Tyler, Cincinnati, or Fort Wayne.

On 10 February 1985, Respondent closed the last of its former domiciles, one in Springfield, Massachusetts. Before that it closed Mansfield, Ohio, on 1 May 1985; Cincinnati, Detriot, and Morrison, Tennessee, on 20 November 1982; Tyler, Texas, on 1 May 1982; and Fort Wayne, Indiana, on 2 August 1981.

Although Respondent moved its Knoxville domicile to Cincinnati illegally on 30 March 1981, I am convinced from the record, that factors that led to the close of the Cincinnati domicile do not accurately indicate that the Knoxville domicile would have closed when Cincinnati actually closed. Cincinnati closed when anticipated local business failed to materialize. That factor was unique to Cincinnati and would not have been present in Knoxville. However, in view of the evidence showing the LTL shipments that were generated in Knoxville and elsewhere, and in particular in view of the evidence regarding assembly and distribution programs, I find that the Knoxville domicile would have been closed for legitimate business reasons at some point on or before the date Respondent closed its Springfield domicile, 10 February 1985. In view of that finding I recommend that Respondent should not be required to reopen its Knoxville domicile.

Backpay

The pleadings developed several issues relating to the amount of backpay.

(a) Pension credits. The General Counsel amended paragraph 8(a) of the backpay specification to allege:

> In addition to the amounts computed pursuant to paragraph 6 above, Respondent would have continued payments to its pension plan on behalf of the discriminatees, and Respondent is obligated to restore the credits they would have earned toward their pensions absent the illegal discrimination against them.

Respondent answered:

> Respondent Carrier admits that it made regular pension contributions on behalf of its employees with over one year service. Respondent Carrier denies the remaining allegations contained in Paragraph 8(a). Respondent Carrier denies any backpay liability as the discharged employees failed to mitigate damages by making reasonable and diligent searches for interim employment.

I find below that the record evidence did not show that the discriminatees "failed to mitigate the damages by making reasonable and diligent searches for interim employment."

In view of Respondent's answer and the record evidence, I find Respondent must make payments necessary to restore all pension funds and credits lost by each of the four discriminatees during the period 30 March 1981 through 31 December 1985, to the extent each discriminatee would have been entitled to pension contributions if he had continued working for Respondent after 30 March 1981; and to continue those payments until Respondent's backpay obligation is terminated.

(b) Vacation pay. Respondent contends that the General Counsel seeks vacation pay for days when the discriminatees would have worked and received regular pay. However, the General Counsel has shown that the backpay computations contained in its backpay specifications include weekly averages based on total quarterly earnings and do not purport to include vacation pay for weeks the employees would have actually worked.

I find that the General Counsel's inclusion of vacation pay in its backpay computation is appropriate. Central Freight Lines, 266 NLRB 182 (1983).

(c) Interim earnings. Although Respondent contended in its answer that the four discriminatees failed to make reasonable and diligent search for interim employment, the record failed to support Respondent's position.

The entire backpay period should be examined in consideration of "reasonable search." C-F Freight, 276 NLRB 481 fn. 3 (1985).

The General Counsel admitted in the backpay specification, that each of the four discriminatees accumulated substantial interim earnings. Moreover, all four discriminatees were presented at the hearing here. When questioned about search for work, J. C. Gates adequately explained extensive efforts to find work while traveling 2500 miles.

Respondent has the burden of showing that the discriminatees failed to seek work, Highview, Inc., 250 NLRB 549 (1980); Sioux Falls Stock Yards Co., 236 NLRB 543 (1978).

Here the record does not show that any of the discriminatees failed to diligently seek work.

(d) Interim earnings not reported. Respondent answered about all four discriminatees to the effect that the specification contained only a portion of each discriminatee's gross interim earnings. Respondent's claim that the discriminatees had unreported earnings is rejected in view of the absence of any supporting evidence. Respondent failed to produce any evidence of interim earnings by any of the discriminatees other than those shown in the specifications. Sioux Falls Stock Yards, supra.

(e) Change in method of computing mileage. Respondent contends drivers' mileage computations changed in 1985. The record shows only the following:

> Q. Mr. Weisenburger, there was a wage increase for the Carrier employees sometime in 1985, is that correct?
> A. Yes. Took a while.
> Q. Alright. Do you remember if the computation for the mileage run, is the same after the increase in 1985?
> MR. PROWELL: Objection, Your Honor, leading.
> JUDGE ROBERTSON: I'll permit it. You may answer.
> A. I'm sorry, I didn't understand the question.
> Q. Do you recall if that increase, wage increase, also resulted in a different computation, or a different measure of mileage run by the employees? run on a different . . . .
> A. If the pay miles were computed differently?
> Q. Yes
> A. Okay, if I'm correct, it was '85 that we changed the mileage computation from a hub to household movers guide.
> Q. Okay, will you please explain for the Judge what is a household mover's guide and what is a hubometer mile?
> A. Well, a hubometer is the mileage tracking instrument on a truck that keeps an accurate track of miles and the household movers guide is a published book that says the miles from point A to point B are X amount miles. There's usually a variance because—the household movers guide is based on straight lines and it's usually lesser than hub miles.

Respondent offered no evidence that the household movers guide resulted in actual changes in pay. Because the record failed to show that Respondent's 1985 change in mileage computation "from a hub to household movers guide" specifically changed the backpay specifications, I have no basis to recompute gross backpay.

(f) Mileage allowance for J. C. Gates. J. C. Gates testified that he drove 2500 miles in search of work. On cross-examination Gates supported his mileage estimate by citing various cities and employers he visited in search of work. No evidence was offered that would rebut Gates' testimony.

I find that Gates' testimony was credible, and his estimate reasonable. I shall award the claimed mileage at the rate of 22.5 cents per mile. See Evans Plumbing Co., 278 NLRB 67 (1986).

(g) Did the discriminatees refuse employment with Pacemaker. As shown above Respondent alleged that Pacemaker Manager Joe Weisenburger made offers of employment to the discriminatees after 30 March 1981. I credit the denial of each of the discriminatees that Weisenburger made such an offer. Moreover, even Weisenburger's testimony fails to illustrate that he actually offered employment to any of the discriminatees. (See above.)

Weisenburger, at best, simply held out the hope that casual or permanent work may be available. I find that the record shows that none of the discriminatees refused an offer of employment from Pacemaker.

(h) Gates medical and dental records. If the discriminatees had continued their employment they would have been covered by Pacemaker's medical and dental insurance plans. J. C. Gates documented that he incurred the following medical and dental expenses for which he was not compensated by insurance or other means:

1981–$204 ($68 per quarter–three quarters)
1982–$1280 ($302 per quarter)
1983–$1736 ($434 per quarter)
1984–$1024 ($256 per quarter)
1985–$836 ($209 per quarter)

I find that Respondent is obligated to reimburse Gates for those expenses. Plasterers Local 90 (Southern Illinois Builders), 252 NLRB 750 (1980).

(i) Health insurance premiums. Discriminatee Donnie Bales documented health premiums he paid while working with an interim employer. Had Bales continued working for the Respondent after 30 March 1981 those premiums would have been paid by the Employer. Therefore, Bales should be reimbursed from the premiums paid by him Sioux Falls Stock Yards, supra.

(j) Donnie Bales sick pay. In support of this contention General Counsel's Exhibit 2(g), page 6, shows that Bales was paid $150 in sick pay during the billing week ending 8 November 1980. In view of Bales receipt of sick pay while employed by Respondent, it is proper to award sick leave pay.[3]

(k) Holiday pay. The General Counsel's Exhibit 2(j) and (n) show that each discriminatee received holiday pay of $150.60 and $211.20 during the representative periods.[4] It is proper to award prorated holiday pay on the basis of established practice.

Conclusions

To the extent shown above, I conclude that the formulas used in the amended backpay specifications were reasonable and appropriate and that the mathematical calculations based on the formulas are accurate.

As to the discriminatees Jonah C. Gates, Hickman S. Ridley Jr., Donnie Bales, and David Donaldson, Respondent's backpay/reinstatement obligations were shown to be continuing and, to the extent backpay entitlement for Gates, Ridley, Bales, and Donaldson may be specified for periods after 1985, I recommended that I shall retain jurisdiction of this matter to properly consider appropriate specifications which the General Counsel may submit in the future.[5]

[3] The General Counsel's computations set out in its brief indicate that the weekly figure of $11.11 may be incorrect. It appears that the sick pay figure of $150 divided by 27 weeks (representative period) should be $5.55 rather than $11.11. If incorrect, the General Counsel's figures should be corrected, as well as the resulting backpay entitlement figures.

[4] The General Counsel's computations set out in its brief indicate that the weekly figures of $13.69 for Bales, Gates, and Ridley and $15.38 for Donaldson, may be incorrect. The brief shows that Bales, Gates, and Ridley should receive a prorated share computed by dividing $316.80 by 27 weeks, which would equal $11.73; and that Donaldson's weekly entitlement should be arrived at by dividing $16.80 by 24 weeks, for a total of $13.20. If incorrect the General Counsel's figures should be corrected as well as the resulting backpay entitlement.

City Disposal Systems, Inc. and James Brown. Case 7-CA-16792

July 29, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On July 14, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Donald R. Holley issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief. Both the Charging Party and the Respondent filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, City Disposal Systems, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall make whole James Brown by paying him the sum of $7,505.38, plus interest computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[3]

Joseph Canfield, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Theodore R. Opperwall, Esq. (Dickinson, Wright, Moon, Van Dusen & Freeman), for the Respondent.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge. On 9 June 1981, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in this case directing, inter alia, that City Disposal Systems, Inc. (Respondent or City Disposal), offer James Brown immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a sub-

[1] Counsel for the Charging Party, who did not enter the case until after the hearing, has filed a motion to remand out of time to take evidence concerning Respondent's alleged liability for pension contributions and health plan benefits. The Respondent opposes the motion. The motion alleges that the General Counsel failed to include in the backpay specification any amounts for pension contributions and health plan benefits. The motion asserts that because Charging Party Brown entered no appearance and proceeded without counsel at the hearing, he was not in a position to raise these issues at that time. Our review of the record indicates, contrary to the Charging Party's assertion, that Brown entered a formal appearance on his own behalf. He therefore had the opportunity to raise these issues at the hearing. Furthermore, we find no evidence in the record that pension contributions or health plan benefits exist or should have been included in the backpay specification. Accordingly, the motion to remand is denied.

The General Counsel and the Respondent jointly move to correct a perceived clerical or technical error in the judge's decision relating to his determination that the earnings of Best Wrecking Company driver Steve Brousseau should be used as an offset from the gross backpay for claimant Brown because Brown had incurred a willful loss of earnings by rejecting an offer of employment by Best Wrecking Company. These parties allege that the judge's decision contained a chart setting forth the calculation of backpay due, which included information found in R. Exh. 25. This exhibit listed Brousseau's earnings. The judge's chart omitted the "ADP payroll earnings" listed in quarter 4 of 1980 for Brousseau. The General Counsel and the Respondent contend that the judge should have included these earnings, which would have resulted in a zero net backpay figure for quarter 4 of 1980. The Charging Party originally declined to join in the motion and now opposes it. We believe that the General Counsel and the Respondent have failed to explain adequately the nature of the "ADP payroll earnings" or to establish that claimant Brown would have been eligible for or entitled to the "ADP payroll earnings." Therefore, the joint motion is denied.

We correct the following inadvertent errors in the judge's decision:

1. The heading of sec. B. should read: "B. Employment during period 14 May 1979 through 1 April 1980."

2. In the last sentence of the section entitled "The Failure to Accept or Retain Comparable Employment," par. 4, "1972" should read "1982."

3. In par. 5 of the same section, "28 December 1982" should read "28 December 1981" and "28 December until 13 February 1983" should read "28 December 1981 until 13 February 1982."

[2] We correct the following errors in the judge's calculation of backpay due:

1. Quarters 3 and 4 of 1979 should be excluded from the calculation because the amended backpay specification excluded these quarters.

2. The record establishes that Brown was disabled and thus unable to work for 6 weeks during quarter 1 of 1982. For this reason the judge reduced the amount of gross pay due Brown for this quarter by $2707. This was the amount that the judge thought applied to the 6 weeks during which Brown received workmen's compensation. However, the judge erroneously reduced quarter 1 of 1983 by that amount rather than quarter 1 of 1982. The correct gross backpay amount for the 6 weeks of quarter 1 of 1982 in which Brown received workmen's compensation is $2902. Further, the judge failed to reduce the interim earnings offset for those 6 weeks. Thus, the judge included $1899.81 as interim earnings based on the amount Brousseau earned during that period. Because the backpay has been reduced based on Brown's inability to work during the 6-week period, it appears that the projected interim earnings based on the job Brown turned down should also be reduced for the same period. Accordingly, we have reduced the gross backpay for quarter 1 of 1982 by $2902 and we have reduced the amount of interim earnings for that period by $1889.81. This reduction results in net backpay of $388.07 for that quarter. These changes do not affect the net backpay due for quarter 1 of 1983 (0).

We find the judge's denial of backpay to Brown for the 6 weeks during which he was disabled to be proper under American Mfg. Co., 167 NLRB 520, 522 (1967). The evidence shows that an excludable period of absence from work took place during the 6 weeks Brown was disabled. The General Counsel has not established by showing that the nature of the interim employment that Brown was performing was so unusual or so dissimilar from work he performed for the Respondent that Brown's injury would not have occurred in the absence of the Respondent's discrimination against him. Thus, in fact, the record reflects that, although Brown's injury occurred in the course of interim employment, that employment as an over-the-road truckdriver did not pose hazards that were different or greater than the hazards presented by Brown's job with the Respondent, in which he drove a tractor-trailer back and forth over a 37-mile route between Detoit and Belleville, Michigan.

3. Regarding quarter 4 of 1982, the interim offset amount was greater than the gross backpay; therefore, the net backpay should be zero.

In sum, the corrections we make to the judge's backpay calculations affect the quarterly net backpay amounts by reducing the net backpay to zero for quarter 4 of 1979 and quarter 4 of 1982 and reducing the net backpay to $388.07 for quarter 1 of 1982. This results in the total net backpay being reduced to $7,505.38.

stantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and to make Brown whole for any loss of earnings since his discharge on 14 May 1979, with interest. On 22 July 1982, Sixth Circuit issued its order in Case 87–1406 denying enforcement of the Order of the Board. Thereafter, on 21 March 1984, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the court of appeals, remanded the case to the Sixth Circuit, and on 9 July 1985, the Sixth Circuit enforced the Order of the Board.

On 6 December 1985, the Regional Director for Region 7 issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing alleging that James Brown was due a certain sum as backpay. Thereafter, Respondent filed an answer to the backpay specification, and at the commencement of the hearing held on 9 and 10 June 1986, the General Counsel amended the backpay specification by substituting new schedules C and D for those attached to the backpay specification.[1]

I. FACTS

The backpay period commences on 14 May 1979, the date Brown was discharged, and ends on 18 July 1985, the date he was offered reinstatement.

A. The Best Wrecking Company Offer and Refusal

The record reveals Brown was offered a truckdriver position by Best Wrecking Company, Inc. at some unstated time in May 1979.[2] Steve Mardigan, 50-percent owner of Best, testified Teamsters Local 247, the Union that also represents City Disposal's drivers, represents his drivers. In 1979, Best's drivers were paid approximately $12 an hour, a sum S. Mardigan estimated to be 30-percent higher than union scale, and $4 to $5 more an hour than garbage men were then receiving. Local 247's contract with Best provided for vacations and a few paid holidays. S. Mardigan testified Brown would have been immediately below Best driver Steve Brousseau if he had accepted Best's offer. Thereafter, he indicated Brousseau was paid the following amounts for driving in Detroit during the period 1 January 1979 through 30 May 1982: 1979—$23,522.25; 1980—$27,906.07; 1981—$29,556.62; and 1 January through 30 May 1982—$10,972.52.

In early June 1982, Best's Detroit drivers were transferred to demolition jobs located in Minneapolis and Austin, Minnesota. David Mardigan, also a 50-percent owner of Best, testified the drivers were paid the scale called for by Best's contract with Local 247 while working in Minnesota, and he indicated the drivers sent to Minneapolis worked an average of 60 hours a week until early April 1983, while those transferred to Austin worked 40–45 hours per week through the month of September 1984.[3]

B. Employment During Period 14 May 1974 Through 1 April 1980

Brown testified he was unemployed from the time he was terminated by Respondent until he obtained a laborer position at Plymouth Hills Mobile Home Park in early 1980. However, in a job application filed with Midwestern Distribution, Inc., dated 11 August 1980, he indicated he had been employed by W. L. Moore Trucking during the period 27 May 1979 through 10 April 1980.[4] Brown claimed during his testimony that he falsely indicated on the Midwestern application that he had worked for Moore Trucking during the period indicated, that he indicated the employment to show he had driving experience.

Regarding to his claimed employment by Plymouth Hill, Brown indicated he could not fix the time of the employment, but he recalled it occurred during a change of seasons as he shoveled snow and also performed tasks performed in warm weather such as mowing grass. Joe Ruggerello, the owner of Plymouth Hills, indicated he was not absolutely sure when he employed Brown, but he felt it must have been during June, July, or August 1979 or 1980 because he hired persons to perform labor type work such as street cleaning, sidewalk cleaning, or general cleanup only during summer months. He testified laborers were not used to remove snow during winter months because equipment operated by his park manager or a four-wheel drive vehicle operated by a resident of the park accomplished all snow removal.

Brown testified he was paid $250 a week while working at Plymouth Hill, and he estimated his interim earnings as a result of that employment to be $1948. The backpay specification attributes $1700 of these earnings to be the first quarter of 1980, and $248 to be the second quarter of 1980.

The 1979 and 1980 Federal income tax returns filed by Brown fail to indicate he earned $1948 (or any other amount) while working for Plymouth Hill.[5]

C. Employment During the Period 21 April Through 2 July 1980

The record reveals that Brown was employed as a local truckdriver by Detroit City Dairy at a rate of $5 an hour on 21 April 1980. After working for that company for 4 weeks, his hourly rate was increased to $7.20 an hour. Brown testified, and the record reveals, that considerable overtime, which was paid at time-and-a-half the

[1] See G.C. Exh. 2.

[2] Prior to the hearing, the Region informed Respondent, by letter dated 30 May 1986, that Brown had rejected an offer of interim employment made by Best Wrecking Company "in around May, 1979" and that rendered Brown ineligible for backpay until in or about April 1980, when he secured employment at Plymouth Hill Mobile Home Court. Thereafter, at the outset of the hearing, the backpay specification was amended to exclude any claim for backpay for Brown during the third and fourth quarters of 1979. Although Brown denied having received the offer under discussion and claimed during the hearing he was not qualified to drive Best's equipment, David Mardigan, part-owner of Best, testified he had observed Brown in City Disposal equipment which was similar to the equipment used by Best. As indicated, supra, Brown has little regard for the truth and sanctity of an oath. Noting Brown has been a truckdriver for almost 30 years, I credit Mardigan's described testimony. I do not credit Brown's claim that he was not offered the position, and I do not credit his claim that he was not qualified to operate Best's equipment.

[3] Best's Detroit drivers were paid living expenses while working in Minnesota.

normal hourly rate was available on that job.[6] Brown quit his job at Detroit City Dairy on 2 July 1980. He testified he quit because they would not give him a raise.[7]

Richard Brower, Detroit City Dairy's controller during the entire backpay period, testified his company employed 15–16 drivers in 1980, and the number had climbed to 24–25 by 1985. Its drivers were represented by Teamster Local 337, and their hourly contract rate was increased by 50 cents to $7.70 in 1981, $7.80 in 1982, $7.90 in 1983, and $8 in 1984. In 1985, the hourly rate remained the same when the contract was renegotiated, but drivers employed a full year were to receive a $750 bonus, which translated to an additional 25 cents an hour. He indicated the drivers worked 60–65 hours a week during the backpay period. Brower testified Detroit City Dairy advertised for drivers in The Detroit News or The Free Press, local newspapers, approximately once every other week during the 1980–1985 time period.[8]

On 18 August 1980, Brower, acting for Detroit City Dairy, responded to Midwestern Distribution, Inc.'s inquiry about Brown's work history by indicating, inter alia, the company would reemploy Brown. Brown testified that at some unstated time during 1982 or 1983 he telephoned Detroit City Dairy to seek employment and he was told there were no openings. Noting the company was advertising for drivers during 1982 and 1983, and it considered Brown reemployable, I do not credit Brown's vague unsupported claim that he sought work at Detroit City Dairy during 1982 or 1983.

D. Employment with Midwestern Distribution, Inc.

Brown was unemployed from 3 July until 14 August 1980. He testified that, while he was still employed by Detroit City Dairy, he visited the Michigan Employment Security Commission to seek other work and was advised that, if he was willing to work out-of-town, Midwestern Distribution, Inc., located in Fort Scott, Kansas, was seeking over-the-road drivers.[9] At some unstated time, Brown contacted Midwestern by phone and he was apparently advised to report to Fort Scott on or about 11 August 1980. He filed an application with Midwestern on 11 August, and started driving for an unnamed owner-operator utilized by Midwestern on 14 August (Tractor 8518, Inc.). Thereafter, during the fourth quarter of 1980, Brown obtained his own tractor and was employed by Midwestern as an owner-driver until he was terminated on 14 February 1982, allegedly because he had experienced a preventable accident that damaged Midwestern equipment or property.[10] Thereafter, when Brown filed an unemployment compensation claim with the Kansas Department of Human Resources, Division of Employment, that agency initially denied him benefits for the period 14 February through 3 April 1982. Brown appealed and the agency sustained the appeal and found the accident was unavoidable on 22 April 1982.[11]

During his employment at Midwestern, Brown earned, after expenses, approximately the same weekly amount he had earned while working as a laborer for Plymouth Hill Mobile Home Park—$250 a week and/or $1000 a month.

E. The Period 28 December 1981 Through 13 February 1982

Brown was injured in the accident that occurred on 28 December 1981. He performed no work during the period extending from 28 December to 13 February 1982. On 9 February 1982 the doctor who treated him indicated he would be released to return to work on 13 February 1982.[12] Brown indicated during his testimony that he received workmen's compensation benefits in an undisclosed amount for his period of incapacity.

F. Calendar Years 1982 and 1983

In a backpay questionnaire submitted to the Regional Office on 5 April 1984, Brown indicated he was unemployed and had no interim earnings during the period January 1982 to January 1984.[13] His Federal income tax returns for years 1982 and 1983, which were placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 15, reveal he claimed income in 1982 in the amount of $303 from Tractor 8566, Inc.[14] and that he claimed he had no income from any source during calendar year 1983.

The record reveals Brown was employed by Reitzloff Disposal Company when he completed the above-mentioned questionnaire, but his then current employment was not noted on the document submitted. The record further reveals that in 1982 Brown commenced to use the alias James Hunter, and, regarding the use of this name, he utilized his deceased mother's social security number—419–14–5639. When Brown obtained employment at Reitzloff, he used the name James Hunter, and he initially used his mother's social security number.[15]

On 25 July 1985 the compliance officer for Region 7 mailed Brown a second backpay questionnaire. Brown apparently informed the compliance officer at that time that he was employed by Reitzloff and he would furnish the Region with his earnings while so employed. Thereafter, the record reveals he obtained a "To Whom It May Concern" document placed in the record as Re-

[6] See R. Exh. 13, which reveals that Brown regularly worked between 13–20 hours of overtime a week.

[7] Drivers at City Disposal were making $6.50 an hour at the time.

[8] His claim is substantiated in part, by R. Exh. 20, which reveals, inter alia, that Detroit City Dairy placed ads for drivers in The Detroit News on 7 March, 16 May, and 27 June 1982.

[9] R. Exh. 21, MESA forms that reveal the dates Brown visited that agency, do not reveal any 1980 visits. I do not credit Brown's claim that he visited the employment agency while still employed by Detroit City Dairy.

[14] The amount was apparently earned in 1981, but actually paid in 1982.

[15] Brown claimed he decided to use an alias and a different social security number because unidentified persons were asking his neighbors where he worked, when he got home, what kind of car he drove, and details concerning his children. In agreement with Respondent's counsel, I conclude his use of the alias and his mother's social security number concerning his employment at Reitzloff and his failure to inform the Region of his actions indicate he had an ulterior motive also.

spondent Exhibit 4 from Reitzloff and caused it to be delivered to the Region. The document sets forth Brown's earnings at Reitzloff during the four quarters of 1984 and quarters first and second of 1985. Kevin Reitzloff, general manager of Reitzloff, testified he learned James Hunter was actually James Brown around the time Brown asked that his 1984 and 1985 earnings be furnished to the Region, and he indicated Brown requested that the name Brown be used when supplying the information.[16]

Significantly, Brown did not tell Regional personnel prior to the issuance of the original backpay specification that he worked for Reitzloff under the alias James Hunter.

In February 1986, counsel for Respondent served Reitzloff with a subpoena duces tecum. In response to that subpoena, Reitzloff supplied Respondent's counsel and the Regional Office with payroll records that revealed Brown had been carried on Reitzloff's payroll since 7 September 1983 under the alias James Hunter. The records revealed he earned the amounts set forth in General Counsel's Exhibit 2 while employed during quarters third and fourth of 1983.[17] Additionally, Reitzloff relinquished the contents of Brown/Hunter's personnel file at that time to both Respondent's counsel and to the Regional Office. The file, which was placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 11, reveals, inter alia, that Brown executed W-4 forms on 7 September 1983, using the alias James Hunter and the social security number 419–14–5639 (his mother's number); that a request for verification of employment document sent Reitzloff by Allied Mortgage Association, Inc. signed by Betty Donovan, Reitzloff's office manager, on 10 October 1984, indicates James Hunter's date of employment as 7 September 1983; and that a request for verification of employment by Allied Mortgage Association, Inc. signed by Donald Reitzloff, supervisor, on 21 January 1985, indicates James Hunter's date of employment as 12 April 1982, and gives his 1983 earnings as $31,270.[18]

In an attempt to show that James Brown, a/k/a James Hunter, was actually employed by Reitzloff prior to 7 September 1983, Respondent's counsel placed the following documents in evidence: Respondent's Exhibit 7—an NBD Mortgage Company loan application signed by Brown as James Hunter on 3 June 1985, which indicates he had been employed by Reitzloff for 3 years; Respondent's Exhibit 8—the above-described Allied Mortgage document signed by Donald Reitzloff and James Hunter, indicating Hunter's date of hire to be 12 April 1982, and his 1983 earnings to be $31,270; Respondent's Exhibit 10—an automobile loan application signed by James Hunter on 25 April 1985 which, inter alia, indicates he had been employed by Reitzloff for 3 years; Respondent's Exhibit 11—an automobile loan application dated 23 May 1984 and signed by James Hunter, which indicates he had been employed by Reitzloff for 2 years and 6 months; and Respondent's Exhibit 12—a copy of the application Brown filed with Midwestern Distribution on August 11 1980, which reveals, inter alia, he was employed by W. L. Moore Trucking from May 27 1979 to 10 April 1980.[19]

Noting the 5 April 1984 backpay questionaire indicated Brown applied for employment at only five firms during 1982 and 1983, Respondent's counsel sought to show the discriminatee had failed to look for a job during those calendar years. To accomplish that objective, he produced Respondent's Exhibit 20, photocopies of ads for truckdrivers appearing in the Sunday editions of The Detroit News and The Free Press during calendar years 1982 and 1983, and asked Brown if he had seen and responded to five specific ads. Brown indicated he either had not seen or had not responded to three of the ads, and that he had seen and responded to two of the ads, but had not been hired. Additionally, Brown indicated he had sought employment at 50–100 firms that he had not listed in the 5 April 1984 questionnaire because of the limited space provided. Finally, he indicated he had repeatedly visited the Michigan Employment Security Commission during 1982 and 1983 to seek work.[20]

G. Employment by Enviroquip

Kevin Reitzloff was called by the General Counsel as a rebuttal witness. During cross-examination, Reitzloff indicated that, starting in what he recalled to be late 1984 or early 1985, Brown periodically drove new garbage trucks to Knoxville, Tennessee, for Enviroquip, a corporation owned by his father (K. Reitzloff's). Reitzloff indicated one Paul Ewart, a salesman, is the sole employee of Enviroquip. K. Reitzloff indicated Enviroquip sells sanitation vehicles and Ewart normally obtained Brown's services by asking him if Reitzloff Disposal could spare him for the time required to transport a vehicle to or from Knoxville. Brown was paid $200 for each delivery by check from a separately maintained Enviroquip account. K. Reitzloff testified he and Ewart had authority to sign Enviroquip checks and he signed at least one of that corporation's checks made out to Brown and/or Hunter. On occasion, K. Reitzloff physically handed Enviroquip checks to Brown.

Brown testified on rebuttal that he did not report his Enviroquip earnings to the Regional Office because he was under the impression that his work for that corporation was essentially work performed for Reitzloff Disposal. He claimed he thought Reitzloff Disposal had included his Enviroquip earnings when furnishing counsel for Respondent and the Regional Office his Reitzloff Disposal earnings.

[16] Kevin Reitzloff testified he ejected a reporter from the company's premises around the time the information was requested, and during that incident he learned Brown was using the alias Hunter.

[17] 3d quarter—$624.38 and 4th quarter—$4,099.42.

[19] Brown sought to disclaim responsibility for the content of the mortgage and loan application documents by claiming they were blank when he signed them. It is clear he either supplied the information set forth in R. Exhs. 10 and 11 or personally placed Reitzloff hire date information on such documents. Similarly, he either furnished or placed the W. L. Moore Trucking information on R. Exh. 12.

[20] Interestingly, the MESA cards, which appear in the record as R. Exh. 21, reveal Brown uniformly visited MESA at 8:15 a.m.

H. The Subpoenaed Documents

Prior to the hearing, counsel for Respondent served Brown with a subpoena duces tecum, which required that he produce, inter alia, his banking records, his Federal and other tax returns, and any documents revealing his attempts to obtain interim employment. In response, with exception of a few bank statements covering limited periods, Brown indicated he had no records other than those that had been delivered to the Regional Office. Interestingly, when producing bank statements, he inadvertently included a statement that indicated one Albert Mensah, whose address was indicated to be 20190 Riopelle, Detroit, Michigan 48234 (Brown's address), had maintained an account at the First of America Bank in Detroit.[21] Brown denied knowledge of the Mensah account and claimed the statement was among his personal papers because the bank had incorrectly mailed it to his address. Regarding its production, he stated, inter alia: "If I would have thought it was offensive to myself, I would not have brought it in and given it to you."

Although Brown was requested to produce a copy of his 1985 Federal income tax return at the outset of the hearing, he failed to contact the tax service he had utilized to obtain a copy of the return before the hearing was recessed. A copy of the return obtained by counsel for Respondent after the hearing was recessed was received in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 27. Brown did not report earnings received from Enviroquip in the 1985 return.

I. Contentions of the Parties

Respondent first contends that the record reveals Brown has "clearly engaged in a scheme to defraud City Disposal and to misuse the Board's processes" and he should therefore be denied any backpay under the rationale expressed in Ad Art, Inc., 280 NLRB 985 (1986), and American Navigation Co., 268 NLRB 426 (1983). Second, it contends Brown "had a legal duty to accept the Best Wrecking job" and he should receive no backpay while that job lasted, or at minimum until such time as other comparable or better employment arose. Third, it contends Brown's job at Detroit City Dairy was comparable to his job at City Disposal and he should be denied backpay from 3 July 1980 until 7 September 1983 because he quit the Detroit City Dairy job for invalid reasons and did not obtain comparable employment until he was hired by Reitzloff Disposal. Finally, it contends Brown should not be awarded backpay for quarters 3 and 4 of 1983, or for quarters 1 and 2 of 1985 because he intentionally failed to report interim earnings during those quarters. Regarding computation of any backpay, Respondent contends the formula used by the Regional Office is inappropriate; that the correct formula would entail use of the gross earnings of all seven drivers employed by City Disposal during the backpay period.

The General Counsel contends the formula used to compute backpay due is appropriate. As reflected by the backpay specification, as amended, he contends Brown should be denied backpay as a result of refusing the Best Wrecking employment from only 1 June 1979 until he obtained employment at Plymouth Hill during quarter 1 of 1980. He contends that from quarter 1 of 1980 until the end of the backpay period, Brown should be awarded the amounts indicated as due and owing in the backpay specification.

Analysis and Conclusions

In Great Plains Beef Co., 255 NLRB 1410 (1981), and M. J. McCarthy Motor Sales Co., 147 NLRB 1605 (1964), the Board denied all backpay to discriminatees who had persisted in the concealment of earnings when the Board also found their deception constituted an abuse of the Board's processes and rendered the ascertainment of interim earnings impossible. Subsequently, in American Navigation Co., 268 NLRB 426 (1983), the Board stated at 428

> We think that in fashioning a remedy in cases where a discriminatee has intentionally concealed employment from the Board, two matters must be considered: (1) the Respondent's liability for the consequences of its unlawful conduct, and (2) the Board's administration of its compliance proceedings consistent with the public interest.

In American Navigation, the Board indicated (fn. 6 at 428) that it would continue to deny all backpay to claimants whose intentionally concealed employment cannot be attributed to a specific quarter or quarters because of the claimant's deception. It found, however, that the following principles are appropriate when the concealed employment can be attributed to specific quarters (at 428)

> We find that a remedy which denies backpay for the quarters in which concealed employment occurred will discourage claimants from abusing the Board's processes for their personal gain and will also deter respondents from committing future unfair labor practices. This remedy will be applied, of course, only in cases where the claimant is found to have willfully deceived the Board, and not where the claimant, through inadvertence, fails to report earnings.

In Ad Art, Inc., supra, the Board affirmed Judge Taplitz' decision and order which denied a discriminatee any backpay when the judge found that "Wydner abused the Board's processes by withholding relevant evidence, by testifying falsely, by destroying records to cover up his misstatements, and by attempting to prevent a witness from testifying truthfully." In affirming the judge's finding, however, the Board again indicated that, as a general rule, the Board should deny backpay for only those quarters in which a discriminatee intentionally concealed interim earnings from the Board.

In the instant case, the quarters during which Brown may have concealed interim earnings are readily ascertainable. Thus, the record reveals Brown asserted in the application he filed with Midwestern Distribution on 11 August 1980 that he was employed by W. L. Moore

Trucking from 27 May 1979 to 10 April 1980; it reveals through residential loan applications, requests for verification of employment forms, and applications for automobile loans that Brown may have been employed by Reitzloff Disposal as early as quarter 1 or 2 of 1982; it reveals that although working under the alias James Hunter, Brown failed on 5 April 1984 to report interim employment at Reitzloff Disposal to the Regional Office, and he thereafter failed to report interim earnings at Reitzloff applicable to quarters 3 and 4 of 1983, when he provided interim earning information for calendar years 1984 and 1985 and; it reveals he failed to report Enviroquip earnings received at undisclosed times during late 1984 and the first three quarters of 1985.

During his testimony, Brown explained the W. L. Moore Trucking entry on his Midwestern application by claiming he indicated he was employed by Moore from late May 1979 until 10 April 1980 simply to establish the fact that he had truckdriving experience. He denied he actually worked for W. L. Moore during the period indicated, and Respondent offered no evidence to disprove his claim. Although I found much of Brown's testimony to be suspect, and I am reluctant to credit his uncorroborated testimony, I am unwilling to find the record reveals Brown was employed by W. L. Moore during the above-described period and that he earned moneys that he intentionally concealed. In short, I credit his assertion that he did not actually work for W. L. Moore during the period described.

Similarly, I find unconvincing the indications in Respondent's Exhibits 7 through 11 that Brown may have been employed by Reitzloff as early as the first or second quarter of 1982. Kevin Reitzloff credibly testified Brown was not employed by Reitzloff until 7 September 1983. Although it appears Brown and/or Young supplied prospective lenders with false information to induce them to lend him money when completing the loan applications placed in the record, I am unwilling to find he was actually employed by Reitzloff or was paid moneys by that firm prior to 7 September 1983.

Although Brown denies he sought to conceal the fact that he was employed by Reitzloff during quarters 3 and 4 of 1983, the record convinces me the discriminatee intentionally sought to conceal his interim earnings during those quarters. As indicated, supra, Brown obtained employment at Reitzloff using the alias James Hunter and he failed completely when completing a backpay questionnaire on 5 April 1984 to indicate he was then employed by Reitzloff. The record establishes to my satisfaction that he thereafter directed Kevin Reitzloff to supply the Regional Office with his 1984 and 1985 earnings only, and informed Reitzloff to indicate his name as James Brown rather than James Hunter when supplying the information.

Significantly, the record reveals Brown failed to report his 1983 earnings while employed by Reitzloff Disposal in his 1983 Federal income tax return. Moreover, the record reveals he failed to indicate to Regional Office personnel that he had used the alias James Hunter in concerning his employment until some undetermined time in 1985 or 1986. Additionally, I note Brown failed to indicate, when he was asked to complete a second backpay questionnaire on or about 25 July 1985, that he had earnings while employed by Reitzloff in 1983 that he had not revealed to the Regional Office. Finally, I note Brown's 1983 earnings while employed by Reitzloff did not become known until Respondent's counsel obtained information from Reitzloff pursuant to subpoena in early February 1986. In the circumstances described, I find Brown intentionally sought to conceal his earnings while employed by Reitzloff Disposal during quarters 3 and 4 of 1983. In accordance with the rule set forth in American Navigation Co., supra, I find the discriminatee is entitled to no backpay for quarters 3 and 4 of 1983.

Turning to earnings received by Brown from Enviroquip Corporation, the record reveals the discriminatee received $200 on an unstated number of occasions commencing in late 1984 or early 1985 for driving equipment to or from Knoxville, Tennessee. The earnings were not reported to the Regional Office, and they were not included in the Federal income tax returns filed by Brown for years 1984 or 1985. Although Brown testified he assumed his Enviroquip earnings were included in W-2 statements supplied him by Reitzloff Disposal, he indicated during his testimony he was aware that the checks given him by Enviroquip were drawn on that corporation's bank account. Moreover, although he claimed he could not recall how many trips he made or when they were made, he admitted one trip must have been made during a holiday period, possibly in July 1985. In my view, Brown was legally obligated to ascertain and report the extent of his earnings when performing work for Enviroquip. That information was available to the discriminatee at the time of the hearing, but he made no attempt to produce it to enable the Regional Office and/or undersigned to compute the backpay due him during quarter 4 of 1984 and quarters 1, 2, and 3 of 1985. I conclude the earnings were intentionally concealed, and find no backpay should be awarded to Brown for the quarters indicated.

A. The Failure to Accept or Retain Comparable Employment

In Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342 (1962), the Board discussed the result that obtains when a discriminatee refuses an offer of comparable employment, stating at 1350

> Finally, if a claimant does willfully incur losses by either unjustifiably quitting or refusing substantially equivalent employment, he is not deprived of his entire claim, but only so much of it as he would have earned had he retained or obtained the interim job.

Earlier, in Knickerbocker Plastics Co., 132 NLRB 1209 (1961), the Board indicated how the backpay of a claimant who incurred willful loss of earnings would be affected, stating at 1215

> We further find that, as a result of such quitting, each of these claimants shall be deemed to have earned for the remainder of the period for which each is awarded backpay the hourly wage being > earned at the time such quitting occurred. Therefore, an offset computed on the appropriate rate per hour will be deducted as interim earnings from the gross backpay of each of these claimants. This offset shall be made applicable from the date of the unjustified quitting throughout the remainder of the backpay period for each particular claimant. In this connection, where the claimant has secured other employment during the time that the offset is applicable, and if, on a quarterly basis, she earned a greater amount than the offset, the offset will not be applied, but the actual interim earnings will be deducted from gross backpay. If she earned less than the offset at employment secured subsequent to the quitting, also on a quarterly basis, the amount of the offset will be applied.

Recently in KSLM-AM & KSD-FM, 275 NLRB 1342, 1343 (1985), the Board reaffirmed the continuing offset against gross backpay rule citing Knickerbocker Plastics Co., supra.

The facts in the instant case cause me to conclude that Brown incurred willful loss of earnings on two occasions during the backpay period. He first incurred what I deem to be willful loss of earnings when he refused the driving job offered him by Best Wrecking.[22] As indicated, supra, Brown was employed by Detroit City Dairy in April 1980, and he quit that job on 2 July 1980, allegedly because that company refused to give him a raise. Noting that Brown had completed his probationary period at Detroit City Dairy and that he was making $7.20 an hour when he quit,[23] I find his quitting of the Detroit City Dairy job was unjustified, and that by quitting he thereby incurred willful loss of earnings.

Having reached the conclusions stated above, I must next decide how to apply the principles set forth in Knickerbocker Plastics and American Navigation to the instant facts. Obviously, the earnings Brown could have expected to receive if employed by Best Wrecking cannot be offset against his actual earnings during the entire backpay period because the record reveals Best Wrecking had no jobs for truckdrivers in Detroit after the second quarter of 1982, and its Minnesota work was completed by the fall of 1984. In my view, the willful loss of earnings attributable to the discriminatee's refusal of the Best Wrecking offer ended when Best Wrecking's Detroit drivers were transferred to Minnesota. No one knows whether Brown would have accepted employment out of his normal job market area, and I am disposed to resolve that issue in the discriminatee's favor and find that work for him with Best Wrecking was not available after the end of the second quarter of 1982. Noting that S. Mardigan testified Brown would have been second in seniority had he accepted the May 1979 job offer, and further noting that he indicated Brown's earnings through the second quarter of 1982 would have been approximately the same as the earnings experienced by driver Brousseau, I find the moneys earned by Brousseau in each quarter during the period extending from 1 June 1979 through 30 June 1972 should be used as an offset to be deducted as interim earnings from gross backpay.[24]

Having concluded the willful loss of earnings resulting from the refusal of the Best Wrecking offer should not extend beyond 30 June 1982, I turn to the willful loss incurred by Brown as a result of his unjustifiably quitting the Detroit City Dairy job. As indicated, supra, after leaving Detroit City Dairy, Brown drove for Midwestern Distribution until 28 December 1982. He was disabled and unavailable for work while receiving workmen's compensation from 28 December 1982 until 13 February 1983. Thereafter, he claims he was unemployed until he was hired as a driver by Reitzloff Disposal on 7 September 1983. Finally, he remained employed by Reitzloff Disposal from 7 September 1983 through the end of the backpay period—18 July 1985.

Although the General Counsel claims Brown is entitled to the difference between his actual earnings and the estimated earnings he would have received had he remained employed by City Disposal (plus expenses) during calendar years 1982, 1983, 1984, and through 18 July 1985, I find the earnings he could have expected to receive had he not quit the Detroit City Dairy job should be offset against his actual interim earnings from 1 July 1982 forward. In this connection, in addition to the fact that I have concluded Brown incurred willful loss of earnings by quitting the Detroit City Dairy job, I note the record clearly reveals Detroit City Dairy needed and advertised for drivers throughout the period 1 July 1982 to 18 July 1985.[25] Moreover, Brower, that company's controller, testified Brown was considered reemployable by his firm even though he had quit July 1980. In the situation described, I find it reasonable to assume that Brown would have been rehired by Detroit City Dairy if he had sought reemployment with that company. Even in the absence of that record evidence which reveals Brown unjustifiably quit his Detroit City Dairy job, I would find he incurred willful loss of earnings by failing to seek reemployment with that company after he lost his Midwestern Distribution job.

In sum, for the reasons stated, I find Brown incurred willful loss of earnings during the entire period extending from 1 June 1979 through 18 July 1985. I conclude the estimated earnings he would have received had he accepted the Best Wrecking job should be used as an offset from 1 June 1979 through 30 June 1982, and that the estimated earnings he would have received had he remained employed by Detroit City Dairy should be used as an offset from 1 July 1982 through 18 July 1985.

B. The Formula

The formula used by the General Counsel to determine gross backpay was based on the weekly gross earn-

[22] The General Counsel clearly concluded that Brown refused an offer of a comparable job by Best Wrecking in May 1979. As indicated, supra, I do not credit Brown's claim that he was not qualified to operate Best's equipment.

[23] Brown's hourly rate when he was terminated by City Disposal was $6.50.

[25] See R. Exh. 20, which reveals Detroit City Dairy advertised for drivers, inter alia, on 7 March 1982, 16 May 1982, and 27 June 1982.

ings of what the Region deemed to be a representative group of four respondent drivers. Vacation moneys received by the drivers were included, but no allowance was made for time drivers spent away from work on vacation because Respondent's records do not reveal when vacations were actually taken by drivers.[26] When a driver failed to work at least 24 of 40 hours in a workweek, or earned less than 60 percent of the average weekly gross salary of drivers in the representative group, no gross earnings for that driver were included in the computation of average gross earnings for that week.

Respondent contends the formula used was inappropriate because vacation moneys were included in the computation, and the representative group was inappropriate. It contends the appropriate formula should be based on the gross earnings of all seven drivers employed by Respondent during the backpay period. In the alternative, it contends the Region erred by using an inappropriate representative group; that the appropriate group would be composed of the two drivers more senior than Brown and the two drivers who were immediately less senior. In either computation, it would exclude vacation pay as it contends inclusion of such payments artificially inflates the resulting weekly gross earnings of employees. Its preferred formula would ignore the so-called 60-percent rule and divide the weekly gross salaries of all drivers by seven to obtain the average weekly gross salary figure. Its alternative formula would follow the same procedure, but it would have me use seniority as described rather than the four drivers used by the Region. It notes that the four drivers used by the Region in its representative group (Collins, Hamilton, Davis, and Scott) earned more than its remaining three drivers, and each of the employees included in the Region's representative group were junior to Brown in seniority.

Field Examiner Marion Muma, the individual who was primarily responsible for preparing the backpay specification, testified the Region decided to use the above-named drivers as its representative group because she was under the impression Collins and Hamilton were more senior than Brown, while Davis and Scott were less senior. She explained she based her supposition on a list of drivers that Respondent supplied that had the names of Collins and Hamilton immediately above Brown's name, and the names of Davis and Scott immediately below the discriminatee's name. Although Muma testified the list she used had been supplied by Respondent, Respondent's counsel established that Respondent's payroll records that were supplied to the Region and were placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 1 contain the dates of hire of the drivers and reveal that each driver in the representative group used by the Region is junior to Brown.[27] Additionally, the records reveal the gross wages received by Collins, Hamilton, and Davis during the backpay period were higher than those received by Travis, Hill, and Johnson.[28]

The General Counsel defended the Region's decision to include vacation pay in its computations without attributing such payments to weeks drivers were actually absent from work for vacation by observing it was unable to determine when, if ever, employee absences were attributable to vacation. It is undisputed that such information cannot be gleaned from inspection of Respondent's records. Although Respondent is factually correct when it contends that inclusion of vacation payments with the gross weekly salary of a driver during a given workweek inflates the average weekly gross backpay figure used by the Region in weeks when vacation payments were made, inclusion of such payments would appear to distort the amount of backpay due Brown very little if the matter is viewed on an annual basis. This is true because Brown was also entitled to vacation pay and the amount he would have been entitled to receive would have been an amount very close to the sum total of the vacation moneys that are included in the Region's calculations.

Although Muma admitted during her testimony that the Region was of the view, when preparing the backpay specification, that the two drivers more senior than Brown, and the two drivers just below him in seniority would be a representative group, the General Counsel made no attempt during or after the hearing to recalculate gross backpay by using the earnings of Travis, Hill, Johnson, and Collins, rather than Collins, Hamilton, Davis, and Scott. Instead, in his brief, the General Counsel contends that, during his period of employment prior to his discharge, Brown was the second highest earner employed by Respondent and the Region could have justifiably utilized only Davis' earnings to determine gross backpay due during the backpay period as he was the second highest paid employee during the period. That being the case, he argues Respondent should not be permitted to complain because the use of weekly earnings of the four employees in the representative group used produces figures that are more favorable to Respondent than those that would have resulted had Davis' wages only been utilized. Inspection of Respondent's pay records reveals Brown was Respondent's highest paid driver in 1977 and he was its second highest paid driver in 1978.[29]

After careful review of the record, I conclude the formula used by the Region to estimate weekly gross backpay is an appropriate formula. Noting the record reveals Respondent utilizes an incentive system to compensate its drivers, it is clear it would be impossible to predict the precise monetary gross weekly earnings Brown would have earned during each week of the backpay period because his earnings would have been determined by the [26] Drivers are entitled to take their vacation pay without taking days off as vacation time, and the record reveals many drivers exercise that right.

[27] The record reveals the dates of hire for the seven drivers and Brown are: Travis, 3 March 1972; Hill, 9 October 1973; Brown, 1 November 1976; Johnson, 27 December 1976; Collins, 3 January 1977; Hamilton, 7 November 1977; Davis, 10 April 1978; and, Scott, 11 November 1978.

number of loads he hauled. The record reveals, however, that he was a hustler while employed by Respondent, as evidenced by the fact that he was the highest paid driver in 1977 and was the second highest paid driver in 1978. That being the case, I find the representative group used by the Region was an appropriate representative group. Similarly, my review of the record causes me to conclude that the Region was justified in using its 24-hour and/or 60-percent rule in making its calculations. In this respect, the record reveals that some of the drivers employed during the backpay period experienced lengthy absences from work.[30] On the other hand, it reveals that Brown missed no time whatsoever during calendar year 1978, and he missed no work in 1979 through the date of his discharge. Patently, it would be unfair to include lengthy absences of drivers employed during the backpay period when computing the weekly gross backpay Brown would have probably earned. Finally, as noted, inclusion of vacation moneys in the Region's formula did not materially distort the estimated weekly gross backpay that would have been earned by Brown as he, too, was entitled to vacation pay in the approximate amount that was entered into the calculations.

For the reasons stated, I find the formula utilized by the Region to compute estimated weekly gross backpay was appropriate.

C. Calculation of Backpay Due

In accordance with the above stated findings and conclusions, the backpay due James Brown is computed in the manner set forth.

Since the record merely reveals Brown was offered a job by Best Wrecking in May, and the specific date the offer was made was not established, I resolve the resulting ambiguity in favor of the discriminatee and treat the offer as having been made on 31 May 1979. If the offer had been made at that time, Brown would have normally commenced work with Best Wrecking on 1 June 1979. In the situation described, the discriminatee would be entitled to the net backpay for quarter 2, 1979, set forth in the backpay specification, as amended.

Regarding to quarters 3 and 4, 1979, all quarters in 1980 and 1981, and quarters 1 and 2, 1982, the actual quarterly earnings of Best Wrecking employee Steve Brousseau will be used as an offset that is deducted as interim earnings from the gross backpay amount set forth in the backpay specification, as amended, with the following exception. As the record reveals, Brown was incapacitated during the period extending from 29 December 1981 through 12 February 1982, and received workers compensation for that period; no backpay is awarded for the six week period described.

Regarding to quarters 3 and 4, 1982, and all quarters in 1983, 1984, and 1985, with the exception of those quarters during which I have concluded no backpay is due because Brown intentionally concealed earnings, the record reveals Detroit City drivers worked 60–65 hours a week and earned the following hourly rates: 1982—$7.80; 1983—$7.90; 1984—$8; and 1985—$8.25. Accordingly, I compute the offset for the applicable periods by using the following formula: hourly rate x 40 + 1 hourly rate x 20 x 13 = quarterly interim earnings/offset.

For the reasons stated, I compute the net backpay due James Brown, excluding interest, is as follows

Period	Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings/Offset	Net Backpay
1979/2	$1,124.45	0	$1,124.45
1979/3	5,839.92	$7,324.25	0
1979/4	6,253.50	5,716.50	564.21
1980/1	5,108.45	6,347.77	0
1980/2	5,802.67	7,665.00	0
1980/3	6,012.35	6,573.00	0
1980/4	6,253.50	4,093.96	2,159.54
1981/1	5,935.64	6,648.19	0
1981/2	7,036.79	7,058.75	0
1981/3	7,096.83	8,278.64	0
1981/4	7,409.86	7,571.04	0
1982/1	6,162.34	4,762.08	1,400.26
1982/2	7,625.38	6,210.44	1,414.94
1982/3	7,799.53	7,098.00	701.53
1982/4	7,043.29	7,098.00	34.42
1983/1	[31] 3,162.00	7,189.00	0
1983/2	7,247.17	7,189.00	58.17
1984/1	7,148.10	7,280.00	0
1984/2	8,407.09	7,280.00	1,127.09
1984/3	7,811.59	7,280.00	531.59
Total			$9,416.20

Accordingly,[31] I find the total backpay due Brown by Respondent is $9416.20, exclusive of interest.

[30] See schedule A of the backpay specification, which reveals, inter alia, the following employee absences: 1979—Scott—16 weeks, Collins—8 weeks; 1980—Scott—7 weeks; 1981—Collins—11 weeks, Scott—4 weeks; 1982—Davis—3 weeks; 1984—Hamilton—15 weeks; 1985—Davis—4 weeks.

[31] Gross backpay figure set forth in G.C. Exh. 2 reduced by $2707 which represents 6 weeks during which discriminatee was incapacitated and received workers compensation.

ORDER DENYING PETITION TO INCREASE MAXIMUM RATE OF ATTORNEY FEES

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Pursuant to Sections 102.124 and 102.146 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, on June 23, 1988, Image International, Inc. and its Attorney Charles Robinson Fawsett filed a petition to increase the maximum rate of attorney fees payable under the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) from $75 per hour to rates of $95, $100, and $120 per hour for fees charged and paid between July 1, 1982, and September 1, 1983.[1]

The petition alleges that such an increase is justified on the grounds that the work performed by Fawsett was "highly specialized work in the field of labor relations law," that Fawsett was one of only approximately six attorneys in central Florida qualified to perform the work, and that the petitioned-for rates are in accordance with rates charged by management labor relations attorneys in central Florida for similar work during the relevant period.

Having duly considered the matter, we find that the petition should be denied. EAJA, 5 U.S.C. § 504(b)(1)(A), provides that attorney fees shall not be awarded in excess of $75 an hour "unless the agency determines by regulation that an increase in the cost of living or a special factor, such as the limited availability of qualified attorneys or agents for the proceedings involved, justifies a higher fee."[2] The petition here does not allege that an increase in the cost of living justifies a higher fee. Nor does it identify a "special factor" within the meaning of the statute which would justify a higher fee. As recently indicated by the Supreme Court, the "special factor" exception was intended to be applied narrowly; an increase is not justified under the exception merely because a distinctive knowledge or specialized skill would be useful, as opposed to needful (as in patent law), in litigating the case, because lawyers having such a useful knowledge or skill are in short supply, or because the prevailing market rate for the tendered legal services is higher than the maximum rate.[3]

Accordingly, as the petition fails to allege any basis permitted under the statute for an increase in the maximum rate, the petition is denied.

[1] An application for fees and expenses incurred in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding (288 NLRB 1036 (1988)) was filed simultaneously with the petition. By order dated June 27, 1988, the Board referred the application to the administrative law judge for appropriate action.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On January 20, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvack issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions with supporting brief and a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Contrary to the dissent, we adopt, for the reasons stated by the judge, his conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to execute the draft contract submitted to it by the Union. In so doing, we agree with the judge that the Union's "acceptance," based on that draft contract, of the Respondent's final offer, seriously altered the intent and meaning of the Respondent's final offer with respect to both the issue of pension plan language and the issue of the preamble language concerning the Association's contract amendment dates. We also agree with the judge that the submission of the draft contract was calculated to suit the Union's purposes. The dissent concedes that the Respondent was not obligated to execute the draft contract the Union submitted, contrary to the alleged violation in the complaint and the theory on which the General Counsel proceeded at the hearing. In the circumstances here, we cannot agree with the dissent's implicit finding that there was a true meeting of the minds between the parties on the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement. Nor can we subscribe to the dissent's apparent view that a binding agreement was reached without regard to the Union's draft contract, merely because the Union indicated it accepted the Respondent's offer, or that the discrepancies between the draft contract and the Respondent's offer simply constituted minor deviations from an agreement previously reached.

Accordingly, we further agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent did not later unlawfully withdraw recognition from the Union based on the subsequent receipt by the Respondent of the employee petition and by its subsequent conduct.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would find that the parties reached agreement on the Respondent's contract proposal and, therefore, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to execute a contract embodying the agreed-on terms.

The judge found that after several bargaining sessions, the Respondent on August 6, 1986, presented its final proposal in writing through a mediator. Reluctantly, the Union submitted the proposal for a ratification vote in September 1986. The employees overwhelmingly accepted the proposal. On September 21 or 22, 1986, the Union mailed a letter advising the Respondent that "your offer has been accepted."

On December 1, 1986, the Union delivered to the Respondent a document purporting to incorporate the terms on which the parties had agreed. In fact, this draft contract differed from the parties' agreement in several respects. On December 12, 1986, the Respondent received a petition signed by a majority of employees stating that they did not wish the Union to represent them. The Respondent thereafter refused to recognize the Union as the employees' bargaining representative.

The judge found that two of the differences between the Union's contract draft and the Respondent's final proposal evidenced that there was no meeting of the minds between the parties, and he concluded that the Union's acceptance did not reflect a true agreement. The judge also found, however, that the Respondent's proposals concerning the two differences (specific language for the pension clause and the preamble) were clear, consistent, and unchanging, and that the Union's representative understood or reasonably should have understood these proposals. I agree with the General Counsel that the judge's conclusion is inconsistent with his factual findings.

The Respondent's final written proposal was a complete package. The document referenced an earlier written proposal, which explicitly stated the Respondent's position on the two items over which the judge finds there was no agreement. The Union specifically accepted the Respondent's final offer. In light of the offer and acceptance, there was a binding agreement between the parties.[1]

[1] The judge made what appears to be contradictory credibility resolutions concerning the union agent's conduct. The resolutions, however, pertain to the agent's actions after accepting the Respondent's final proposal. Despite the judge's confusing credibility resolutions, one thing remains constant: the Respondent's proposal was clear on the pension language and the preamble. Whether the Union misremembered or deliberately attempted to change the agreement when it typed the draft contract is irrelevant.

The Respondent, of course, is not obligated to execute the draft contract the Union submitted.[2] However, once reaching agreement, the Respondent was statutorily obligated to assist the Union in reducing it to writing.[3] Instead of pointing out the discrepancies to the Union, the Respondent subsequently refused to recognize the Union. By its conduct in withdrawing recognition and failing to assist in reducing the agreement to writing and signing the agreement, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I would find this conduct, as well as the Respondent's subsequent direct dealing, unilateral changes, and failure to provide requested information, violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

[2] My colleagues state that the complaint and the General Counsel's litigation strategy limit the issue in the case to whether the Respondent violated the Act by refusing to execute the draft contract the Union submitted. This is too restrictive a reading of the complaint in light of the record. Even the judge recognized that the General Counsel's case encompassed whether the Union accepted the Respondent's final proposal. Further, as the majority concedes, the hearing fully aired the meeting of the minds issue.

[3] See, e.g., Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908, 911–912 (1981), enfd. 696 F.2d 931 (11th Cir. 1983). My colleagues misunderstand the purpose of this citation. Given the judge's findings, which I believe support the conclusion that the Union accepted the Respondent's final proposal, the Respondent was obligated to work with the Union in reducing the final proposal to writing, whether the discrepancies between the Union's draft contract and the final proposal were minor deviations.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVACK, Administrative Law Judge. Based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on February 18, 1987, by Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local 50, affiliated with Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union), the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint in this matter on March 20, 1987, alleging that Castro Village Bowl (the Respondent) had engaged in, and was engaging in, acts and conduct[1] violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent timely filed an answer, denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices. The matter was scheduled for trial and heard by me on July 29 and 30, 1987, in Oakland, California. At the trial, all parties were afforded the opportunity to examine and cross-examine the witnesses, to offer into the record all relevant evidence, to argue their legal positions orally, and to file posthearing briefs. The latter documents were filed by counsel for the General Counsel and by counsel for Respondent and have been carefully considered. Accordingly, based on close scrutiny of the entire record, including the briefs, and my observation of the testimonial demeanor of the several witnesses, I issue the following

[1] The Regional Director issued an amendment to the complaint on May 29, 1987, substituting a new par. 10. Respondent timely denied those allegations.

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a California corporation and has an office and place of business in Castro Valley, California, where it is engaged in the operation of a bowling alley/snackbar/lounge facility. During the 12-month period immediately preceding the issuance of the instant complaint, in the course and conduct of its business operations, Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and purchased and received goods and service valued in excess of $5000, which originated outside the State of California. Based on the foregoing, Respondent admitted that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties stipulated that the Union is now, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ISSUES

The General Counsel contends that, after bargaining for a successor collective-bargaining agreement, Respondent submitted a final offer to the Union on August 6, 1986; that after the bargaining unit employees ratified the offer the Union, by letter to Respondent, accepted it; that the Union thereafter drafted and delivered to Respondent on December 1, 1986, a contract, embodying the terms of Respondent's final offer, and a cover letter that invited the latter to inform the Union of any drafting errors; and that Respondent subsequently embarked on acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, including (1) refusing to execute the memorialized agreement, (2) withdrawing recognition from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain of its employees, (3) refusing to honor the hiring hall provisions of the expired and new agreements, (4) bypassing the Union and dealing directly with its bargaining unit employees concerning a new health and welfare plan, (5) making unilateral changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment, and (6) failing to provide necessary and relevant information to the Union. Denying the commission of any unfair labor practices, Respondent argues that the Union never notified it of the acceptance of the August 6, 1986 final offer and that, assuming arguendo, the Union did inform Respondent of the acceptance of the latter's final offer; the memorialized version of such contains significant errors of substance so as to establish that there never was a meeting of the minds on the terms of Respondent's final offer and to relieve Respondent of the obligation to execute the delivered contract. Therefore, according to Respondent, inasmuch as it entertained a good-faith doubt of the Union's status as the majority representative of its bargaining unit employees, it lawfully withdrew such recognition from the Union on or about December 19, 1986, and was no longer under any duty to bargain with it as the representative of its employees. Regarding the latter contention, the General Counsel contends that a binding agreement was reached between the Union and Respondent and, assuming arguendo, the latter was not obligated to execute the contract that was delivered to it on December 1; Respondent remained obligated to recognize the Union's status as the bargaining representative of its employees.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

Respondent operates a bowling alley/snackbar/lounge facility in Castro Valley, California. Alan Held is the president and manager of the entity, a California corporation. On March 14, 1979, Held executed a memorandum agreement, recognizing the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of a unit, including all full-time and regular part-time cocktail waitresses, bartenders, and culinary employees and excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, and agreeing to be bound by the terms and conditions of employment established by the then-existing collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the East Bay Restaurant Association. There is no dispute that Respondent remained bound to successive contracts between the Association and the Union with the most recent expiring, by its terms, on August 6, 1986. Exercising its contractual right to do so, Respondent, by letter dated May 22, 1986, informed the Union that it wished to terminate or modify the existing contract and to commence bargaining for a successor agreement. By return letter dated June 6, the Union stated it was willing to enter into contract negotiations with Respondent.

The record establishes that representatives of the Union and of Respondent met and bargained on five occasions during July and August 1986.[2] The main spokesperson for the Union was its secretary/treasurer and business manager, Peggy Turner, and the spokesman for Respondent was its labor relations consultant, H. Sanford Rudnick. As the negotiations progressed, according to Turner, the main areas of dispute were readily apparent: seniority (Respondent demanded that an employee's ability to perform be equated with his date of hire as criteria), wages (Respondent proposed a two-tier wage system), the pension plan, vacation pay (Respondent proposed straight time rather than the existing time and a half), cost-of-living, health and welfare, successorship, and contract term. With obvious disagreement over each of these issues, the parties met on August 6, 1986, the expiration date of the East Bay Restaurant Association contract, with a mediator. Rather than meeting across the table, the parties were placed in separate rooms, with all bargaining conducted through the mediator who shuttled back and forth from one party to the other. Rudnick submitted a document, Joint Exhibit 3, to the union representatives, which document set forth Respondent's positions on the major issues. As the bargaining progressed, Respondent modified some of the positions and remained steadfast on the others. Ultimately, through the mediator, Rudnick informed Turner that she should consider the document as Respondent's "Final Proposal" in the negotiations,[3] with such noted on the document. Because Respondent's positions were not acceptable to the Union, Turner informed Rudnick that the entire offer was rejected. However, she also told Respondent, through the mediator, that its entire proposal would be submitted to the bargaining unit employees albeit with a recommendation to reject it.[4] Finally, Held, who was present, testified that he was informed by the mediator that the Union would notify him of the result of the ratification vote.

Whatever commitment she may have given Respondent, the record reveals that Turner clearly did not consider the holding of an employee ratification vote her highest priority and did nothing, at first, about scheduling one. Indeed, believing that Respondent had engaged in bad-faith bargaining, Turner instructed the Union's attorney to file an unfair labor practice charge against Respondent, and he did so on August 28.[5] Asked during cross-examination if she meant to hold the ratification vote, Turner conceded that "I was waiting to see what happened with the charge" and that it would have been against her wishes. Further influencing her reluctance to schedule such an event were pending contract negotiations "in other houses," which may have been influenced by the terms of Respondent's final offer if ratified, and an ongoing strike by union-represented employees against the employer-members of the East Bay Restaurant Association. Ultimately, however, Turner was pressured into changing her mind. Thus, at the September monthly membership meeting, "the manager's wife and another girl had shown up and kept insisting that they had the right to a ratification vote."[6] After consulting with the Union's attorney, who advised her to do so, Turn unenthusiastically scheduled a ratification vote. The record further reveals that the voting occurred during separate sessions on September 18 and 19. As she had stated to Respondent, Turner, at each meeting, told Respondent's employees "to turn [the offer] down for right now." Nevertheless, Respondent's "Final Proposal" was ratified by its employees by a vote of 8 to 1.

Turner testified that as the bargaining unit employees had accepted Respondent's final offer the Union had no option but to likewise accept it. Accordingly, "I pre-

[2] The specific meeting dates were: July 14, 22, and 24 and August 4 and 6.

[3] It apparently was understood that incorporated with the final proposal were Respondent's prior positions on all other areas of the contract, areas of minor significance, no disagreement, or over which there had been little, if any, discussion.

[4] There is no evidence that ratification was to be the established method by which Respondent's contract proposal would be accepted or rejected. Turner testified, without contradiction, that the matter was never discussed. She added that the offer was submitted to Respondent's employees only because such was the Union's "standard operating procedure."

[5] The charge alleged that Repsondent engaged in conduct violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

[6] The manager's wife is Pam Phippen. She is a bartender and is included in the bargaining unit.

pared a letter to Mr. Held," accepting Respondent's "Final Proposal." She testified that, on Sunday, September 21,[7] in the course of completing work at the Union's office she typed a letter to Held, "made copies for our files and then put it in an envelope," on which she had typed Repsondent's address. Thereupon, Turner added, she placed the envelope on top of the office postage meter.[8] An alleged photocopy of this letter was offered and placed in evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 5 and states in part: "Please be advised [the bargaining unit employees] voted on and ratified the final offer. This means your offer has been accepted." Barbara Horton, who has worked as Respondent's office clerical employee for more than 10 years, testified that Peggy Turner often works in the office on Sundays, that Turner sometimes types letters, and that Turner "probably puts [any such letters] on the mail machine." Horton further testified that it is customary in Respondent's office that the daily outgoing mail is placed on top of the postage machine; that each day at approximately 4:30 p.m. she puts the envelopes through the postage meter machine; that she bunches the mail and takes the bundle to the post office on her way home; and that any envelope that Turner may have placed on the postage machine Sunday would have remained there until 4:30 p.m. on Monday. While testifying to the foregoing customary procedures, Horton had no recollection of observing any mail on top of the postage machine on the morning of Monday, September 22. However, she also testified that she followed her customary practice that day with regard to placing postage on and depositing the outgoing mail at the post office. Alan Held, who is apparently the only individual at Respondent's facility authorized to open mail, denied receipt of the a forementioned letter and asserted that he first became aware of it at the instant hearing.[9] Finally, whether the letter was received by Respondent,[10] there is no dispute that the Union withdrew the August 28 good-faith bargaining unfair labor practice charge.

Subsequent to assertedly indicating its acceptance of Respondent's final proposal by the above-described September 21 letter, according to Turner, the Union received no response from either Held or Sanford Rudnick.[11] Nonetheless, Turner had no doubt that Respondent was aware its bargaining unit employees had ratified the final offer,[12] and she began the task of preparing a draft collective-bargaining agreement, encompassing what Respondent proposed on August 6. Turner testified that at "the end of November" she combined the expired 1983 to 1986 collective-bargaining agreement, the new East Bay Restaurant Association contract, the "best last and final offer" (included in this were the August 6 single-page proposal and Respondent's last detailed proposal, given to the Union on August 4) and a "cover sheet," on which she wrote drafting instructions. She left these documents for the office clerical worker, Barbara Horton, "to make the corrections and modifications" and merge the foregoing documents into a draft agreement, covering Respondent's employees. Admitting that she does not know who typed the document, Turner further testified that, at some point, the draft agreement, between Respondent and the Union, General Counsel's Exhibit 9, came to her desk,[13] that she reviewed the draft for accuracy, utilizing the "same documents" that the secretary used in preparing the contract; and that she prepared a cover letter, which would accompany the contract when such was submitted to Respondent for signature and/or corrections. Thereafter, Turner prepared a manila envelope for mailing to Respondent's fa-

[7] Turner testified that she often works on Sundays to do "catch up work, the work I hadn't gotten to during the week."

[8] Turner stated that it is "her custom for the things that I typed that after I've made the copy and put them in the envelope, I take them back to the top of the machine."

[9] Turner admitted neither sending the original or a copy of the September 21 letter to Rudnick, Respondent's labor relations consultant. Asked to explain why, she explained that she did not believe he was actually Respondent's representative for labor relations and, instead, believed that Rudnick had been helping Respondent out of mere friendship.

[10] Turner readily admitted that the September 21 acceptance letter could have been sent by certified mail but that "I wouldn't normally on a ratification notice." She added that certain types of mail, such as contract reopener letters or draft agreements, are normally sent certified, but not this type. If mail is to be sent certified, rather than doing so herself ("I've never been able to figure that one out. I've tried"), she will "just give [Barbara Horton] a note saying please see to it this goes out certified return receipt."

[11] Turner testified that she telephoned Respondent's facility and left messages for Held to return the calls, but he never did. The latter denied receiving any messages that he return Turner's telephone calls. There is no evidence that either Turner or Held encountered any difficulties, prior to September 1986, reaching each other by telephone.

[12] Based on the fact that Pam Phippen, the wife of the night manager, had attended the ratification vote and knew the result, Turner believed that Respondent likewise knew. In this regard, Held admitted "I heard rumors, yes," and he also admitted informing Rudnick. According to Held, his information never got beyond the rumor stage and remained unsubstantiated. Asked why he never followed up on what concededly was an important matter to him, Held averred that on August 6 the mediator said "that we would hear back from the Union." He added that "Respondent, at all times, was waiting to hear back from them." Therefore, Held continued, he did nothing to corroborate the above rumors.

[13] Asked if she typed G.C. Exh. 9, the secretary, Barbara Horton, said "I don't believe I did. That doesn't look familiar at all." She added that there are typing assignments she is unable to do and that, in such cases, "anybody who's available," including business agents, can type necessary documents. Neither of the business agents who testified at the hearing, Joe Regacho or Joelan Diephius, admitted typing it; thus, the identity of the typist remains a mystery. Assuming that the typed document did not materialize out of some dark void, someone obviously typed it, but I shall not speculate as to the person's identity.

G.C. Exh. 9, which Turner stated is the Union's file copy of the document, bears the signature of Business Agent Joelan Diephius. Turner testified, during cross-examination, that the latter's signature was already on the document when she, Turner, found the newly typed document on her desk. Turner added that it is a normal practice to have a business agent, who is involved in the negotiations and in representing an employer's employees, execute a contract with the company. Turner admitted, however, that Diephius had not been involved in the negotiations with Respondent and that "at the time she was very inexperienced." During redirect examination, Turner testified that she told Diephius to "proof the contract, the prepared document, and if it's okay, sign it and give it back to me." She added that Diephius accomplished her review by "going through my notes."

Contradicting Turner, Diephius stated emphatically that "in late November," Peggy Turner gave her the original version of G.C. Exh. 9, instructing her "to review the contract." Accordingly, using no other documents, Diephius read through the contract mainly "to know what it contained" rather than to check on its accuracy. After reading through it, a task that took her 2 or 3 days, she testified, Turner asked if she had signed it yet. Thereupon, Diephius executed the purported contract and returned it to Turner. Diephius added that she had nothing, at all, to do with the negotiations and did not know why Turner had her review the document or sign it.

cility; however, as she was uncertain how to do certified mail, she held the draft agreement for the regularly scheduled staff meeting the next day at which she would give it to a business agent "to handle."[14] Turner stated that she reviewed the document and prepared the accompanying cover letter[15] on the "Sunday after Thanksgiving," November 30, 1986.[16]

Turner next testified that, as scheduled, a regular Monday morning staff meeting was held at the union office on December 1. Besides herself, present were Business Agents Diephius and Regacho. The meeting occurred in a conference room, and Turner placed the manila envelope, to which the draft contract and cover letter were attached by a paperclip, on the conference table. According to Turner, "I gave [the draft agreement] to Joelan and told her to hand deliver" it to Respondent. The latter placed the documents inside the previously addressed manila envelope.[17] Diephius and Regacho also testified as to the December 1 staff meeting. Initially, each recalled that another business agent, John Quintera, was also present at the meeting. According to Diephius, the meeting began with Turner reviewing the Union's dues delinquency lists, pointing out which delinquencies were in each agent's assigned geographical area of responsibility. In doing this, Turner became "quite upset with Joe Regacho" because "he hadn't collected his dues in quite awhile." Diephius described Regacho as "getting chewed out" by Turner. While the meeting progressed, Diephius observed a cover letter, bearing the Union's letterhead, and a stack of papers beneath it on the conference table in front of Turner. An envelope was next to the documents. Turner placed the papers inside the envelope, handed the closed envelope to Diephius, and "asked me to deliver the contract, the Castro Village Bowl contract and hand-deliver it to the Castro Village Bowl." She added that the envelope was addressed to Respondent. Diephius thereupon left the meeting, went to her desk, compiled a list of her stops for that day, and left the building. Regacho testified that he recalled this particular staff meeting inasmuch as "I got my butt chewed out royally for not picking up dues I was assigned to pick up." He further testified that, at the start of the meeting, he observed a cover letter, addressed to Respondent, a contract, and an envelope on the conference table; that Turner handed these to Diephius; and that Turner instructed the former "that she was to deliver the contract to the employer at the bowl."

Subsequent to the staff meeting, according to Diephius, she spent the remainder of the day "making the rounds" of facilities, at which employees were represented by the Union, in her assigned geographical area, east Concord and Castro Valley. She testified that she arrived at Respondent's facility at 2:15 p.m. and had with her the envelope obtaining the draft contract. "I walked into the north entrance. The door that's in the parking lot. And walked up to the front desk." There were two women behind it. "I asked one of the ladies there to please make sure that Mr. Held gets this, and when I did that . . . I put the envelope on the counter and turned around so that she could read it. She said okay. And then I left out the same door that I came in." As corroboration of Diephius' testimony, counsel for the General Counsel offered as Exhibit 11 Diephius' daily activity report for 12/1/86. On it are listings for "houses visited" and for "purpose/description." For item 10 on the first page, Diephius noted a visit to "C.V. Bowl" at 2:15 p.m. for the following purpose: "Drop off contract." Leora Memory, who works for Respondent at the facility's "main control desk," testified that she would have been on duty at 2:15 p.m. on December 1, that one of her duties is the receipt of mail and other package deliveries, and that "I do not recall anything other than the [regular] mail being delivered" on the above day. Alan Held, as he had regarding the purported final offer acceptance letter, denied ever seeing the originals of either General Counsel's Exhibits 9 or 10 prior to the instant hearing.

The record discloses that, 18 days subsequent to the above-described alleged delivery of the draft collective-bargaining agreement and the cover letter to Respondent's facility, Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the former's waitresses, bartenders, and culinary employees. Alan Held testified that the basis for this act was an employee petition, Respondent's Exhibit 7, which he received on December 15, 1986. According to him, "This was slipped under my door when I walked in on a Monday morning." The document, bearing six signatures, which Held recognized as being names of bargaining unit employees, had the following wording above the signatures: "We the undersigned employees of Castro Village Bowl, members of Culinary Workers, Local 50, as of this date, 12-14-86, no longer wish to be represented by Local 50." Held immediately telephoned Sanford Rudnick to inform him of the petition and, he testified, both men agreed that neither had, as yet, heard from the Union "about our contract." Rudnick then advised Held to authenticate the six signatures, and the latter did so.[18] Four days later, Rudnick, on behalf of Respondent, sent the following letter to the Union:

> Dear Ms. Turner:
> On August 6, 1986 Castro Village Bowl gave the Union its final proposal. Since that date Castro Vil-

[14] During cross-examination, Turner stated that Joelan Diephius was the business agent whom she had in mind to ask to hand-deliver the draft document to Respondent the next day.

[15] A photocopy of the draft document is G.C. Exh. 10. The letter, addressed to Alan Held, reads as follows: "Enclosed please find the prepared signature ready contract between Local 50 and Castro Village Bowl. Please contact me immediately if corrections are needed."

[16] During cross-examination, Turner contradicted herself as to when the asserted draft agreement was prepared. Thus, she stated that she worked at the Union's office on Thanksgiving Day, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, preparing for numerous NLRB hearings, answering correspondence, and "preparing this contract." She added that the typed contract came back to her "sometime during the week after Thanksgiving. So it would be Monday through Wednesday." She further confused matters, testifying that from the time she prepared the contract until the day the typed draft was returned, "probably" 2 weeks passed by.

[17] Subsequently, Diephius reported to Turner that she had, in fact, delivered the contract to Respondent's facility.

[18] Respondent's payroll records establish that, as of December 14, it employed 11 individuals in the bargaining unit represented by the Union.

lage Bowl has not heard whether or not the Union has accepted or rejected its final offer.

However, recently Castro Village Bowl received a petition from the majority of its employees that they do not wish to be represented by your local Union. Since the contract has expired on or about August 6, 1986 and there is no contract in existence, Castro Village Bowl is withdrawing recognition from your Local Union, by virtue of the fact Castro Village Bowl has objective evidence that your Union does not represent the majority of the employees.

Moreover, Castro Village Bowl's, bargaining obligation has ended since your Union no longer represents the majority of the employees.

Thus, Castro Village Bowl will cease making pension and health welfare contributions since it is a violation of federal labor law to make contributions wihtout a negotiated and written labor agreement.

In addition, Castro Village Bowl will be happy to cooperate with the National Labor Relations Board to show its objective evidence.

Turner stated that the Union, in fact, received the aforementioned letter. Believing that the letter's initial paragraph "was more than a lack of communication that right there was a bald-faced lie" and that what came after was also untrue, Turner experienced what she described aa "a temper tantrum" on reading it and knew then that Respondent would likely not execute the draft contract. She testified that, "because I felt that there was a very definite violation of the law here by denying the contract," she contacted the Union's attorney,[19] who told her that he would contact Rudnick. Turner did not know if the attorney ever did so. Asked why she did not contact Held or Rudnick herself, Turner replied that "I hadn't been getting return calls from the employer" and that, in any event, such would have been futile.

There exists no dispute that, subsequent to withdrawing recognition from the Union, Respondent engaged in several acts and conduct consistent with that act. Thus, the parties stipulated that, on or about January 20, 1987, Respondent, via the posting of a notice to bargaining unit employees from Held, solicited the employees to apply for coverage under a new health insurance plan, which was to be implemented by it on February 1, 1987; that, on or about February 1, Respondent made changes in the bargaining unit employees' terms and conditions of employment, including the cessation of health and welfare and pension trust fund contributions on behalf of the employees and the institution of a new employee health insurance plan;[20] and that, since on or about February 18, 1987, Respondent has refused to honor a union request for the names of all current bargaining unit employees. Moreover, in January, Diephius visited Respondent's facility to ascertain whether the latter was employing individuals who were in the bargaining unit but who had not been required to join the Union. She spoke to Held and asked if this was true. Held replied that Respondent no longer had a contract with the Union. On January 16, Rudnick wrote to the Union that Respondent had no contract with the Union, had withdrawn recognition, and was not obligated to adhere to any contractual provisions. In addition, during his testimony, Held admitted that Respondent no longer informs the Union of new hires; nor does it any longer utilize the Union's hiring hall for prospective employees.

In further support of its contention that no unfair labor practices have been committed, Respondent offered the testimony of Sanford Rudnick who described several discrepancies between the draft contract, which was submitted to it for signature by the Union (G.C. Exh. 9), and the August 6, 1986 final offer, the existence of which assertedly abrogate any obligation Respondent may have been under to execute the document. Initially, Rudnick stated that the wording of part (b) of section 36, the pension plan provision of the purported draft agreement, erroneously states: "New Hires will not receive said bonus until they have completed one year of service with the Employer." According to Rudnick, at the parties' negotiating session on August 4, 1986, he presented the union representatives with Respondent's proposal 4, which included a revised pension plan proposal. Rudnick testified that prior to the commencement of the meeting he noticed that the language proposal for part (b) was incorrect and instructed his secretary to type a corrected version of the proposal, changing the word "bonus" to "pension."[21] Thereupon, he entered the meeting room with both the incorrect and corrected versions of proposal 4 and inadvertently distributed the incorrect versions to the union representatives.[22] Rudnick continued, stating that he immediately informed the union representatives of the correct wording of part (b) of the pension plan proposed language, and "I believe I gave them the [19] Asked if she was certain that she spoke to the Union's attorney with regard to Rudnick's letter, Turner said such would have been "standard operating procedure" in this type of case. Asked again if she was certain, Turner averred "not without looking in our file." She reiterated that she did speak to the attorney because the instant unfair labor practice charge was filed.

[20] In arguing that the Union never informed it of the acceptance of its final proposal and never either drafted or delivered a draft agreement to its facility, Respondent offered the testimony of Kathy Corcoran, who is employed by the administrator of the restaurant and tavern health and welfare trust fund. She testified that, pursuant to negotiations, the employer-members of the East Bay Restaurant Association commenced paying an increased health and welfare rate per employee during the fall of 1986. Aware that Respondent was continuing to make payments at the expired contractual rate, Corcoran advised the Union that Respondent had become delinquent in payments. On January 21, pursuant to a memo from Diephius and Turner, Corcoran was informed that the contract between Respondent and the Union provided for no increase in the monthly contribution rate. This was the first instance that Corcoran learned of the existence of a new agreement between the parties. Asked by me if it was usual or unusual that the Union would delay informing her of the existence of an independent contribution rate, Corcoran stated, "It's usual that I would not have been notified by the Union right away." She added that the Union "eventually" would have done so and did do so in this case.

[21] Of course, the language of part (b) as it appears in G.C. Exh. 9 makes no sense in the context of part (a). However, Respondent's initial pension proposal was to delete the expired contractual language and replace it with a monthly bonus payment to employees in lieu of a pension plan.

[22] Rudnick explained that he probably distributed the incorrect version "because they just got mixed up. I had about 15 different proposals together at the same time."

corrected copy as well. Because I always in negotiations, try to give the [Union] the exact proposals which I make up."[23] In Rudnick's view, the failure of General Counsel's Exhibit 9 to include the change from "bonus" to "pension" constituted a "major" error because Respondent had initially proposed "giving the employees a bonus in lieu of a pension," and the Union had rejected it. Peggy Turner, during rebuttal examination, specifically denied that Rudnick ever advised her that in part (b) of Respondent's proposal 4 pension plan language the word "bonus" should be changed to "pension," either orally or in writing. She added that the only form of the proposal she was given is General Counsel's Exhibit 7, and that it was utilized in the drafting of the contract for Respondent. Analysis of it establishes that the pension plan part (b) language is identical in both documents. Turner further stated that her understanding of part (b) is as follows: "It's saying the new hires wouldn't be getting a pension. They get a bonus."[24]

According to Rudnick, another serious discrepancy between the purported contract and Respondent's final proposal exists with regard to the pension plan. Thus, Respondent's proposal 4 pension plan language reads in part: "No change in Pension Plan, the Employer will contribute $11.00 per month to each employee for pension. There will be no increase in pension contribution." General Counsel's Exhibit 9 does not contain the words, "There will be no increase in pension contribution." As to this, Rudnick testified that the foregoing "was a proposal to be put into the contract." He added that the sentence was orally proposed by him at the parties' July 29 bargaining session as an insertion after the sentence defining Respondent's contribution rate. Rudnick explained that he proposed this language "because I didn't want the pension trustess to make any further increases during the term of the contract. So I thought that would be an important aspect of the pension provision." He claimed that the sentence clearly was part of Respondent's final offer and its absence a "major" mistake in General Counsel's Exhibit 9, inasmuch as "it would have been a possibility" that the pension fund trustees could conclude that the Employers' contributions be increased. Peggy Turner did not dispute the existence of the above language in Respondent's proposal 4 but denied that Rudnick said he wanted the words to be included in the formal agreement—"[Rudnick] just said that they would continue to pay the $11 a month." She conceded, however, that Rudnick did say that there would be no increase in the pension contribution; she interpreted Rudnick as meaning "just that we would continue with the current language and current contribution rates." Turner further denied that Rudnick ever expressed a concern that the trustees would ever raise Respondent's contractual contribution rate and disputed the latter's stated fear that the trustees were empowered to do so. Thus, she testified, there are no provisions in the pension trust fund's declaration of Trust, granting trustees the authority to raise the levels of employer contributions as set forth in collective-bargaining agreements.[25] Turner, who is a trustee of the pension trust fund, conceded that from time to time the fund's trustees do amend the trust agreement, but did not know if they were empowered to amend the provisions of article IV, section 4.4(b).[26] She also admitted, during cross-examination, that Rudnick was concerned with trustee actions that would raise Respondent's health and welfare trust fund contribution, but denied that he expressed a like concern regarding to the pension contribution.

The third alleged discrepancy between the draft collective-bargaining agreement and Respondent's August 6 final offer concerns the preamble to the contract. Thus, the preamble to General Counsel Exhibit 9 reads, as follows:

> THIS AGREEMENT made and entered into by modifiction and amendment August 7, 1986 and is previously amended August 7, 1983, August 7, 1982, August 7, 1981, August 6, 1977, September 12, 1973, July 7, 1970, July 7, 1967, July 7, 1964 and July 7, 1958 by CASTRO VILLAGE BOWL (hereinafter referred to as the "Employer") and [23] Analysis of the record establishes that Rudnick never exhibited certainty as to presenting to the union negotiators corrected copies of proposal 4, in which the pension plan proposal part (b) contained the word "pension" rather than "bonus." Pressed on the matter, he would qualify his answer with such phrases as "To the best of my knowledge . . . I believe . . . and I can't remember specifically." In contrast, he continually expressed certainty that he orally communicated the language change to the union representatives.

[24] During cross-examination, Turner conceded only that Respondent's bonus language proposal was withdrawn as to part (a) of the pension proposal. In support of her position, she added that, "A union representative wouldn't give up the pension and give a bonus instead we would want more money going into the pension for the fund to be stronger."

[25] The pension trust, established under the East Bay Restaurant Association successive collective-bargaining agreements with the Union and to which Respondent would have remained bound under the purported agreement, was created in 1971. Art. IV, sec. 4.4 reads, in part

Section 4.4. The trustees shall receive and collect all contributions due and payable by Employers to the Trust Fund.

(b) The amount of the contributions for each employee covered by a collective bargaining agreement shall be determined by the collective bargaining agreement and such amount shall be subject to change under amendment to the collective bargaining agreement and under subsequent collective bargaining agreements. The amount of the contributions for each employee not covered by a collective bargaining agreement shall be subject to the determination and discretion of the Trustees.

[26] Art. VII, sec. 7.1 of the pension trust fund declaration of trust reads, in part

ARTICLE VII
AMENDMENT AND TERMINATION

Section 7.1. The terms of this Agreement or the Trust or the Plan may be amended at any time by an instrument in writing executed by the Signatory Association, or its successors and the Union; provided, however, that the Trustees are hereby authorized and empowered, subject to the limitations hereinafter set forth, to amend this Declaration of Trust, as hereinbelow provided. Amendment of the Trust shall require approval by resolution of the Board of Trustees at a meeting duly called and held and for which five (5) days' written notice has been given, including notice that an amendment of the Trust, stating its general purpose, will be on the agenda. The amendment shall become effective only upon execution thereof, or consent thereto, by a majority of the Trustees. No amendment shall be adopted by the Trustees which:

. . . .

(d) Affects the obligations of an Employer or a Union under a collective bargaining agreement.

> HOTEL EMPLOYEES RESTAURANT EMPLOYEES AND BARTENDERS LOCAL UNION 50, hereinafter, referred to as the UNION.

In contrast, the preamble language of Respondent's proposal 4, which Rudnick testified and the record reveals, is identical to the preamble language proposed by Respondent throughout the negotiations with the Union, and reads as follows:

> This Agreement entered into by CASTRO VILLAGE BOWL (hereinafter referred to as the "Employer") and HOTEL EMPLOYEES RESTAURANT EMPLOYEES AND BARTENDERS LOCAL UNION 50 (hereinafter referred to as the "Union").

Regarding Respondent's proposed preamble language, Rudnick testified that the above-quoted language from the purported draft agreement is similar to that of the prior East Bay Restaurant Association contracts in that the preamble incorporates all the prior agreements between the Association and the Union. He stated, "We wanted an independent agreement without any of the prior amendments that were applicable to the [East Bay Restaurant Association]." He testified further that he expressed this concern to Turner at the "first negotiation" and, subsequently, "I must have addressed that concern throughout." Rudnick added that he told the Union's representatives "that it was irrelevant to have the prior language in the prior years in this particular contract, by virtue of the fact that we wouldn't want to be subject to past practice, and we wanted to start anew." Moreover, according to Rudnick, he meant that Respondent's preamble language should be considered as a proposal by the Union—"that's the reason why I had the preamble." Although conceding that the erroneous preamble language is of "minor significance" in comparison to the pension plan language mistakes, Rudnick stressed its importance as the prior amendments to the East Bay Restaurant Association agreements "could have related to past practice and various other activities that [Respondent] didn't want to be privy to and the language would be interpreted for a collective-bargaining agreement between Local 50 and [Respondent]."[27] Contrary to Rudnick, Peggy Turner testified that the former only demanded that references to the East Bay Restaurant Association be deleted from the agreement's preamble—"That's all I remember of it." Although admitting that Respondent's proposed language never changed, she stated that Rudnick "never said anything about taking [the existing preamble language] out." During cross-examination, she also admitted that Rudnick emphasized Respondent's desire to have a separate agreement, one not tied to the association—"I understood it would be an independent contract."[28] As to the preamble language in General Counsel's Exhibit 9, Turner further admitted that she was responsible for composing it—"I felt that throughout that that's why they were intending, and this is what I perceived the correct preamble to be." She added that the language is consistent with what Respondent proposed, inasmuch as all references to the East Bay Restaurant Association were deleted.

Rudnick pointed out another apparent discrepancy between the draft contract and Respondent's final offer regarding seniority, one of the significant areas of disagreement between the parties during the bargaining. Thus, section 6(a) of General Counsel's Exhibit 9 reads as follows:

> SECTION 6. SENIORITY: (a) In the event the Employer finds it necessary to lay off employees due to slackness of business, such layoffs shall be on the basis of seniority and the ability to perform shall prevail.

In contrast, section 6(a) of Respondent's proposal 4, General Counsel's Exhibit 7, reads in part as follows:

> Section 6. SENIORITY: (a) In the event the Employer finds it necessary to lay off employees due to slackness of business, such layoffs shall be on the basis of seniority and the ability to perform. If employees have the same length of service ability to perform shall prevail.

It is readily apparent that except for the fact that portions of two contiguous sentences were left out of the draft agreement's seniority language, the two above-quoted seniority excerpts are identical. Neither is there no evidence to establish that the discrepancy resulted from a typographical error, which would prove that such was a deliberate rewording of the provision. However, the record does establish that the Union continually refused to accept Respondent's proposed seniority language, arguing, according to Rudnick, "that seniority was a very important part of the contract." Asked how the erroneous language alters the meaning of Respondent's proposed phrasing, the witness replied "this language is confusing. And my language is more specific." Rudnick added that the intent of Respondent's proposal was to enable it to select people for layoff on the combined factors of length of service and ability to perform, [27] Another alleged discrepancy between the draft contract and Respondent's final offer follows from the allegedly erroneous preamble language. Thus, a listing of the amendment dates to the agreement, between the Union and the East Bay Restaurant Association, is found at 21 of G.C. Exh. 9. According to Rudnick, none of Respondent's proposals incorporated such a listing, and while the specific listing was not addressed, the parties' discussion of the preamble language would have indicated that the dates were not meant to be included in a final agreement. He added, "I impressed upon the Union in the very beginning that we wanted to have an independent agreement that was separate and apart from the East Bay Restaurant Association. And prior amendments were ineffective towards this particular agreement." Turner testified that there just was no discussion of removing the amendment dates from the back page.

[28] Nevertheless, asked if she believed that the draft agreement was just one more amendment to a longstanding amended agreement, Turner responded in a manner suggesting what her intent was in drafting revised preamble language—"I felt that that's what we had agreed to at the bargaining table. And that's what I was trying to respect in the final document."

With regard to the listing of previous contract amendment dates, the record established that the practice of the Union and the East Bay Restaurant Association was to list these in the successor contracts' preamble and preceding the signature spaces at the end.

with the latter predominant in cases of equal length of service. In contast, the draft agreement language seems to imply that length of service may be disregarded—"I think that it says you look at the length of service . . . but then you can disregard [it] and [lay off] on ability to perform." However, during cross-examination, when asked if anything in the language of General Counsel's Exhibit 9 would prevent Respondent from considering ability when there is equal length of service in a layoff situation, Rudnick conceded, "[T]here's no prohibition of that." Turner stated that the Union accepted the exact language of proposal 4 and that what appears in the draft contract is the result of a typographical error.

As a final discrepancy between the draft contract and Respondent's final offer, Rudnick pointed to the employer contribution rate per employee to the contractual health and welfare plan as set forth in General Counsel Exhibit 9—$121.21 per month. In contrast, the rate, as set forth in Respondent's final proposal of August 6, was to be frozen at the then current level, which was $181 per month. The record establishes that the amount, set forth in the draft agreement, was identical to that set forth in the 1983–1986 East Bay Restaurant Association contract. Turner conceded that the figure in General Counsel's Exhibit 9 was wrong, asserting that the typist misunderstood what was meant by the instruction, "freeze current level," which language appears, on Joint Exhibit 3, the "Final Proposal." She further testified that the mediator explained what that language meant, and "I took it to be the 181 figure."

B. Analysis

Based on the allegations of the complaint and Respondent's answer, the initial issue for consideration is the matter of the Union's asserted acceptance of Respondent's August 6, 1986 "Final Proposal." At the outset, it is well-settled law that in deciding questions such as involved here, the Board need not adhere to the "technical rules of contract law" and that the rules "do not necessarily control the making of collective-bargaining agreements." NLRB v. Donkin's Inn, 532 F.2d 138, 141–142 (9th Cir. 1976); Ben Franklin National Bank, 278 NLRB 986 fn. 3 (1986); Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co., 251 NLRB 187, 189 (1980). More pertinent to the issues here, a complete package proposal, which is made by one of the parties during collective bargaining, remains viable and, on acceptance in toto, must be executed as part of the statutory duty to bargain in good faith, unless expressly withdrawn prior to such acceptance or "defeased" by an event on which the offer was expressly made contingent at a time prior to acceptance. Ben Franklin National Bank, supra at 992. In the instant matter, there is no dispute that Respondent's August 6, 1986 "Final Proposal" to the Union, although incorporating by reference an earlier proposal, was a complete package contract proposal and one capable of being accepted by the Union. Further, there is no record evidence of any condition precedent to eventual acceptance by the Union. Thus while Peggy Turner through the mediator on August 6 informed Respondent that the latter's offer would be presented to its bargaining unit employees for ratification, her testimony was uncontroverted that such a procedure was never a topic of discussion during the parties' contract negotiations. Accordingly, at all times material, it was within the province of the Union to either accept or reject the August 6 offer.

The General Counsel contends that subsequent to employee ratification of the final offer the Union expressed its acceptance by both Turner's September 21, 1986 letter (G.C. Exh. 5) and the cover letter (G.C. Exh. 10), which accompanied the purported draft agreement and whcih was delivered to Respondent by Joelan Diephius on December 1. Regarding to the September 21 letter, the credibility of Peggy Turner is at issue. Generally, her demeanor while testifying was that of an honest and forthright witness; she impressed me with her candor,[29] particularly regarding her lack of knowledge as to who typed (G.C. Exh. 9) the draft contract, and her authorship of the preamble language in the document. Accordingly, I credit her testimony that on September 21 she composed and typed the aforementioned contract acceptance letter to Respondent, addressed an envelope to Respondent's facility, placed the letter in the envelope, and left the envelope, with the enclosed acceptance letter, on the office postage meter machine, the normal place of deposit for outgoing mail.[30] Although she had no specific recollection of handling a letter addressed to Respondent on September 22, the Union's office clerical employee, Barbara Horton, testified most convincingly as to her normal and routine practice regarding the processing of outgoing mail. Given the undoubtedly large volume of mail that the Union sends each day, it is not surprising that 10 months later she could not recall one particular piece of mail. Notwithstanding my reservations stated during the hearing, there is absolutely no reason to believe that Respondent's letter was not processed in the standard way, and I am convinced that General Counsel's Exhibit 5 was, in fact, deposited in the United States mail by Horton while she was on her way home from work. As in Ben Franklin National Bank, supra, in which a union's acceptance of a contract offer became "operative" on the dispatch of a mailgram, notwithstanding that normal contract law rules are not controlling, I conclude that the Union's acceptance of the August 6 "Final Proposal" became operative when the foregoing letter was placed in the mail. Id. at 986 fn. 3; General Asbestos & Rubber Division, 183 NLRB 213, 218 (1970).[31]

[29] I am mindful of inconsistencies and contradictions in her testimony, particularly with regard to the preparation of the draft contract. Nevertheless, her demeanor was that of a truthful witness, and I so find.

[30] Corroboration for the testimony of Turner comes from her subsequent withdrawal of the refusal to bargain in good faith unfair labor practice charge, then pending before the Board. Certainly, the only event that would have been the Union's acceptance of an offer, which she clearly found objectionable.

[31] I shall not speculate whether Alan Held actually received and read the acceptance letter. Suffice it to say, I was not at all impressed with his explanation for not acting to substantiate the "rumors" he admittedly heard regarding employee ratification of Respondent's offer. Contrary to Held's testimony, I believe it likely that Respondent was well aware of the Union's acceptance either from the September 21 letter or from employee statements. Such would more reasonably account for Held's admitted lack of interest in such an important matter during September and October 1986.

Because of the significant amounts of time consumed by litigation of the matters, the critical issue at this point is not whether Joelan Diephius, in fact, subsequently hand-delivered a draft contract, which embodied Respondent's final offer, to Respondent and, which event I find occurred,[32] or whether Respondent was thereafter obligated either to execute it or, at least, to assist in making necessary corrections, but rather whether the Union's stated acceptance is truly reflective of an agreement by the parties as to the exact terms and conditions of the final proposal. Thus, while acknowledging that the duty to bargain includes the obligation to execute or to assist in reducing an oral agreement to writing, the Board cautions that the "obligation, however, arises only after a meeting of the minds on all substantive issues has occurred." Luther Manor Nursing Home, 270 NLRB 949 fn. 1 (1984); Automatic Plastic Molding Co., 234 NLRB 681, 682 (1978). Moreover, if, as argued by counsel for the General Counsel, the parties truly were in agreement as to all aspects of the August 6 final offer, Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union as the bargaining representative of its cocktail waitresses, bartenders, and culinary employees on December 19 would not have been lawful; for "[O]nce final agreement on the substantive terms was reached, and regardless of the status of any written instrument incorporating that agreement, the Respondent was not free to refuse to bargain even if [the Union] had subsequently lost its majority status." North Bros. Ford, 220 NLRB 1021, 1022 (1975); Belcon, Inc., 257 NLRB 1431 (1981); Utility Tree Service, 215 NLRB 806 (1974). Therefore, I now consider whether, in fact, a true agreement between the parties existed when the Union mailed its purported "acceptance" letter. At the outset, I note that the only objective evidence of an alleged meeting of the minds on the terms of Respondent's final offer is the purported memorialized version of its (G.C. Exh. 9). H. Sanford Rudnick,[33] Respondent's labor relations consultant and its representative during the contract negoitations, testified that the document differed from the terms of the final offer in, at least, six critically important areas. In considering the impact of the discrepancies on the parties' alleged meeting of the minds, I bear in mind the admonition of the Board that it is not the function or responsibility of the administrative law judge to conjure an agreement between the parties. Interprint Co., 273 NLRB 1863, 1864 (1985).

The Board has long held that one party's "inadvertent errors" in a draft agreement or "some minor deviation" therein from proposals submitted by the other party are not indicative of any lack of agreement between the parties to collective bargaining. Taylor Bus Services, 284 NLRB 530 (1987); Fashion Furniture Mfg., 279 NLRB 705 (1986); Shawn's Launch Service, 261 NLRB 836, 837 (1982); Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908, 912 (1981). On the other hand, when a draft contract contains discrepancies that "seriously [alter the] meaning" of a respondent's proposals or when discrepancies "may be traced to ambiguity for which neither party is to blame" or to "differences in the understanding of the parties," the Board will unhesitatingly find a lack of a meeting of the minds and, hence, no true agreement between the parties. Automatic Plastic Molding Co., supra; Oil Workers Local 7-507 (Capital Packaging Co.), 212 NLRB 98, 108 (1974). Analysis of the apparent discrepancies[34] discloses that two discrepancies constitute seemingly inadvertent errors of drafting—mistakes of the type not indicative of a lack of agreement. Thus, General Counsel's Exhibit 9 establishes [32] Bearing in mind her testimonial contradictions, I credit the generally honest and forthright testimony of Peggy Turner regarding to the preparation of the original version of (G.C. Exh. 9) the draft agreement, and to her directions to Joelan Diephius on December 1 regarding the hand-delivery of it to Respondent. Likewise I credit the mutually corroborative testimony of Business Agents Diephius and Joe Regacho regarding the Union's staff meeting on the morning of December 1. Both impressed me as being honest witnesses and are credited herein. Further, I credit the testimony of Diephius regarding the delivery of an envelope, which contained a copy of the draft agreement and a cover letter, to Respondent's facility on that day, and the leaving of the envelope at the main desk. Regarding this, I note that counsel for Respondent did not contest the authenticity of Diephius' activity report sheet for December 1, 1986, a notation on which corroborates her delivery of the contract to Respondent's facility that afternoon. Finally, Respondent's witness, Leora Memory, who is in charge of the "main control" desk, did not deny the delivery of the contract. Rather, she could not recall any delivery that day other than the normal mail.

Although I believe, therefore, that Diephius delivered the draft agreement to Respondent's facility, I note Alan Held's denial of ever having seen G.C. Exh. 9 prior to the instant hearing. As with the September 21 letter, I shall not speculate whether he, in fact, saw it on delivery; nor shall I speculate about what may have occurred at Respondent's facility on December 1 to prevent Held from receiving the draft agreement. I must state, however, that given the alleged discrepancies that exist in the draft agreement, I can perceive of no reason for Sanford Rudnick to have lied to Turner by stating in his December 19 letter that Respondent never received the document. Clearly, as one apparently experienced in labor relations, Rudnick would have immediately recognized the implications of the asserted errors and would not have needed to resort to fabrication about receipt of the document.

[33] As with Peggy Turner, Rudnick's testimonial demeanor generally was that of an honest and forthright witness. I note, however, that the testimony of each was in conflict regarding alleged discrepancies between the draft contract and Respondent's final offer. In such instances, I have credited the testimony of one over the other based on analysis of whose testimony best comports with the record as a whole. It is, of course, not out of the ordinary—and, indeed, quite consistent with human judgment—to credit portions of a witness's testimony and not credit the remainder.

[34] Contrary to Respondent, I do not view the appearance of the word "bonus" in part (b) of the pension plan provision of G.C. Exh. 9 as a discrepancy from Respondent's final offer on that subject; for I do not believe that Rudnick ever advised Turner that the word "pension" shall be substituted for "bonus." Thus, I credit Turner that, during the August 4 bargaining session, Rudnick did not, either orally or by document, state that such a word substitution be made. Noting that the word "bonus" is clearly inconsistent with what comes before it, I found Turner's statement that she would have favored such a change convincing support for my belief that she would have noted the substitution if stated by Rudnick. Furthermore, Rudnick's testimony regarding what he did or said on this subject at that bargaining session was, at best, confused. Moreover, if Rudnick had instructed his secretary to type a revised proposal, which incorporated the word change and which was distributed to Respondent, one would expect that either Rudnick or Turner would have it. No such document was ever offered into the record, supporting my belief that it does not exist. Also, had the union representatives been advised of the word substitution, one would expect Turner to have noted it on G.C. Exh. 7, her copy of Respondent's proposal 4. No such change appears thereon, and I do not believe Turner was ever advised to do so. Accordingly, I believe that, however illogical it seems, Respondent's final offer contained the word "bonus," and that Rudnick never informed Turner that the word should be changed. Essentially, then, the draft contract contained the exact language proposed by Respondent, and if Rudnick meant to substitute "pension" for "bonus," he never so advised the Union.

Respondent's monthly contribution rate per employee to the health and welfare trust fund at $121.21 rather than the amount proposed on August 6—$181, the contribution rate in effect on that date. I credit Turner that she understood that the notation "freeze current level," which appears on the "Final Proposal," meant the $181 figure, and I find that the individual who typed the draft contract obviously misunderstood the language and mistakenly utilized the amount as set forth in the expired East Bay Restaurant Association agreement. Next, the error in the seniority language of General Counsel's Exhibit 9, in which two sentences of Respondent's proposal are combined into one with some language left out, appears to be a simple typing mistake. That is, the typist clearly left out an entire line of Respondent's proposal, not realizing the error inasmuch as the omitted line and the next one both began with the words "perform." Clearly, neither of the foregoing discrepancies bear on the matter of the parties' meeting of the minds, and I so conclude.

Turning to the remaining discrepancies, I am of the firm view that each represents a clear disagreement between the parties over the terms of Respondent's August 6 final proposal. Initially, as to the sentence of Respondent's final offer allegedly not included by the Union in the draft agreement's pension plan provision, "There will be no increase in pension contribution," I note that the sentence appears in Respondent's proposal 4, a document utilized by Turner in preparing the purported draft agreement. Analysis of the respective testimony of Rudnick and Turner on the issue of inclusion reveals profound disagreement. Thus, Rudnick testified that on July 29 he orally proposed that the sentence be included in Respondent's pension proposal and that he, at all times, meant that the above sentence be included in the final contractual pension language "because I didn't want the pension plan trustees to make any increases during the term of the contract." Turner, on the other hand, denied that Rudnick ever said that the disputed sentence should appear in the parties' contract and assertedly understood the sentence as meaning "that we would continue with the current language and current contribution rates." Turner further denied that Rudnick, in presenting Respondent's pension proposal, ever expressed a concern that the pension plan trustees would raise the employees' contribution rate during the contract's term. However, Turner did admit that Rudnick expressed such a concern with regard to potential health and welfare trust fund contribution increases and, believing it likely that Rudnick was similarly concerned with potential actions of the pension plan trustees, I believe Turner was not being entirely candid on this point and do not credit her denial in this regard or as to Rudnick's insistence on including the disputed sentence in the parties' contract. Further, I doubt her asserted understanding that the sentence merely redundantly restated that which preceded it within the pension proposal. Expanding on this dubious contention, counsel for the General Counsel argues that the disputed phrase was "simply instructional" and never intended by Respondent to be included in the contractual pension plan language. I find no merit to this contention. The sentence, in my view, refers not to the stated pension contribution rate, which according to the first sentence of Respondent's pension proposal, would remain unchanged, but to possible future rate increases by the pension plan trustees during the term of the contract. Further, based on Rudnick's credible testimony, the sentence was designed to alleviate his expressed concerned about such a contingency. Clearly, without the inclusion of this or similar language, it might well be successfully argued that the parties never intended to prohibit such future pension rate increases. Therefore, the disputed language appears to have been functional rather than "simply instructional." Nevertheless, counsel, citing Trojan Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 478 (1976), echoing points made by Turner while testifying, argues further that Respondent's above concern was groundless as the draft agreement's pension plan provision specifically refers to the underlying declaration of trust which, it is argued, precludes rate increases not set forth in a collective-bargaining agreement. Counsel for Respondent argues, to the contrary, that the pension plan trustees are empowered to amend this provision and, on their own initiative, increase employer contribution rates beyond established contractual rates and that, therefore, the disputed sentence would protect against this. Turner testified that the trustees have never done so, and counsel for the General Counsel contends that the declaration of trust expressly limits the trustees' power to amend the agreement if such conflicts with the terms of collective-bargaining agreements. While noting on the merits of these opposing views, I need not decide which is the proper interpretation of th declaration of trust; for the disparate arguments conclusively establish the depth of the parties' disagreement over the necessity for the inclusion of the disputed sentence, and, in my view, it is not within the authority of or the function of an administrative law judge either to pass judgment on the rationale underlying Respondent's desire to include contractual language clearly designed to protect its interests or to, as counsel for the General Counsel would apparently have me do, rewrite Respondent's final offer by concluding that the proposed sentence is unnecessary or superfluous. Accordingly, based on consideration of the record as a whole, I conclude that Rudnick, on Respondent's behalf, not only orally specifically proposed the sentence "There will be no increases in pension contribution" as part of the August 6 final proposal on pension plan language but also, at all times, meant that the above-quoted words be included in the parties' final agreement on the provision. I have no doubt and further conclude that Peggy Turner misunderstood or ignored Respondent's desire to have the disputed sentence included in the final offer's pension plan language; either, at the most, ignored Respondent's desire to protect itself from increases in the pension contribution rate by the trustees or, at the least, mistakenly believed that the disputed sentence redundantly reinforced Respondent's proposals that the existing pension plan language and contribution rate remain unchanged; and acted under the assumption that, notwithstanding Rudnick's proposal to include the disputed sentence, such was unnecessary given the wording of the declaration of trust and the trustees' past practice.[35] Accordingly, it cannot be said that the Union's stated acceptance reflected a true agreement—a meeting of the minds—on this aspect of Respondent's final proposal.

Perhaps even more compelling to my conclusion that no true agreement existed between the parties as to the terms of Respondent's final offer is that the East Bay Restuarant Association contractual amendment dates are set forth in the preamble language and at 21 of General Counsel's Exhibit 9, the draft contract. Initially, in this regard, I note that, in prior collective-bargaining agreements between the Union and the East Bay Restaurant Association, the contractual amendment dates were always set forth in the preamble language and immediately preceding the signature spaces; that throughout the instant negotiations for a successor agreement Respondent's preamble language proposals were consistent and unchanging—naming only itself and the Union as the contracting parties and containing no references to the prior Association contracts; that the preamble language was discussed in detail only on one occasion early during the bargaining; that the listing of the prior amendment dates preceding the signatures was not a subject of bargaining; and that Turner composed the preamble language of General Counsel's Exhibit 9, revising what had been Respondent's consistently proposed language. This latter point, I think, is of critical import and brings into question Turner's motivation in revising what was Respondent's clear final offer language. In this regard and as to including the Association contracts' amendment dates in the instant preamble language, Rudnick and Turner gave contradictory testimony. According to the former, he informed Turner that Respondent wanted an "independent" agreement without reference to the prior amendments applicable to the East Bay Restaurant Association, that such were "irrelevant" to the agreement between Respondent and the Union, and that Respondent did not wasn't Association contract past practices to have any precedential value for its contract with the Union. Turner denied that Rudnick wanted anything but the name East Bay Restaurant Association deleted from the preamble language, and stated that the preamble of the draft contract was consistent with what Respondent proposed. Inasmuch as, consistent with Rudnick's testimony, Respondent's preamble language proposals contained no references to the Association contract amendment dates and as she admitted that Rudnick stated he wanted an independent agreement, one not bound to agreements of the East Bay Restaurant Association, I credit the testimony of Rudnick on this point, believing that, at all times, Turner was aware that Respondent desired to have no mention of the East Bay Restaurant Association or of its prior contracts with the Union in the preamble language or anywhere else in the parties' agreement. Further, in stating that she believed the preamble language of General Counsel's Exhibit 9 to be consistent with the intent of Respondent's proposed preamble language, I find that Turner was decidedly disingenuous. Thus, when asked if she believed that the contract between Respondent and the Union was just one more amendment of a longstanding amended contract, Turner replied "that that's what I was trying to represent in the final document." Consistent with this admission and my perception of her as an experienced and knowledgeable union representative, I find that Turner must have been acutely aware that including the prior contractual amendment dates in the draft agreement would enhance her above-stated position and an argument that past practices under the Association contracts were, in fact, of precedential value, a matter about which, I have concluded, Respondent was quite concerned. Based on the foregoing, I find that the preamble language of the draft contract seriously altered the intent and meaning of Respondent's proposed language, was obviously calculated to suit the Union's purposes, and was not inadvertently inconsistent with what Respondent had proposed. In these circumstances, contrary to the argument of counsel for the General Counsel, I cannot conceive that Turner, acting on the Union's behalf, ever, in fact, acceded to Respondent's final offer on this issue, and clearly there was no agreement between the parties on contractual preamble language—despite the Union's stated acceptance of Respondent's final offer.[36] It necessarily follows, I further find, that the Union's listing of the Association contract amendment dates on 21 of the draft agreement likewise was a calculated act and is demonstrative of a lack of a meeting of the minds over their relevancy to a collective-bargaining agreement between only Respondent and the Union[37] and, therefore, over the terms of Respondent's final offer. The foregoing analysis of the parties' significant differences with regard to the disputed sentence of Respondent's proposed pension plan and the inclusion of the East Bay Restaurant contractual amendment dates in the preamble language and elsewhere in the draft agreement conclusively establishes, that, notwithstanding the Union's stated acceptance of the terms, the parties never reached a true agreement—reflective of a meeting of the minds—on the terms of Respondent's August 6 final proposal. Accordingly, Respondent was under no obligation—and com-

[35] Counsel for the General Counsel asserts that as Turner seemingly acquiesced at the hearing to the inclusion of the disputed sentence in the contract, I must find that the parties are in agreement on this issue. However, "the willingness of the union at the hearing to concede that certain [language] should have been included in the contract does not convince [me] that there was a meeting of the minds [at the time of the alleged agreement]." Interprint Co., supra at 1864.

Further, while Turner may have informed the trust fund administrator that the parties' purported contract called for no pension contribution rate increase, such is reflective of no more than the fact that Respondent's final offer proposed the then-existing rate and does not relate to future rate increases.

[36] Contrary to counsel for the General Counsel, Rudnick conceded that the matter of the preamble was of "minor significance" only when compared with the problems with the pension plan. He adequately, in my view, expressed the seriousness of the draft agreement's discrepancy in terms of the precedential value inherent in past practices under the Association contract. Also, contrary to counsel for the General Counsel, Rudnick expressed no indecision as to whether he expressed these concerns to the Union. If he was uncertain of anything, such went to the particular bargaining session at which the subject was discussed.

[37] Although the particular subject of listing the amendment dates at the end of the contract was not discussed by the parties during negotiations, based on the testimony of Rudnick, who I credit on this point, he clearly expressed his opposition to the inclusion of the dates in the parties' contract when he and Turner discussed the preamble language.

mitted no violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing—to execute the draft contract, General Counsel's Exhibit 9. Interprint Co., supra; Automatic Plastic Molding Co., supra at 632; OCAW Local 7-507, supra.

Nineteen days after receiving the draft contract, Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union as the bargaining representative of its cocktail waitresses, bartenders, and culinary workers. According to the uncontroverted testimony of Alan Held, on December 15, he received a petition, bearing the signatures of 6 of the 11 individuals then employed in the bargaining unit, in which the signatories stated their desire to no longer be represented by the Union. Subsequently, on verifying the six signatures as those of the named employees, Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union on the basis of "objective evidence that your Union does not represent the majority of the employees." Board law in this area is straightforward and of longstanding validity. Thus, "the existence of a contract, gives rise to a presumption that the union was the majority representative when the contract was executed and through the life of the contract." Petroleum Contractors, 250 NLRB 604, 607 (1980). Following the expiration of the contract, here, this presumption continues, though rebuttable, and the burden of rebutting it rests with the Employer. To overcome the presumption, attack a union's majority status, and meet its burden of proof, the employer must establish, in a context free of unfair labor practices, either that the union no longer, in fact, enjoys majority status or that the employer has a reasonably based good-faith doubt as to the union's continued majority support. Further, petitions, such as that which was received by Respondent on December 15, 1986, may form the basis for either of the above assertions. Century Papers, 284 NLRB 1151 (1987); Rockwood & Co., 281 NLRB 862 (1986); Master Slack Corp., 271 NLRB 78, 84 (1984); Guerdon Industries, 218 NLRB 658 (1975). Here, Respondent, in its December 19, 1986 withdrawal of recognition letter to the Union, states as the basis for its conduct the Union's actual loss of majority status, as evidenced by te aforementioned petition. Counsel for the General Counsel has neither questioned the sufficiency of the petition nor offered any evidence that such was distributed in an atmosphere contaminated by unfair labor practices, and I find that, inasmuch as the petition was executed by more than half of the bargaining unit employees, Respondent has established that the Union, in fact, lost its majority status. Master Slack Corp., supra. Accordingly, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when it withdrew recognition from the Union as the bargaining representative for its cocktails waitresses, bartenders, and culinary workers.[38]

The remainder of the allegations of the complaint—that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by directly dealing with the bargaining unit employees and, thereby, bypassing the Union; by implementing unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment of the employees; and by failing and refusing to provide information to the Union—are predicated on the Union's continued status as the bargaining representative of Respondent's cocktail waitresses, bartenders, and culinary workers. Inasmuch as the prior contract, to which Respondent and the Union were bound, had expired and as I have previously concluded that there was no meeting of the minds between the parties on the terms of a successor agreement, that Respondent was not obligated to execute the draft agreement, that the Union lost its majority status amongst the bargaining unit employees, and that Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition from the Union as the bargaining representative of the above employees, Respondent was no longer under any obligation to bargain with the Union. Accordingly, it did not engage in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by no longer utilizing the Union's hiring hall, by soliciting the above employees to apply for coverage under a Respondent-sponsored health plan, by implementing changes in their working conditions, or by refusing to honor the Union's request for information as to bargaining unit employees.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Castro Village Bowl, is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2),(6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The General Counsel has not estasblished that Respondent engaged in any unfair labor practices herein.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[39]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[38] Inasmuch as I have concluded that there was not a meeting of the minds regarding Respondent's August 6 final offer, no agreement was reached on the terms of a successor collective-bargaining agreement. Accordingly, the Board's decisions in North Bros. Ford, supra, and Utility Tree Service, supra, are, of course, not controlling.

[39] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Southern Indian Health Council, Inc. and San Diego Medical and Office Employees Independent Union, Petitioner. Case 21–RC–18093

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Roberto G. Chavarry on November 25, 1987. Following the hearing and pursuant to Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board's Rules and Regulations, this case was transferred to the National Labor Relations Board for decision. Thereafter, the Petitioner and the Employer filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error.

The Board has considered the entire record in this proceeding, including the Petitioner's and the Employer's briefs, and makes the following findings.

The Employer, a nonprofit California corporation, is a health care clinic operated by a consortium of seven Indian tribes. The Petitioner seeks to represent a unit including all professionals and nonprofessionals excluding managerial, guards, and supervisory personnel.[1] The Employer filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the basis that it is exempt from coverage under the Act as a governmental entity.

The Employer provides health services for its members and the Indian community in south San Diego County. It receives funding from the Federal Indian Health Service under Public Law 93–638, the Indian Self-Determination Act. It annually purchases goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from outside the State of California and it grosses revenues in excess of $1 million.

Membership in the corporation is limited to federally recognized Indian tribes in San Diego County. The governing body of each of the seven member tribes appoints one director and one alternate to the board of directors. Directors must be members of a federally recognized tribe in San Diego County. Once appointed, a director can be removed at any time by the tribe that appointed him or her.

The board of directors is the governing body of the Employer. It elects a chairman who has general supervision, direction, and control of the business and affairs of the Employer. The board of directors also hires a program director, who controls day-to-day operations. The current acting program director does not belong to any of the seven member tribes.[2]

The board of directors' personnel committee has the power to review employment policies and approve the hiring or termination of certain individuals. The board of directors, as the policymaking body of the Employer, has adopted certain employment policies concerning hiring, promotions, grievances, discipline, terminations, pay, and benefits, which appear in the program administration manual. The grievance procedure makes the board of directors the ultimate arbiter of discipline, termination, and other employment disputes. The board of directors also sets the Employer's salary schedule, pursuant to the Federal general schedule. The board of directors has a policy of giving preference in hiring to Indians, and most of the 31 nonprofessional employees are Indians.

The Employer has all its facilities on the Barona Indian Reservation in San Diego County. The Barona Tribe is one of the members of the consortium. The stated purposes of the Employer are to promote and improve Indian health through a comprehensive health care system provided to members of consortium tribes and other eligible Indians in its service area, to improve environmental health and sanitation conditions on the reservations, and to provide public health services and education to the reservations and the Indian community.

The Employer contends that it is exempt from coverage under the Act because it is controlled by Indian tribes, operates on an Indian reservation, and provides governmental services to tribal members and the Indian community. The Employer states that the result in this case is controlled by Fort Apache Timber Co., 226 NLRB 503 (1976), in which the Board declined to assert jurisdiction over an enterprise owned and entirely controlled by an Indian tribe.

The Petitioner contends that the Employer is not a tribal government entity and thus is under the coverage of the Act. In support of its argument, the Petitioner states that unlike the circumstances in Fort Apache, where employees were on the tribe's payroll and the tribe established all working conditions, here the Employer has a separate payroll from the tribes, and working conditions are set by the program director and the department heads, who are not members of the seven consortium tribes. The Petitioner further argues that article 4, section 6.04 of the Employer's bylaws, which sets forth the qualifications for the board of directors, does not state that a board member must be a member of one of the seven consortium tribes, but states only that a board member must be a member of a federally recognized tribe in San Diego County. Thus, the Petitioner contends that it is conceivable that the board of directors could consist of individuals who do not have a direct interest in the Employer, and that, therefore, the Employer may not necessarily be controlled by tribal entities.

[1] The parties stipulated that professionals will be allowed to vote for inclusion or exclusion in the overall unit, in the event an election is directed.

[2] The program director, at times in conjunction with the department heads, is responsible for hiring nonprofessional staff, granting overtime and annual leave, evaluating employees, disciplining employees, and terminating clinical support staff.

The Petitioner further argues that Devils Lake Sioux Mfg. Corp., 243 NLRB 163 (1979), is controlling here. In that case, a tribal council owned 51 percent of the employer, a manufacturing corporation, and Brunswick Corporation owned 49 percent. The Board concluded that it could assert jurisdiction over the employer because, even though the tribal council owned a majority of the stock, Brunswick controlled the corporation, especially with regard to labor relations policies; thus, the corporation was not a wholly owned tribal enterprise that was completely controlled by the tribal council.

We agree with the Employer that the result in this case is controlled by Fort Apache, and that the Employer is exempt from coverage under the Act. In Fort Apache, the employer was wholly owned and completely directed by a tribal council. All the employees were paid by and worked for the tribe, not the employer, and the tribal council completely controlled the employer's operations and labor policies, although contracting out with an individual person for management services to run the company. The employer operated on the tribe's reservation.

In the instant case, the only members of the Employer are federally recognized Indian tribes, and the directors of the Employer are directly appointed by, and subject to removal by, the governing bodies of the member tribes. Further, the board of directors sets and controls the labor policies of the Employer, and is the final arbiter of discipline and termination issues. Although the Petitioner contends that the Employer's program director and department heads set working conditions, we find that it is the board of directors that establishes and controls significant employment policies. We also note that although the program director controls day-to-day operations, in Fort Apache the tribal council contracted out to a private individual to run the company's daily affairs. Further, although the Petitioner argues that this case differs from Fort Apache in that here the Employer has a separate payroll from the tribes, we do not find this to be a significant difference because the Employer here is still controlled by tribal entities.

In response to the Petitioner's argument that article 4, section 6.04, of the Employer's bylaws does not require that a member of the board of directors be a member of one of the seven consortium tribes, we note that it is the seven consortium tribes that have the power to appoint and to remove the directors and, therefore, we find that the tribal entities have ultimate control over the Employer. Finally, we note that this case is distinguishable from Devils Lake because in that case officials of a private corporation comprised a majority of the board of directors and controlled the company at issue, especially with regard to labor relations policies, whereas here the Employer's policies are controlled by the seven member tribes, who also control the board of directors.

In Fort Apache, the Board found that a tribal council is a "government," and thus that an entity administered by individuals directly responsible to a tribal council is exempt from the Act as a "governmental entity." In the instant case we similarly conclude that the seven-member consortium of tribes, and its enterprise on the reservation that is here asserted to be an employer, are implicitly exempt as governmental entities within the meaning of the Act. Fort Apache, 226 NLRB at 506 fn. 22. Accordingly, we grant the Employer's motion and shall dismiss the petition.

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

York International Corporation and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local No. 1872. Case 4–CA–15760

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a charge filed by the Union, International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local No. 1872, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging that York International Corporation, the Respondent, has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Respondent filed an answer and the Regional Director issued an order postponing hearing indefinitely. Subsequently, the Union, the Respondent, and the General Counsel entered into a stipulation of facts in which they, inter alia, waived a hearing and indicated their desire to transfer this proceeding directly to the Board for findings of facts, conclusions of law, and issuance of an order. On June 4, 1987, the Board, through the Deputy Executive Secretary, issued an Order approving stipulation and transferring proceedings to the Board. Thereafter the parties submitted briefs in support of their positions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Delaware corporation, engages in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of air-conditioning equipment at various plants and facilities throughout the United States, including plants in the York, Pennsylvania area, where it annually ships goods valued over $50,000 directly outside the State. The Respondent admits that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges and the Respondent admits that the Union, International Union Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW and its Local No. 1872, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Reuben R. Barker Sr. was employed as a production employee by the Respondent and was a member of the bargaining unit covered by the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Respondent. In September 1984, Barker was suspended for violation of the Respondent's rules.[1] On September 28, 1984, Barker was terminated after a discharge hearing. On October 3, 1984, Barker filed two grievances over his termination under the then applicable collective-bargaining agreement. The first, Grievance 84–683, alleged that Barker had been unjustly discharged. The second, Grievance 84–685, claimed that the Respondent had allowed various discriminatory practices to continue. Union representative Haven May filed a third grievance, No. 84–689, on October 8, 1984. It alleged that Barker's termination letter was inadequate because it did not state with specificity the reasons for Barker's termination. A fourth grievance, No. 84–681, was filed by employee James T. Hardy Jr. and alleged that Hardy had been reprimanded twice for the same rule infraction.[2]

On October 15, 1984, Barker filed a complaint with the Pennsylvania Human Relations Commission (PHRC) alleging that he had been suspended and discharged because of his race and national origin. On January 22, 1986, Barker amended the PHRC complaint to allege that he had been suspended and discharged also because of his age. On September 28, 1985, Barker, through private legal counsel, filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. The complaint alleged that Barker had been suspended and discharged on the basis of his race, age, and national origin, in breach of his employment contract, and in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The complaint also alleged that Barker's suspension and discharge were outrageous, defamatory, and libelous and caused him emotional distress.

[1] Barker alleges he was discharged for various discriminatory reasons (see infra) and the Respondent alleges he was discharged for threatening to shoot a fellow employee, having a handgun on the Respondent's premises, and falsifying his employment application by failing to list his last employer.

In reaching our decision in this case, we have considered only the evidence contained in the stipulated record. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's motion to strike a portion of the Respondent's brief.

[2] Hardy allegedly made a "false, vicious or malicious statement" about Barker.

During March 1986, Barker and his legal counsel held settlement discussions with the Respondent.[3] On March 19, 1986, Barker, his attorney, and the Respondent executed a settlement agreement by which Barker, inter alia, agreed to waive and release all claims he had filed surrounding his termination (including the grievances). Paragraph 10 of the agreement also requires Barker to keep the terms of the agreement confidential.

Arbitration of Barker's grievances was scheduled for March 19, 1986. At the arbitration hearing, immediately before the hearing was opened by the arbitrator, Barker and his attorney informed the Union and the arbitrator that they had resolved all of Barker's pending claims with the Respondent to Barker's satisfaction and, in view of that fact, Barker wished to withdraw the grievances.

The Union requested disclosure of the terms of the settlement agreement, but Barker and the Respondent refused, citing the confidentiality provisions of the agreement.[4] The Union requested the arbitrator to require the Respondent to disclose the terms of the agreement, and on April 18, 1986, the Union filed the charge that resulted in the instant complaint. Subsequently, the arbitrator ruled he did not have the authority to require disclosure.[5] On or about September 11, 1986, the Respondent revealed all the terms of the settlement agreement with the exception of the monetary amount paid Barker and the provision dealing with the type of employment recommendations the Respondent would give Barker. The Union maintained that this disclosure did not satisfy its request for information and the instant complaint issued on September 30, 1986.

Initially, we must determine whether the requested information is presumptively relevant. Certain types of information (e.g., wages of bargaining unit members) are deemed "so intrinsic to the core of the employer-employee relationship that the information is considered presumptively relevant."[6] In such cases the employer has the burden of showing a lack of relevance, or otherwise must justify its refusal to provide the information. The Union, however, must demonstrate the relevance of information, which is not so obviously related to its performance as a bargaining representative, but which allegedly has become so owing to unusual circumstances.[7]

We do not view the information requested in this case (i.e., the monetary amount and type of employment references given a former bargaining unit member as part of a settlement agreement of various claims including a state administrative complaint and a Federal district court complaint) as being so obviously related to the Union's duty as bargaining representative that it justifies a finding of presumptive relevance.[8] Thus, the General Counsel has the burden of establishing the information's relevance.

The standard for determining the relevancy of the requested information "is a liberal, discovery type test whether the information bears on the union's determination to file a grievance or is helpful in evaluating the merits of the grievance and the propriety of pursuing the grievance to arbitration."[9] Further, we need only find a "probability that the desired information is relevant . . . and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities."[10]

In attempting to establish the relevancy of the requested information, the General Counsel and the Union essentially make two arguments. First, they state that the information is relevant to determining whether the Union should prosecute the grievances. They, of course, make no claim that information about the settlement terms in issue here has any bearing on the merits of the grievances. Thus, even granting that the Union may have an interest in obtaining an arbitral ruling on the substantive and procedural propriety, under the contract, of the Respondent's discharge of Barker, the information at issue here will in no way assist the Union in determining how it might fare before the arbitrator on that question. The General Counsel and the Union argue, rather, that the Union cannot properly decide whether to pursue the grievance on Barker's behalf unless it knows whether the Respondent has already offered him a fair settlement. The problem here, however, is that, as already noted (fn. 3, supra), so far as the record shows, the Union made no objection to the initiation of private settlement discussions between Barker, his attorney, and the Respondent in which the contractual grievances

[3] We are not here presented with the issue of whether the Union was unlawfully excluded from the settlement discussions, or any issue of direct dealing. The stipulations do not show that the Union raised any objection to the conduct of the private settlement discussions. Cf. Postal Service, 281 NLRB 1013 (1986), in which the Board held that a respondent violates Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by not affording the Union an opportunity to be present at the contractual grievance adjustments as required by Sec. 9(a) of the Act.

[4] The Union also claimed that Barker could not withdraw the grievances.

[5] The arbitrator also ruled that the Union had the right to pursue Barker's grievances and that Barker had the right to withdraw from the process.

[7] Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 173 NLRB 172 (1968).

[8] Assuming arguendo that the requested information is presumptively relevant, we would reach the same result in this case by finding that the Respondent has rebutted the presumption.

[9] United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 504, 506 (1985).

could be coupled with Barker's numerous other noncontractual claims—including ones that had already become the subject of court litigation. It could also have been reasonably anticipated that all the claims might be resolved. Those settlement discussions in fact produced a settlement that satisfied Barker, so the Union's real claim as to a continuing interest in how the Barker grievances were settled consists of the impact on the remaining bargaining unit employees of a decision not to pursue those grievances further in the face of the settlement.

That potential impact essentially forms the basis for the second relevancy argument advanced by the General Counsel and the Union. They contend that the settlement may set a precedent for future grievance settlements. The stipulated record in this case shows, however, that in addition to the two contractual grievances filed by Barker, he also filed a Federal district court complaint alleging constitutional, statutory, and common law violations, and a state administrative complaint alleging discrimination based on race, national origin, and age. These multiple claims, involving as they do different forums and divergent issues, preclude a determination of which portion of the monetary settlement, if any, pertains to the contractual grievances and which does not. Thus, the amount of the monetary settlement is of little precedential value to the Union in processing future grievances. As for the term of the settlement agreement dealing with employment references, it is apparent that this is a response to the allegation in the Federal court complaint that the Respondent gave Barker adverse and false employment references, a matter not within the purview of the filed grievances. Consequently, the circumstances of this case are unique, and thus make the requested information insignificant for purposes of future grievance settlements. Therefore, requiring the Respondent to disclose the requested information does not enhance the Union's ability to represent the employees in future grievance settlement negotiations.[11]

Thus, although we need only find a "probability that the desired information was relevant . . . and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities,"[12] we do not reach such a conclusion on the facts of this case.[13]

Accordingly, we grant the Respondent's motion and dismiss the complaint.[14]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER BABSON, dissenting.

I cannot agree with my colleagues that the Respondent lawfully refused to furnish the Union with the complete terms of an agreement that purported to resolve two grievances under the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. I would find that the information sought by the Union, the clauses relating to the monetary settlement and future employment references, is presumptively relevant and that the Respondent has failed to rebut that presumption. Further, even if it can be said that the information is not presumptively relevant, I would find that the General Counsel has established the relevancy of the information sought in this case.

[11] Cf. Columbus Products Co., 259 NLRB 220 (1981) (disclosure of information not required when it added "nothing to the union's ability to evaluate the grievances or intelligently pursue it"); American Standard, 203 NLRB 1132, 1133 (1973) (information of "such picayune significance that there is no basis whatever for concluding that failure to supply it would impede the [u]nion in its proper functioning or that its possession might enable the [u]nion to represent the employees more effectively," need not be disclosed.

[13] Because we have found that the requested information is not relevant, we find it unnecessary to address the Respondent's confidentiality and deferral defenses.

[14] In taking issue with us on the merits of this case, the dissent posits that, because the resolution of contractual grievances is "intrinsic to the core of the employer-employee relationship," the information sought is presumptively relevant. However pertinent that observation is in cases limited solely to contractual grievances, we do not find it apt in this one. Here, we are not concerned with the resolution of a contractual grievance so much as we are with a private settlement that has been reached on matters some of which are related to the subject of the grievances filed and some of which are not. Given that mixture, as we have explained above, the terms of the settlement throw no appreciable light either on whether Barker received fair compensation for his contractual claims (and thus on whether the Union should pursue the grievance because of inadequate compensation) or on what position the Union should take on similar contractual grievances in the future. That the parties have not apportioned among the numerous claims the monetary amount of the settlement does not lessen the validity of our conclusion that the employment reference provision of the settlement is in response to the Federal court complaint. That conclusion reasonably flows from the fact that the employment reference provision addresses an allegation made only in the Federal district court complaint and not in the grievances. Moreover, the amount of the settlement, apportioned or not, and the provision relating to future employment references for Barker, have no bearing, other than tangentially, on the merits of the grievances—which, we are constrained to note, will not likely be decided to the Union's satisfaction without Barker's further participation. This last notation is of interest to the issue of presumptive relevance; for without Barker's cooperation, the information sought, even if provided, is unlikely to resolve the grievances or add to their resolution.

Regarding the dissent's assertion that the requested information is relevant even in the absence of the presumption, we note that in such circumstances it is the union's burden to establish the relevance of the requested information. In this regard, unlike the union in East Dayton Tool & Die Co., 239 NLRB 141 (1978), the Union here has not "expressed concern that it may be required to defend against a charge of unlawful discrimination based on alleged acquiescence in the Respondent's hiring practices. . . .' Essentially, this aspect of the dissent's argument states that the requested information is relevant because the Union must assess the settlement's fairness. As previously stated, there is no indication before us that the Union objected to the settlement negotiations. In any event, we fail to perceive the relationship between the requested information and a possible breach of fair representation claim, especially in light of Baker's approval of the settlement agreement.

The information sought is presumptively relevant because it concerns the settlement of contractual grievances that purportedly arose under the bargaining agreement in effect between the Union and the Respondent.[1] The resolution of contractual grievances is "intrinsic to the core of the employer-employee relationship"[2] and is of vital concern to the parties that negotiated that agreement and are responsible for its administration. To hold that the Union is not entitled to this information is particularly inexplicable, inasmuch as an arbitrator already has ruled that the Union has the absolute right to pursue the grievances notwithstanding Barker's settlement.[3] For the Board to permit the Respondent to withhold from the Union information the Union needs to make an informed decision concerning its further obligations respecting the grievances undermines the Union's ability to intelligently administer the grievance provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement.[4]

Furthermore, the majority's decision understates the practical reality that the settlement of Barker's grievances may serve as precedent to the settlement of future grievances. Settlements of grievances regarding discharge often involve monetary payments and provisions relating to future employment references. Although Barker agreed to keep the terms of the settlement confidential, the Respondent has not, and there appears to be no reason why it cannot use this settlement to its advantage in the future.[5] Although the settlement agreement encompasses several of Barker's claims, contractual and otherwise, this fact goes to show much weight the parties will give the settlement as precedent in future negotiations. In this regard, the majority inappropriately equates the "relevance" of the information to the "importance" of the information and, because the majority concludes that the information is of "picayune" and "insignificant" importance, finds that it is not relevant and the Union is not entitled to it.

Even if the information sought by the Union were not presumptively relevant, I would conclude that the Union has established the relevancy of the information in this case. In East Dayton Tool & Die Co., 239 NLRB 141, 142 (1978), the Board stated that:

> [T]he [u]nion's expressed concern that it may be required to defend against a charge of unlawful discrimination based on alleged acquiescence in [a r]espondent's hiring practices is not inconsistent with its representative function.

This concern implicity supported our conclusion in that case that the information sought was relevant. See also Westinghouse Electric Corp., 239 NLRB 106 (1978), enfd. in relevant part 648 F.2d 18 (D.C. Cir. 1980). The rationale and logic of East Dayton Tool is applicable here.[6] The bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union contains a nondiscrimination clause, and Barker's grievances allege that the Respondent has engaged in discriminatory employment practices. Although Barker has settled his claims against the Respondent, Barker did not waive any claim he may have against the Union if he can establish that the Union violated its duty of fair representation.[7] Thus, the Union has the right to review the terms of the settlement agreement in this case to enable it to satisfy its statutory obligation to fairly represent Barker.

As I conclude that the information sought by the Union is both presumptively relevant and relevant to the facts presented in this case, I would find that the Respondent violated the Act when it refused to furnish the Union with the complete terms of the settlement agreement.

[1] Although the majority contends that this case is "not concerned with the resolution of a contractual grievance so much as . . . a private settlement" of a variety of causes in several forums, which is hardly an unusual phenomenon these days, the practical reality is that this settlement nonetheless affects the Union's ability to pursue grievances filed under the contract. When contractual grievances are involved, the union has a responsibility to exercise its judgment respecting pursuit of those grievances and a continuing obligation to the unit employees to administer the contract. Moreover, whether the light shed by the information requested is "appreciable" is, under the circumstances, a judgment better made by the Union than by the Board. It is apparent here that the Union preferred "some light" to none at all.

[2] San Diego Newspaper Guild v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863, 867 (9th Cir. 1977).

[3] I note that the majority does not rely on the Respondent's asserted defenses that the information is confidential or that the Board should defer this case to arbitration. In this regard, I would find those defenses to be without merit. I also would find that the Union has not waived its right to the information.

[4] In this regard, the majority errs when it asserts that it is "apparent" that the clause in the settlement agreement relating to future employment references is in "response" to Barker's Federal court complaint and thus this information, impliedly, would be of no use to the Union. Because the parties were unwilling or unable to apportion the settlement terms among Barker's claims, the Board has no basis for assuming that the employment reference clause relates solely to Barker's lawsuit rather than his grievances. The Board should not apportion the settlement agreement when the parties have not seen fit to do so.

[5] See Culinary Workers Local 226 (Caesars Palace), 281 NLRB 284 (1986) (in which the Board found that the union violated the Act by refusing to turn over to the employer copies of unpublished arbitration decisions because those decisions could serve as precedent in future arbitrations).

[6] Both the General Counsel and the Union contend that the information is relevant to determining whether the Union should proceed with processing these grievances. That decision can only be made after reviewing the settlement agreement between Barker and the Employer in light of various factors, including the Union's continuing legal obligation to Barker.

[7] Barker's settlement with the Employer obviously does not affect any claims he may have against the Union.

Host International, Inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Marriott Corporation and Virgilio Rizzo. Case 29–CA–11748

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 25, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Winifred D. Morio issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a motion for oral argument. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting and answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, briefs, and motion[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by refusing to hire Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi in 1985, when it took over the operations of Gladieux Corporation at JFK Airport where they were working. We do not agree with the judge, however, that we should set aside the settlement agreement resolving earlier unfair labor practice charges filed by Rizzo and Sarubbi against the Respondent concerning their 1981 discharges from the Respondent's operations at La Guardia Airport. Although the Regional Director could have vacated the settlement agreement because of the later independent unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint here and consolidated both cases for hearing,[4] that is not what he did. Rather, the Regional Director issued a complaint in this case that merely referred to the Respondent's earlier conduct as background for the 8(a)(4) allegations here, and the General Counsel stated a similar position when presenting evidence about the 1981 events at the hearing. As the Respondent had no notice that it might be held accountable for any illegality connected with these earlier discharges, we find no violation of the Act based on the 1981 discharges of Rizzo and Sarubbi.[5] We shall modify the recommended Order, conclusions of law, and remedy accordingly.

Even though we are not setting aside the settlement agreement in the earlier case, we agree with the judge that the Respondent's presettlement conduct may properly be considered as background evidence to establish the motive for the Respondent's postsettlement conduct in this case.[6] Thus, although the 1981 discharges of Rizzo and Sarubbi cannot be made the basis of a remedial order because of the settlement, the events surrounding those discharges can be used to shed light on the Respondent's reasons for refusing to hire them in 1985.[7] We also agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent's refusal to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi in 1985 was not simply the natural result of their original discharges, but rather was a new and independent act of discrimination that occurred after the settlement and, therefore, could be litigated.[8]

Further, we agree with the judge that the facts here do not establish either that Rizzo and Sarubbi waived all rights to future employment with the Respondent during negotiations for a settlement in the earlier case or that the Respondent relied on a mistaken understanding of their waiver when it refused to hire them later. We note that, even if the evidence did show Rizzo and Sarubbi had agreed to such a waiver, we cannot conclude the parties intended the waiver to cover a situation where Rizzo and Sarubbi did not approach the Respondent for employment but rather the Respondent took over another business where they had found jobs. Clearly, this unusual course of events would not normally be within the parties' contemplation when they agreed to such a waiver.

Finally, we agree with the judge that the Respondent refused to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi in 1985, not because they had previously been terminated for cause, but rather because of Rizzo's protected

[1] The Respondent's motion for oral argument is denied as the record and the briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In sec. D, par. 2, of the "Discussion" portion of her decision, the judge incorrectly stated that the decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi was made in March 1983 rather than in March 1985. We, therefore, correct this inadvertent error.

[3] The General Counsel has requested us to include a visitatorial clause in the Order that would authorize the Board to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in order to monitor the Respondent's compliance with this Order. We find it unnecessary to include such a clause in the Order in this case. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988). Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

[4] See, e.g., Norris Concrete Materials, 282 NLRB 289 (1986).

[5] Because we are reversing the judge's finding of violations as to the 1981 discharges, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether deferral to the arbitration awards concerning these 1981 discharges would be warranted. Deferral to the prior arbitration awards would not be warranted as to the 1985 refusal to hire, of course, because those events occurred after the awards issued and thus the arbitrator could not have considered them in making his awards. Litton Systems, 283 NLRB 973 (1987).

[7] Steves Sash & Door Co., supra at 476.

[8] In adopting this finding, however, we do not rely on the judge's discussion of Leeward Nursing Home, 278 NLRB 1058 (1986), and Ventura Coastal Corp., 264 NLRB 291 (1982).

concerted activity in filing a lawsuit against the Respondent in 1981 with other employees and because Rizzo and Sarubbi had filed charges with the Board about their 1981 discharges. We find, based on the following facts, that the Respondent's stated reason for refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi was merely a pretext.

The Respondent's general manager at JFK Airport, Robert Kouba, testified that he made the decision whether to hire the former Gladieux employees during the Respondent's takeover of Gladieux operations at JFK. Kouba testified that the reason Rizzo and Sarubbi were not hired was that they had previously been terminated for cause by the Respondent;[9] however, their termination letters do not mention this reason and the supervisor who gave Sarubbi his letter also did not rely on this reason when questioned. Although Kouba testified that the Respondent had a policy against hiring employees who had been terminated for cause, there is no record evidence of any written statement of this policy. Further, the record shows that the Respondent rehired three employees at JFK Airport in 1982 and 1983 who had been discharged by the Respondent for failure to collect money and ring up sales, and that it retained Gladieux employee Gladys Alvarez in the 1985 takeover despite her 1983 discharge by Gladieux for failure to ring up sales and her continued cash-handling violations in 1984 after she was rehired by Gladieux. Finally, Kouba testified initially that, in making the decision whether to hire the former Gladieux employees, he only looked at the employees' personnel records at Gladieux and their 1985 applications for employment with the Respondent. However, these records do not reveal that Rizzo and Sarubbi were ever terminated for cause.

Clearly, the reason given at the hearing in this case was not the Respondent's real reason for refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi during the 1985 takeover. We do, however, have some direct evidence of the Respondent's real motive. Thus, Gladieux Supervisor Kowalsky testified that at a management meeting on March 22, 1985, the day before the official takeover and about 1 week after Rizzo and Sarubbi got their termination letters, Respondent Director of Security Christie told him that "Sarubbi was tied in with 'The Magnificent Seven'" and that the Respondent had "no use for these people because they were troublemakers." It is undisputed that "The Magnificent Seven" was a name commonly used by management to refer to the civil lawsuit concerning working conditions that was filed against the Respondent in 1981 by seven employees working at the Respondent's La Guardia Airport operations. Although Rizzo was one of the named plaintiffs in this lawsuit, Sarubbi was not involved in it. The uncontradicted record evidence shows, however, that several of the Respondent's supervisors told employees in 1981 that Christie wanted to get rid of Rizzo and the other employees who filed the lawsuit and that Christie planned to fire Sarubbi, who was not involved in the lawsuit, to make the other discharges look legitimate.[10] Rizzo and Sarubbi were discharged by the Respondent in 1981 and filed Board charges about their terminations.

We also have other evidence from which we can infer the Respondent's real motive in refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi during the 1985 takeover. Thus, Respondent General Manager Kouba, who made the decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi, admitted that he had heard about the lawsuit and the Board charges at La Guardia Airport around the time they were filed and that he had become familiar with Rizzo's and Sarubbi's names when they were still working at La Guardia. Kouba testified further that in early 1985, before he began screening the Gladieux employees for hire, Christie brought it to his attention that Rizzo and Sarubbi were working for Gladieux at JFK. Kouba also admitted that Christie may have told him at that time that Rizzo and Sarubbi were the ones who had filed Board charges and the lawsuit at La Guardia. Finally, although Kouba stated he made the final decision on whether to hire the Gladieux employees, he testified that he consulted with labor relations officials at the Respondent's headquarters in California before he made the decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi; Kouba did not explain why this was necessary.[11]

We conclude, in agreement with the judge, that the Respondent's real motive in refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi was to retaliate against their previous protected concerted activities in filing a lawsuit and their filing of Board charges. Therefore, we find that by refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi in 1985 the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act.

[9] In his testimony, Kouba did not mention their supposed waiver of future employment rights as playing any part in his decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi. Moreover, the record does not reveal that Kouba even knew their Board charges had been settled, much less the terms of that settlement.

[10] Christie was a named defendant, along with the Respondent, in the lawsuit.

[11] All these findings about the Respondent's real motive in refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi are based on admissions by Respondent Officials Kouba and Christie that are uncontradicted. In light of this evidence supporting a violation, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether the Respondent and Gladieux were joint employers during the several months just before the official takeover on March 23, 1985, or whether the Gladieux supervisors were agents of the Respondent during that period.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for the judge's Conclusion of Law 2.

"2. By refusing to hire former Gladieux employees Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi in March 1985 because of their protected concerted activities and filing of Board charges, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act."

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent, having refused to hire two employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4), it must offer them employment as bartenders or other equivalent positions and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from its refusal to hire them, computed on a quarterly basis from the date of the refusal to hire to the date of a proper offer of employment, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[12]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Host International, Inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Marriott Corporation, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Refusing to hire Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi because of their protected concerted activities and filing of charges with the Board."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful refusals to hire and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the refusals to hire will not be used against them in any way."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

[12] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to hire Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi because of their protected concerted activities and filing of charges with the Board.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi employment at our facility at the JFK Airport as bartenders or substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL make Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits they may have suffered by reason of our refusal to hire them, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from their records any reference to our refusal to hire them, and WE WILL notify them in writing that this has been done and that our refusal to hire them will not be used against them in any way.

HOST INTERNATIONAL, INC., A WHOLLY-OWNED SUBSIDIARY OF MARRIOTT CORPORATION

David S. Cohen, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Courtney B. Wheeler, Esq., of Bethesda, Maryland, for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WINFRED D. MORIO, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Brooklyn, New York, on 19, 20, 21, 22 May, 26, 27 June; and 2 July 1986. On 19 December 1985, the Acting Regional Director for Region 29 issued the original complaint in this proceeding. Thereafter, an amended complaint was issued on 25 March 1986 and a second amended complaint was issued on 2 May 1986. This last complaint alleged that Host International, Inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Marriott Corporation (Host/Company), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act when it discharged its employees Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi because they filed a lawsuit against Host in the United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, and engaged in other concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining and other mutual aid and protection.[1] The Company filed an answer in which it denied the alleged violations and set forth several affirmative defenses.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by both counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

During the past year, which period is representative of its business operations, Host, in the course and conduct of its business operations, derived gross revenues from bar and restaurant sales valued at in excess of $500,000 and purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its Queens Airport facility food, beverages, bar supplies, and other materials valued at in excess of $50,000, of which goods and materials in excess of $50,000 were transported and delivered to it in interstate commerce directly from States of the United States other than the State of New York. The parties admit, and I find, that Host is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Rizzo began his employment as a bartender with Host at its LaGuardia Airport restaurant in October 1973, and Sarubbi commenced his employment with Host in the same capacity and at the same location in November 1974. Insofar as this record indicates, the two continued as bartenders at that location without any difficulties until 14 December 1980. On that day, subsequently referred to as "Black Sunday," Host closed all its bars at LaGuardia Airport, physically detained six bartenders and one waiter, and interrogated them regarding alleged violations of Host's cash-handling policies. Rizzo was one of the bartenders who was detained, Sarubbi was not detained. The employees who were detained were told by Charles Newman, the regional vice president for Host, that they were all suspended indefinitely. The following day Rizzo was recalled to work, he did not receive a warning, nor did he suffer a pay loss.

As a result of this detention, charges were filed on 31 December 1980 by Local 6 Hotel, Restauant, Club Employees and Bartenders Union, AFL–CIO (the Union) on behalf of those employees with the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) in Case 29–CA–8532. Basically, the Union alleged that Host had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (5) of the Act by interrogating, imprisoning, and suspending its employees because of their union activities and by refusing to allow the employees to contact and have present their union representative when the employees requested such representation at disciplinary meetings.

On 13 April 1981, the Regional Director for Region 29 dismissed the portion of the charge that alleged that the employees had been detained or disciplined because of their union membership. Host entered into an informal settlement agreement regarding that portion of the charge that alleged that Host had required its employees to participate in disciplinary interviews without union representation when the employee had requested such representation.

In addition to the charge filed with the Board about their detention, the employees also filed a lawsuit in the United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, on 21 April 1981.[2] In this suit, the employees claimed that Host had physically assaulted and searched them, detained and interrogated them, and deprived them of the rights, privileges, and immunities guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the laws of the United States. The suit referred, specifically, to the seven individuals, including Rizzo, who had been detained. The details of the settlement of this suit will be discussed below.

The lawsuit, which requested monetary compensation in the amount of $7 million, was well publicized in local newspapers and the individuals who filed the suits were referred to by fellow employees and supervisors as the "Magnificant Seven."

In February 1981, Host changed the system by which bartenders bid for a job. Rizzo filed a charge on 9 February 1981, in Case 29–CA–8633, in which he alleged that Host had violated Section 8(a)(3), (4), and (5) of the Act, because the change was made unilaterally and arose because the employees had assisted the Union and had given testimony under the Act. In addition to the charge, Rizzo also sent a letter to Scott McDougal, a supervisor, in which he mentioned the events of "Black Sunday" and stated that the change in the bid schedule had been made to harass and intimidate the employees. This charge was withdrawn by Rizzo, according to him, because Host returned to the original system of bidding.[3]

Dallas Swingle, had been employed by Host, at various times between 1980 and 1985, as a supervisor[4] at the Host facilities at LaGuardia Airport. Respondent admitted that Swingle was a supervisor and its agent at the time of the incidents. According to Swingle, after the lawsuit was filed by the seven employees he had several conversations about the lawsuit with Scott McDougal, who was the food and beverage manager and his supervisor. Swingle could not recall the exact times when these conversations were held but they occurred after the lawsuit was filed and before September 1981. Swin-

[1] During the hearing the counsel for the General Counsel stated that it was his position that Host violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (4) when it discharged and/or refused to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi.

[2] The lawsuit was filed by Rizzo, whose name was first on the caption, James Terrence Weir, Frank Monaghan, Juan Fung, Vincent Fattizzi, Gilberto Munoz, and Charles O'Neill.

[3] It was the Company's position that it was permitted to make such a change according to the collective-bargaining agreement in existence between the parties.

[4] Swingle was not employed by Host at the time of the hearing. He testified that the Company told him that he had an absentee problem and he had to decide whether he wanted to continue his association with the Company and he decided to leave. However, he admitted that when he asked to be rehired, about February 1985, Host stated that they were not interested in rehiring him.

gle testified that McDougal told him on several occasions that Host planned to "get rid of the seven bartenders who filed the lawsuit," the Company "was going to blow them out of the water." Swingle claimed that McDougal also told him that it was Newman's idea to fire these employees. Newman, a vice president, had been named, specifically, in the lawsuit. Swingle stated that the lawsuit was constantly the topic of conversation among supervisors and the employees and that the company representatives generally did not make "kind" statements about the seven employees who filed the lawsuit. Swingle also testified that after the seven employees were detained he had several conversations with Fred Christie, who was head of security for Host, and the "high point of the conversation was usually how many bartenders were gone out of the original 7, how many were left." According to Swingle, Christie told him on several occasions that the bartenders who filed the lawsuit and were still employed would be "shopped."[5] Christie was named, specifically, in the lawsuit.

In the affidavit given to the Board during the investigation, Swingle stated that he heard McDougal say, "that the people who initiated the lawsuit would be gotten rid of" and that McDougal indicated that the way Host would get rid of them would be through shopping reports and mistakes in cash handling procedures." Swingle did not state in the affidavit that McDougal told him that the idea to fire the employees came from Newman; rather Swingle stated that McDougal indicated that the decision came from higher-ups and Swingle perceived that the idea originated with Newman. Swingle also stated in the affidavit that McDougal did not indicate that additional "shopping" had been ordered for the seven individuals who had filed the lawsuit.

Swingle testified, on cross-examination, that Christie had spoken to him on occasion "about shopping" employees other than those involved in the lawsuit and Swingle admitted that Christie never said, specifically, that he would use "shoppers" to fire the seven employees. According to Swingle, Christie said that these employees would violate company rules and thus give the Company the grounds to terminate them.

According to Rizzo, he had a conversation with Swingle in July 1981 during which Swingle told him that McDougal said that if the seven employees did not drop the lawsuit McDougal would flood the bar with shoppers and California would back him up.[6] McDougal was not called to testify. Rizzo also claimed that he had a conversation with Daryl Easterling, an admitted supervisor, in August 1981, during which Easterling told him that the Company had a hit list and his name and that of the others involved in the lawsuit were on the list. Rizzo testified that Easterling told him that Sarubbi's name was also on the list and when Rizzo expressed surprise that Sarubbi's name had been included, Easterling replied that the Company was firing Sarubbi because they did not want it to appear obvious that they were firing the plaintiffs in the lawsuit.[7] Rizzo testified that from his conversation with Easterling he had the impression that the Company would use "shoppers" fo find grounds to discharge the employees. Rizzo viewed the statements by Swingle and Easterling as "friendly warnings." Easterling was not called to testify.

Sarubbi testified that in August 1981 he had a conversation with McDougal, during which McDougal told him that Christie had a hit list and his name was at the top of the list. When Sarubbi questioned McDougal as to why his name was on the list, because he was not involved in the lawsuit, McDougal responded that Christie wanted to get Rizzo and the others involved in the lawsuit and to do that it would be necessary first to fire Sarubbi. McDougal stated that if they fired Sarubbi, who had a clean record and was not involved in the lawsuit, allegedly for some infraction of company rules, then there would be no questions raised when they fired the others, also for some alleged infraction of company rules. McDougal also told Sarubbi that Newman had said that if the employees did not back off the lawsuit he would harass all the bartenders and try to get them all fired. Newman, Christie, and McDougal were not called to testify.

On 11 September 1981 Host suspended and, thereafter, on 15 September 1981, it discharged Sarubbi, allegedly, because he violated company procedures. On 17 September 1981 Host suspended and, thereafter, on 24 September 1981 it discharged Rizzo, allegedly because he violated company procedures. In December 1981, the Union filed a request for arbitration about these discharges and about the discharges of Debbie Fryer, a waitress who had been discharged with Sarubbi, also allegedly for violating company rules, and Lorraine Charest, a waitress, who had been discharged with Rizzo, also allegedly for violating company rules.

Host conceded that Sarubbi had been a satisfactory employee from 1974 until on or about 10 September 1981. According to Sarubbi, on 9 September 1981 he arrived at work at 2:30 p.m. and went to the fourth floor to get his bank, which was the money he put into the register at the start of his shift. McDougal was present when he arrived and McDougal told him not to take the bank, they did not have a register for him. McDougal then told Sarubbi to go home and to return for work the next day. Sarubbi asked McDougal why he could not work with an open drawer as he had in the past when they did not have a register for him and McDougal responded that Christie did not want him to work that day.[8] On 10 September 1981, Sarubbi reported for work at 2:30 p.m. and again saw that there was no register for him. Sarubbi called Easterling, his supervisor, and explained the problem and Easterling said he would locate a register for him, which he did about 4 p.m. It was not

[5] The word "shopped" is a term used in this type of business to describe a situation where security guards, employed by outside firms, come to an employer's premises to observe whether employees are following company rules. It appears that in order to conduct these observations the security guards pose as customers and order food or drink from the employees under observation.

[6] The main offices of Host were located in California.

[7] Rizzo testified that he did not know why Sarubbi was discharged. According to Rizzo, Sarubbi could have been discharged both as a cover and because he mishandled cash.

[8] Sarubbi claimed that Christie was present when McDougal said this but McDougal whispered when he made this remark.

the register usually used in West Wing Bar, the section where Sarubbi normally worked. This register, which came from the East Wing Bar, had a plastic shield covering one side and the back and Sarubbi placed the machine so that the other side of the register was against a wall. Therefore, according to Sarubbi, on 10 September 1981 the only part of the register that would be visible was the front of the machine where Sarubbi stood when he rang up the sales. Sarubbi claimed that during the evening the register did not consistently issue receipts when he rang up the sales, the machine would jam, and he had to physically pull the tape. After continuing to experience difficulty with the tapes, Sarubbi notified Easterling about the problem. Easterling was unable to check the problem until about 7 p.m., at which point there was no tape left in the register. There were few customers present when Easterling arrived and so Easterling decided to close the bar. Sarubbi was not accused at that point of giving drinks to the waitress, Debbie Fryer, without collecting for them, which would be a violation of company rules. However, later that evening Sarubbi was told that both he and Debbie Fryer, who had worked with him that evening, had been shopped and Sarubbi was given a pink slip by Pat Trench, a manager. Sarubbi asked Trench why he was being suspended and Trench responded that he did not know, he had not received a report.[9] Sarubbi asked Trench how he could be suspended in view of the fact that Trench had not received the shopper's report and the further fact that Trench had counted Sarubbi's receipts and examined the tape and had not found a discrepancy. When Sarubbi persisted in questioning Trench why he had received a pink slip when Trench had not received the shopper's report, Trench responded that he had to do it. Later in September 1981, a meeting was held with Host's general manager, James Allen, about the discharges of both Sarubbi and Fryer. Present, in addition to Allen and the discharged employees, was Al Farin, a union business agent. During the meeting, Allen presented the shopper's report and the tape to Farin for his examination. Allen claimed that Sarubbi had failed to ring up drinks but Farin disputed that assertion and he stated that the tape proved that Sarubbi had, in fact, rung up all the drinks. According to Sarubbi, eventually Allen agreed that the tape did establish that all the drinks had been rung up. Allen said he would consider the matter and he would give Sarubbi his decision in a few days. Within a few days, Farin advised Sarubbi that the Company refused to change its decision, he was fired.[10] Allen was not called to testify in this proceeding. The Union filed for arbitration for both Sarubbi and Fryer's discharges.

On 18 January 1982, Burton Turkus, the arbitrator, issued a six-page decision based on the testimony of Sarubbi, Fryer, and the two shoppers, employed by an outside agency, who had shopped Sarubbi and Fryer on the evening of 10 September 1981. According to the arbitrator's decision, Fryer, on at least two occasions, ordered drinks from Sarubbi and did not tender money to Sarubbi in payment for these drinks. Fryer gave the drinks to the customers who had ordered them, the customers paid for the drinks, and Fryer placed the money she received from them in her cash caddy.[11] He also found that Sarubbi did not ring up sales for these drinks. The arbitrator credited the shopper's testimony and did not credit the explanation offered by Fryer and Sarubbi that Fryer initially had left a sum of money at the service bar from her cash caddy to pay for drinks and that Sarubbi took the money for the drinks that Fryer had ordered from the money that she had left at the service bar. The arbitrator concluded that the two individuals had acted in concert and, therefore, their discharges were justified.

Sarubbi testified that he did not tell either the union attorney who represented him at the arbitration or the arbitrator about his conversation with a Host supervisor in which he was told that he was on a hit list and that he was set up for discharge because the Company wanted to cover the fact that it planned to fire the seven employees who had filed the lawsuit. Nor did Sarubbi tell his attorney or the arbitrator that another employee, Fattizzi, who had been one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit, told him that Christie was going to get him and another employee, Monahan, also one of the plaintiffs. Sarubbi claimed that he failed to do so at the suggestion of the union business agent who told him that the supervisors would not testify in support of him, and, therefore, such statements by him would not help his case. Sarubbi also did not tell his attorney or the arbitrator about the charges that had been filed by Rizzo and the Union with the Board. The arbitrator's award does not contain any reference to the NLRB charges or to the fact that Sarubbi believed that he was discharged to cover the discharge of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit.

On 17 September 1981, Rizzo was working as a bartender in the West End Bar with Vincent Gonzalez, another employee. Gonzalez left work about 7:30 p.m. to attend a funeral service.[12] Rizzo testified that around 8 p.m. he became aware that he was being shopped. Rizzo claimed that he took three orders at about this time, a procedure he claimed was not unusual when the bar was busy. It was a practice known to the supervisors. He then collected for all three drinks at the same time, rang them up separately, and gave each party whatever change was due. Rizzo observed the two men, who had been standing at the bar, leave the bar and move to a nearby standup table. He was suspicious because the men were keeping an eye on the register. The men asked for scotch, they did not name a brand and he gave the waitress bar scotch to give to the two men. The waitress, Lorraine Charest, took the money from her caddy for the drinks and left it on the service bar; then she served the customer and collected the money for the drinks

[9] The disciplinary action memo stated that Sarubbi was suspended indefinitely because he was observed by a shopper "mishandling company funds and improper issuing of receipts."

[10] Host did not call the shoppers, Trench or Easterling, as witnesses. Neither were the shopper reports or the tapes presented during this hearing.

[11] Waitresses are treated as customers and they are required to pay for drinks as they order them. A waitress will usually pay for a drink when she receives it from the bartender from her own money, which she carries in a cash caddy. When she serves the drink to the customer and he pays she is reimbursed for the money she has paid to the bartender.

[12] There was only one register in the bar that evening.

from the customer, which money she put in her cash caddy. Rizzo conceded that he might not have rung up the drinks immediately because he was busy making more drinks but he testified that he rang up all the drinks that he served that evening. At 8:30 p.m., Easterling told Rizzo he had been shopped that evening. Easterling then counted the money and told Rizzo that the amount was correct. Later, Easterling told Rizzo that Christie wanted Rizzo's tape for that evening. He then gave Rizzo a pink slip, which stated that Rizzo was suspended indefinitely for violation of the company policies, "as per the shopper's report." The memo was signed by Christie. About a week after the suspension, there was a meeting in Allen's office about the suspension. Present, in addition to Allen and Sarubbi, were Christie, Lorraine Charest, the waitress who had been suspended with Rizzo, and a union representative. The shopper's report was discussed and Rizzo stated that he knew he was being shopped and he explained his actions that evening. Rizzo asked to see the tape for the register of that evening in order to verify that he had rung up all the sales. When he looked at the tape Rizzo claimed it had been stapled together and there was an overlapping of figures. Allen explained that the tape had caught in the register and it had been necessary to pull the tape, which had caused it to tear. At the conclusion of the meeting, Allen said he would give his decision in a few days. Subsequently, the Union told Rizzo that he was fired. The matter went to arbitration on 3 December 1981. Within a few days after the arbitration, Rizzo drafted a memo concerning certain events that had occurred during the arbitration. Basically, the memo dealt with Rizzo's dissatisfaction with the manner in which the union attorney had represented him during the arbitration. The memo does not state that Rizzo told his attorney, prior to the arbitration, that he believed the Company had fired him in retaliation for his filing of the lawsuit. Nor does the statement contain a reference to his attempts to tell the arbitrator about the charges filed with the Board or about the lawsuit and it does not state that the arbitrator rejected these attempts. The memo does contain the statement that Rizzo believed that the Company wanted to obtain a favorable result from the arbitration, "so that they can offer it as a reason for the dismissal of any damage suit against them."

On 19 January 1982, Burton Turkus, the arbitrator, issued his decision based on the testimony of Rizzo, Charest, and the two shoppers, employed by an outside security service, who had "shopped" the two employees. According to this decision, the shoppers testified that they ordered two Dewars and soda from Charest, Charest secured the drinks from Rizzo, she did not tender him any money, and Rizzo did not pick up any money from the service bar. Rizzo did not ring up the two drinks. Charest gave the drinks to the shoppers, collected money for the drinks from them, and she put this money in her money caddy. This process was repeated. Turkus discredited the explanation advanced by Rizzo and Charest, which was that Charest had left money for the drinks on the service bar and Rizzo had taken the money from that area when Charest ordered the drinks. The arbitrator found that the two had been discharged for cause. In both decisions, the arbitrator stated that the four employees were familiar with the Company's cash-handling policies, which required a waitress to pay for drinks when she received them from the bartender and required the bartender to ring up each sale. Rizzo and Sarubbi testified that there was no set way to handle cash. Thus, they claimed that if a bartender was busy he might take an order from a customer or a group of customers at one time, and ring up all sales at one time, although the drinks for each customer or group of customers would be rung up separately. According to Swingle, bartenders were to take orders separately and ring up sales separately, they were not to "double up" and he admitted that he has spoken to employees about following this procedure. However, he also admitted that bartenders did "double up" on orders and did ring up more than one sale at a time when the bar was busy and this practice was known to supervisors.

Rizzo testified that he told the union attorney, prior to the arbitration proceeding, about the charges he had filed with the Board but the union attorney appeared to be more concerned with the shopper's report and he told Rizzo that he could give his own account about the charges. Rizzo claimed that at the arbitration proceeding he attempted to explain to the arbitrator about the civil suit; that had been filed and about the NLRB charges; the arbitrator then asked what had happened to the charges, and Rizzo explained that one charge had been withdrawn and the other charge was settled. At this point, the arbitrator stated that he did not see a connection between the lawsuit, the NLRB charges, and the discharges. Rizzo claimed that he did not tell the arbitrator about the conversations he had with Swingle and Easterling because the arbitrator did not appear to be interested. In the affidavit secured from Rizzo during the investigation of the case, he stated that he attempted to tell the arbitrator about the lawsuit, but the arbitrator said the matter was irrelevant. According to the affidavit, when he told the arbitrator about the charges the arbitrator was concerned and asked about the status of the cases and Rizzo explained that one had been settled and the other was withdrawn. The arbitrator then stated that he did not see a connection between the charges and the grievance presented to him. According to Rizzo's testimony and affidavit, the union attorney requested that the NLRB charges and documents relating to the lawsuit be received into evidence to demonstrate the atmosphere at the airport. The arbitrator agreed to the receipt of these documents but stated that he would not give them any weight. According to Rizzo, the union attorney did not give any details about the unfair labor practice and he did not brief the unfair labor practice or lawsuit issue. It does not appear that there was a transcript of these proceedings and the arbitrator's decisions do not refer to the Board charges, the lawsuit, or the retaliation or coverup reason for Rizzo and Sarubbi's discharges. It is unclear whether the arbitrator did receive any documents relating to the charges or lawsuit.

It is the position of the General Counsel that Rizzo and Sarubbi were given substantially harsher discipline than was given to other employees who violated the Company's cash-handling rules, and this fact indicates that their discharges in September 1981 were due to the NLRB charges and the lawsuit that had been filed. Numerous exhibits were received into evidence in support of this position by the General Counsel during the hearing and the parties stipulated to the authenticity of other records in an off-the-record meeting.[13] Insofar as this record indicates, the alleged infractions of company rules in September 1981 were the first offenses by Rizzo and Sarubbi since the commencement of their employment with Host. An examination of the personnel records of several employees does establish that some employees who allegedly violated the Company's cash-handling rules were not discharged. Thus, a bartender, Mario Mancini, was given a warning on 30 September 1982 for violation of cash-handling procedures; Victor Rohan, a bartender, received a warning on 11 March 1985 for failing to ring up sales, among other violations; John Wheeler, a bartender, received numerous warnings for violations of company rules, including his failure to ring up drinks and for cash shortages, but he was not discharged; Juan Ochoa, a bartender, Manuel Bande, a waiter, and Clara Santa Cruz were all suspended on 6 December 1982 for violations of cash-handling policies, which included underringing sales and not ringing sales but they were reinstated on 9 December 1982. Ochoa was suspended again on 21 April 1983 for cash-handling violations but he was reinstated on 13 May 1983; Vincent DiGiorgio, a bartender, was suspended for 2 weeks in 1977 and was told that it was a serious violation of company rules to fail to ring up sales and to ring up a no-sale; DiGiorgio was warned again about a cash shortage on 30, May 1979; and Dorothy Longworth, a cashier, was warned after she was observed taking money from a cash register and putting it in her pocket. In addition, the record reveals that bartenders Felenes, Battala, and Gonzalez, who were terminated for failure to ring up sales were subsequently reinstated. Battala has been warned on several occasions for cash-handling violations but he has not been discharged.

B. The Settlement

Sarubbi and Rizzo testified that their efforts to appeal the arbitrator's decision were rejected by the Union and, therefore, on 12 February 1982 they filed unfair labor practice charges in Cases 29–CA–9486–1 and 29–CA–9486–2, respectively, alleging that Host had violated Section 8(a)(3) and (4) of the Act by discharging and refusing to reinstate Rizzo and Sarubbi because they assisted the Union, filed charges or gave testimony under the Act, and engaged in protected concerted activities. On 21 October 1982, the Regional Director for Region 29 issued an order consolidating the above charges in one complaint that alleged, basically, that Host had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when it discharged and refused to reinstate Rizzo and Sarubbi because they filed the lawsuit and engaged in other protected concerted activities. In June 1983, an administrative law judge approved requests by Rizzo and Sarubbi to withdraw the charges and dismiss the complaint because the parties had entered into an out-of-Board settlement. The parties agree that they entered into a settlement but they are in dispute as to the nonmonetary aspects of this settlement, which disposed of both the charges and the lawsuit.

Although the settlement was an out-of-Board settlement, the actual offers and counteroffers made by the parties were channeled through the Board agents. It appears that during much of the negotiations the parties were in separate rooms and the Board agents conveyed the proposals of one side to the other side. The Board agents were not called to testify. Carlton Trosclair, the attorney who represented Host during these negotiations, testified that he rejected the Board agents' requests for reinstatement and specifically told the agents and Rizzo and Sarubbi that Host would not reemploy Rizzo and Sarubbi under any condition. Initially, Rizzo testified that the settlement discussions centered around what amount of moneys would be necessary to settle the case. Subsequently, he stated that he did not recall a discussion about the issue of reinstatement. He further stated there were no face-to-face meetings with the Company's representatives during the negotiations. However, when called as a rebuttal witness, Rizzo testified that during the final negotiation meeting Trosclair did say that the Company was not interested in reinstating the two men, but Trosclair did not say that Host would not reemploy them under any condition. Rizzo also stated that he did not know if he could have applied for a position with Host the day after the settlement. Sarubbi recalled that he was told by the Board agents that he would not be reinstated to the position that he had lost, but Trosclair never said that he would not be reemployed again by Host. Sarubbi admitted that he did not believe that he could seek reemployment with Host in a day, week, or month after the settlement. A letter prepared by a Host attorney after the settlement discussions referred only to the monetary aspects of the settlement.[14] Rizzo and Sarubbi both stated that at the time of the settlement discussions reinstatement was not a prime concern to them because they were then employed.

C. The Present Case

After their discharge by Host, Rizzo and Sarubbi commenced employment as bartenders with the Gladieux Corporation (Gladieux) in about March 1982 at the Delta Northwest terminal at the JFK Airport. In late 1984, Gladieux announced to its employees that Host would begin to operate the facility at the Delta Northwest terminal sometime after January 1985. On 3 January 1985, Gladieux became a wholly owned subsidiary of the Marriott Corporation. Host had been a wholly owned subsidiary of the Marriott Corporation since March 1982.[15]

[13] Host objected to the receipt of any personnel record but did agree that the records that were received were authentic. By order dated 30 July 1986, Exhs. 44 g, h, and i, which were offered by the General Counsel, were rejected and Exh. 45 was received.

[14] According to Rizzo, Host had agreed to provide them with reference letters, but it failed to do so.

[15] In additon to Host International, there is also a Host Services of New York, Inc. It appears that the two corporations constitute a single integrated business enterprise.

According to Robert Kouba, who was general manager for Host at the JFK Airport in February and March 1985, Host had planned to take over the Gladieux operation at the Delta Northwest terminal on 1 March 1985, but the actual takeover did not occur until 23 March 1985.[16] The record reveals that it was on that day that the Gladieux employees were transferred to the Host payroll. The financial aspects of the sale of the Gladieux assets to Host were not completed until July 1985 when Host paid Gladieux by a check that was processed through an intercompany account.[17] According to Paul Matoba, director of accounting for Host, Host's records show that Gladieux sold its assets to Host on 23 March 1985, and the Host's records do not show any entries for the Delta Northwest facility before that day. Joseph Fabiano, Host's director of labor relations from January 1985 to January 1986, testified that neither the Host personnel department nor its labor relations department were involved with the operation at the Delta Northwest terminal until after 23 March 1985. He further testified that Gladieux did not seek and he did not give any assistance about personnel or labor relation matters at any point to Gladieux representatives.

Although, according to Kouba, Host did not commence its operations at the Delta Northwest terminal until 23 March 1985, he admitted that he was frequently at that location beginning in February 1985. Kouba testified that he came to the facility to examine the existing operation, to survey the facility, to ascertain the number of employees, and to prepare for the transition from the Gladieux method of operation to the Host method of operation. Kouba denied that, at this point, he had supervisory authority over Gladieux personnel, but he did admit that he held a meeting in about mid-February 1985 with Gladieux employees, with the acquiescence of Gladieux supervisors,[18] on worktime during which he explained the advantages of being a Host employee, and showed the employees a Host orientation film. Kouba also admitted that around this time Host application forms and name tags were distributed to the Gladieux employees by both Host's personnel manager and Gladieux supervisors. These application forms were completed by the Gladieux employees, including Rizzo and Sarubbi, in about mid-February 1985, and the employees began to wear the name tags with the Host logo. Rizzo and Sarubbi testified that from about mid-February 1985 they considered themselves to be employees of both corporations. According to Mary Grady, a former Gladieux employee who is presently employed by Host, Kouba told the employees in February 1985 that they would be Host employees and Host would recognize their union contract. Kouba did not deny, specifically, this testimony.

Peter Kowalsky was employed as a supervisor for Gladieux from May 1984 until March 1985 at which time he began his employment with Host as a supervisor and continued in that position until 20 May 1986. At that time, William Powers, his supervisor, told him he was being put on paid leave and would remain on such leave until a Mr. Katengail, the general manager for Host at JFK Airport, had an opportunity to review the transcript of the hearing in this case[19] and to make a determination concerning Kowalsky's future. The hearing, which began on 19 May 1985, was adjourned after several days and resumed on 26 June 1985. Kowalsky testified when the case resumed and by that point he had been terminated. Counsel for Host objected to the receipt of testimony by Kowalsky. This objection will be discussed below.

Kowalsky testified that in February 1985, Powers introduced him to Kouba at the Delta Northwest terminal and told him that Kouba would be his new supervisor. After that introduction, Kowalsky saw Kouba, at the Gladieux facilities, about four or five times a week in late February and early March 1985. Sometime in February 1985, after Kouba began to come to the premises, Gladieux started to sell bottled beer, something which had not been done before that time. When Kowalsky questioned Powers about this change, Powers told him that Kouba wanted the change made and it had been made. In late February 1985, according to Kowalsky, Kouba told Powers to remove the Gladieux signs and the signs were removed. On one or two other occasions Powers directed Kowalsky to make changes with respect to the removal and cleaning of certain machines and Powers told Kowalsky that the changes were made at Kouba's direction. According to Kowalsky, in late February 1985 Powers told him that they could not hire directly as they had done, applicants would be sent from the Host personnel department. However, Kowalsky could name only two individuals who were hired in this manner, both were hired as bartenders around 21 or 22 March apparently to replace Rizzo and Sarubbi. Kowalsky also testified that in late February 1985, Fred Christie, head of Host security, set up a new procedure at the Gladieux facility on how to issue money and make deposits. Christie did not testify.

William Powers, who had been the general manager for Gladieux at the terminal and who became a supervisor for Host, testified that Kouba did visit the Delta Northwest terminal on several occasions before 23 March 1985, but he denied that Kouba gave directions or orders to any Gladieux employees and he further denied that Gladieux signs and machines were moved at Kouba's direction before 23 March 1985. David Blanco, who had worked for Gladieux and who became a Host supervisor, testified that he personally removed the Gladieux signs after Host took over the operation. He also testified that Kouba never directly gave him orders until after 23 March 1985.

[16] Marriott Corporation, apparently, decided that all restaurant facilities of Gladieux at airports would be operated by Host because Host had all the other corporate restaurants at the airports.

[17] This apparently is an account to which all the companies send moneys to pay other companies either owned or controlled by the Marriott Corporation.

[18] On cross-examination, Kouba testified that if the Gladieux supervisors had not been cooperative he would have referred the matter to Host International.

[19] The hearing in this case began on 19 May 1986, and by that time it appears that Kouba had been transferred to another location.

It is undisputed that Host application forms and name tags were distributed to Gladieux employees before 23 March 1985. The record establishes that Sarubbi and Rizzo completed such application forms, respectively, on 13 and 16 February 1985 and received name tags at that point. Robin Kreitner, who was a Host personnel director at that time, stated that it was a usual procedure when Host took over a facility to have employment application forms completed by employees of the former company and to distribute name tags to them. It also was usual, acording to Kreitner's testimony, to request these employees to call the New York Department of Labor about receiving a job tax credit. Kreitner claimed that these procedures did not indicate that the employee would automatically become Host employees.

On or about 14 March 1985 both Rizzo and Sarubbi were advised, in writing, by Kouba that in the company transition they would not be hired and their services would not be needed after 23 March 1985.

Kouba testified that he made the decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi and DiGiorgio, a third bartender. According to Kouba, after the application forms were completed, they were screened first by Kreitner, Host's personnel manager. Kreitner then brought the applications, which she considered favorable, to him for his consideration. After he reviewed the applications, he decided that he would not hire DiGiorgio, Rizzo, and Sarubbi and he was concerned about hiring an employee, Ms. Grady, because she was a union delegate at another location where she was also employed. It was Kouba's opinion that if Grady was hired by Host while employed at another location there could be a conflict because she would be a union delegate at two locations. He claimed that he discussed the Grady problem with the union representative and told him that Grady would have to choose, she could not work and be a delegate at two locations. As a result of this discussion, Kouba claimed that Grady ceased her employment at the second location and she then was employed by Host. Grady denied that the Union told her that she had to choose between Host and the other employer. She testified that she ceased working at the other location because that employer lost the service contract it had and she, therefore, did not have a job.

Kouba stated that he refused to hire DiGiorgio because he had worked for him at JFK Airport and he had terminated him for violating the Company's cash-handling policies and that it was against company policy to rehire an employee who had been terminated for cause.

According to Kouba's testimony, he did not personally know Rizzo or Sarubbi, they had not worked for him, but he was aware, through company communications, that both men had worked at the Host facility at LaGuardia and that they had been discharged for cause. According to Kouba, he decided that he could not hire these two who had been discharged for cause because it would be against company policy.[20] Kouba claimed that in making the decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi he examined the Host application forms and Gladieux's personnel records. When he was advised that those records did not disclose that the men had been discharged for cause, he stated that he knew before he looked at the files that the two men had been discharged. Kouba conceded that he had heard about the lawsuit and the charges that had been filed with the Board. Although Kouba claimed that he did not know the names of the employees involved in the charges or the lawsuit, he did admit that he had heard that seven employees were involved and he was familiar with the names of Rizzo and Sarubbi. At one point, Kouba stated that he did not know that Rizzo was involved with the charges and the lawsuit. At another point, Kouba testified that Christie knew who had filed the charges and the lawsuit and he may have told him that Rizzo and Sarubbi filed them. Kouba also testified that sometime before March 1985 Christie told him that DiGiorgio, Rizzo, and Sarubbi were working at the Gladieux facility and he told Kouba that the three had been discharged for stealing. According to Kouba, he consulted with California before he decided not to hire Rizzo. Kouba did not explain why he did this.

Kowalsky testified that he first heard the term the "Magnificent Seven" from Powers a few months after he started to work for Gladieux. Powers told him that the bartenders had a case and it was in that context that Powers referred to the term "Magnificent Seven." In January 1985, Powers told Kowalsky that he had met with Christie, head of security for Host, and during this meeting Christie told Powers that Powers had part of the "Magnificent Seven" working for him, that he should keep an eye on them, they were troublemakers. Christie did not testify and Powers did not refute this testimony. At about this time, Powers also told Kowalsky that McCarthy, a vice president for Host, had told Powers that there would be no changes when Host took over the Gladieux operation. However, according to Kowalsky, later in January 1985 Powers told Kowalsky that Kouba had said that there would be changes in the bar but Kouba did not disclose what the changes would be. In March 1985, Powers told Kowalsky that Kouba said that the Company was going to discharge the bartenders. When Kowalsky asked Powers how Host could do that after they had shown the Gladieux employees the Host orientation film and had given them application forms and name tags, Powers responded that the matter had been checked with the attorney for Host and the attorney had advised that Host could fire these people. Powers said they had a case with these employees at LaGuardia and they did not want them, they were troublemakers. Both Powers and Kouba testified but they did not refute this testimony.

On 14 March 1986 Powers gave a letter to Sarubbi, which had been signed by Kouba and stated "that in the company transition you will not be hired." When Sarubbi asked Powers why this was being done, Powers responded that they had not given him a reason. A similar letter was given to Rizzo, at Powers' direction, on 15 March 1986.

[20] Counsel for Host stated that one of the reasons the Company refused to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi when Host took over the Gladieux operation stemmed from the fact that these two individuals had waived all rights to future employment with Host as part of the settlement negotiations.

On 22 March, according to Kowalsky, he attended a meeting with Powers and Christie. During this meeting, Christie stated that Sarubbi "took book" and was connected with the "mafia." Christie stated that another bartender, DiGiorgio, who also had not been hired, had been "canned" when he worked for Host, that the bartenders were troublemakers, and that Sarubbi was part of the "Magnificent Seven," and the Company had no use for these men.

III. DISCUSSION

A. The Status of Host

It is the position of the General Counsel that in February 1985 Host began exercising daily control over the operations at the facility at the Delta Northwest terminal and "identified itself as the owner of the premises" and "was sufficiently in control of the facility operations and personnel to be considered at a minimum a joint employer of the Delta Northwest terminal employees." In support of this position, he relies on the following facts: Kouba, Host's general manager, was at the Delta Northwest facility on a frequent basis beginning in mid-February 1985, and he directed that certain changes be made with respect to items to be sold, removal of Gladieux signs, and the placement of certain machines and these directions were followed; Kouba and other Host personnel held a meeting with Gladieux employees during worktime without objection by Gladieux management; Host and Gladieux supervisors distributed Host employment application forms to Gladieux employees, and these forms were completed by these employees during worktime; Host name tags also were distributed to Gladieux employees and they were directed to and did wear these tags beginning in mid-February 1986; Host employment procedures, rather than Gladieux procedures, were followed with respect to at least two employees hired prior to 23 March 1985; and Christie, a Host supervisor, instituted a new method for cash handling at the Gladieux facility sometime in February 1985. As further evidence of the joint relationship between the two corporations, the General Counsel notes that Host and Gladieux are wholly owned subsidiaries of the Marriott Corporation, and that because of that fact Host was not required to pay Gladieux for its assets until several months after Host took over those assets. Host contends that the two are separate entities, and that Host did not begin operations at the terminal until 23 March 1985.

Although not entirely clear from statements made by counsel during the hearing or from arguments advanced in their briefs, it appears that the General Counsel's position is that Host and Gladieux were joint employers from January to 23 March 1985, while Host contends that the two corporations did not constitute a single-integrated enterprise. In TIL, Inc., 271 NLRB 798 (1984), the Board stated that the standard for determining whether two corporations are joint employers and the standard for determining whether they constitute a single-integrated enterprise are not the same. The joint employer concept recognizes that two separate enterprises can be joint employers if they share or codetermine those matters relating to essential terms and conditions of the employees' employment. Boire v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473 (1964); NLRB v. Browning-Ferris Industries, 691 F.2d 1117 (3d Cir. 1982). The Board in Laerco Transportation, 269 NLRB 324 (1984), held that to establish such a status there must be a showing that the employer meaningfully affects matters relating to the employment relationship such as hiring, firing, discipline, supervision, and direction. In Laerco, one corporation, CTL, provided labor to another corporation, Laerco, a company engaged in the trucking industry. At issue was whether the two corporations were joint employers. Although, the Board found that Laerco informed the CTL employees of their job duties, exercised minimal day-to-day supervision over them, and resolved minor grievances of the CTL employees, the Board concluded that Laerco was not a joint employer with CTL because the major elements of the employees' terms and conditions of employment were decided by CTL. Similarly, the Board did not find a joint employer relationship in H&W Motor Express, 271 NLRB 466 (1984), in which one corporation, Lin Rol, provided labor to H&W, a common carrier. In that case, a Lin Rol supervisor, who supervised the Lin Rol-supplied employees on a daily basis at the H&W terminal, also used a business card that identified him as the terminal manager for H&W, he entertained H&W customers, acted as H&W's representative for customer complaints, and signed timecards for H&W employees who were on H&W's payroll. Despite the identification as an H&W representative, the Board did not find a joint employer relationship. In the instant case, the evidence also is insufficient to establish that Host either identified itself as the owner of the Delta Northwest terminal or was a joint employer with Gladieux during the period between January and 23 March 1985. It is unclear from this record whether Kouba actually directed Powers to remove the signs or machines or made suggestions concerning these items. However, assuming that he gave directions, rather than made suggestions, this would not establish that Host meaningfully affected matters relating to the employees' terms and conditions of employment. Nor does the fact that the Gladieux employees completed application forms for Host or wore Host name tags establish that Host had control over the employees' terms and conditions of employment, particularly when the employees continued to be on the Gladieux payroll and under the day-to-day supervision of Gladieux supervisors.

In Radio Union Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), the Supreme Court stated the criteria to be used to determine whether separate enterprises constitute a single employer:

> The controlling criteria set out and elaborated in Board decisions are interrelating of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership.

This record does not establish that the operations of the two corporations are interrelated, or that they have common officers or directors, or common supervisors, or a common labor policy. It does establish that the two corporations maintain separate payrolls and have separate labor policies, different operating procedures, different supervisory personnel, and different personnel procedures. The fact that Host and Gladieux are wholly owned subsidiaries of the Marriott Corporation does not warrant a finding that the two corporations constitute a single employer. In Los Angeles Newspaper Guild Local 69 (Hearst Corp.), 185 NLRB 303 (1970), the Board held that even divisions of the same corporation can be considered as separate persons if the parent corporation or the subsidiary does not exercise actual or active control as opposed to potential control over the day-to-day operations or the labor relations of the other. In the instant case, there is no evidence that either Host or the Marriott Corporation exercised actual control over the day-to-day operations or the labor relations policies of Gladieux. Nor does the instant case present the type of situation that existed in Teamsters Local 560 (Curtin Matheson Scientific), 248 NLRB 1212 (1980), in which the Board found that the operations and management of two branches of the same corporation were so integrated that the union did not violate Section 8(b)(4)(B) of the Act when it picketed at the location of one branch in furtherance of its dispute with another branch at a different location. Accordingly, I do not find that Host was a joint employer with Gladieux for the Gladieux employees,[21] nor do I find that the two corporations constituted a single enterprise during the period between January and 23 March 1985. Therefore, I do not find that Host discharged Rizzo and Sarubbi.

B. Kowalsky's Testimony

It is the position of counsel for Host that Kowalsky's testimony should be struck, in accordance with the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 3500 and Section 102.118(b)(1) and (2) of the Board's Rules and Regulations because the General Counsel failed to produce notes he secured during a conversation with Kowalsky on 28 May 1986, although he had been directed by the judge to produce the notes for purposes of cross-examination. Counsel further argues that it was incumbent on the General Counsel to explain why the notes could not be produced and this he failed to do. Although the General Counsel did state on the record that he destroyed the notes after he incorporated them into an affidavit that he subsequently took from Kowalsky, counsel maintains that such a statement does not constitute evidence. Counsel further argues that it was improper and a violation of rule 4.2 of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct[22] for the General Counsel to secure an affidavit from Kowalsky, without Host's permission, while Kowalsky was employed as a manager for Host.

Kowalsky testified that after he was informed that he would be on paid leave while the transcript of the hearing in this case was being examined by Host supervisors, he decided to contact the Board attorney who was responsible for Rizzo and Sarubbi's case. Kowalsky claimed that he had wanted to cooperate sooner because he thought the two men were "blackballed," but he was concerned about his job. It is clear that Kowalsky voluntarily contacted the General Counsel because he believed that his discharge was imminent. Kowalsky secured the telephone number of the General Counsel from Rizzo; he called the General Counsel and arranged a meeting with him at a diner in Queens. During this phone conversation, the General Counsel asked Kowalsky if he had permission from Host to meet with him, and Kowalsky responded that he did not need Host's permission, he wanted to cooperate with the Government. The Board attorney told him that he could not speak to him if he was still employed by Host without Host's permission and Kowalsky responded that he did not know how long he would be on leave but as far as he was concerned he had been terminated.[23] Kowalsky testified that "he almost forced himself on Mr. Cohen and I told him that I did not have any attachments with anyone."

According to Kowalsky, he first met with the General Counsel on 28 May 1986 and during this meeting the Government attorney took notes of their conversation, showed him the notes, and asked if they reflected what he had said and Kowalsky agreed that the notes were correct. Kowalsky met again with the same Government attorney on 4 June 1986 and during this meeting the attorney took an affidavit which, according to Kowalsky, incorporated the notes taken during his first meeting with the General Counsel.

In Campell v. U.S., 365 U.S. 85, 102 (1961), the Court stated the following:

> Nothing in the legislative history of the Act [i.e., Sec. 3500] remotely suggests that Congress' intent was to require the Government, with penalizing consequences, to preserve all records and notes taken during the countless interviews that are connected with the criminal investigation by the various branches of the Government.

The Court in Killian v. U.S., 368 U.S. 231 (1961), also stated that if records were destroyed in good faith by Government agents in accordance with their normal practice it would be clear that their destruction did not constitute an impermissable destruction of evidence, nor deprive a petitioner of any rights. A similar statement was made in U.S. v. Augenblick, 393 U.S. 348, 356 (1963), when tapes made by an agent of the Government during a conversation he had with a defendant were lost. The Court stated:

> The record is devoid of credible evidence that [the tapes] were suppressed. Whether Mendelson[24] should have been recalled is a matter of debate and perhaps doubt. But questions of that character do not rise to a constitutional level.

[21] I do not consider the fact that Powers gave the discharge letters to the two individuals sufficient evidence to establish that a joint employer relationship existed prior to 23 March 1985.

[22] Rule 4.2, Model Rules of Professional Conduct states:

> In representing a client, a lawyer shall not communicate about the subject of a representation with a party the lawyer knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the lawyer has the consent of the other lawyer or is authorized to do so under law.

[23] Kowalsky was at the time still on Host's payroll but he was not working.

[24] Mendelson was the Federal agent.

The Court went on to note that a constitutionally unfair trial occurs only when barriers and safeguards are so relaxed or forgotten that the proceeding is more a spectacle or trial by ordeal than a disciplined contest. In U.S. v. Hinton, 719 F.2d 711 (4th Cir. 1983), the court concluded, after a detailed examination of numerous cases, that both the Supreme Court and a majority of circuit courts have indicated that rough interim notes of a Government agent that are later incorporated into the agent's formal interview report are not written statements within the meaning of the Jencks Act and need not be preserved. In the instant case, although the General Counsel did not testify he did state that he destroyed the notes after he incorporated them into Kowalsky's affidavit, and Kowalsky did testify that the notes were incorporated into the affidavit. Thus, it appears that the instant case presents the type of situation where the notes would not be considered a statement that must be produced. Moreover, after having had the opportunity to consider the language in the Supreme Court's decision in Goldberg v. U.S., 425 U.S. 94 (1976), which deals, in part, with what constitutes the type of statement that must be produced, I am convinced that the notes in question are not statements that must be produced. The Court in Goldberg held that an agent's notes can be considered a statement of a witness only on a finding that the notes reflected the witness' own words fully and without distortion and only on a finding of an unambiguous and specific approval of the specific notes by the witness. The evidence in this record does not establish that Kowalsky thoroughly examined the notes and gave an unambiguous and specific approval of those notes. In addition, the Court has stated that the administration of the Jencks statute must be entrusted to the good sense and experience of the trial judge subject to appropriate limited review by the appellate courts. Palermo v. U.S., 360 U.S. 343, 353 (1959). In the instant case, as noted, Kowalsky testified that what he told the Board attorney during the meeting on 28 May 1986 was incorporated into his affidavit. This affidavit was produced and was used by counsel during his cross-examination of Kowalsky and, therefore, I am not persuaded that counsel was prejudiced by the lack of the notes. Furthermore, although Kowalsky's affidavit and testimony referred to statements by Host representatives, those representatives were not called to testify or did not refute these statements. In these circumstances, it is unlikely that possession of the notes would have been of assistance to counsel.

Under paragraph 10056.5 of the Casehandling Manual of the Board, a Board agent is not precluded from receiving information from a supervisor or agent of the charged party when the individual comes forward voluntarily, and when it is specifically indicated that the individual does not wish to have the charged party's counsel or representative present. That paragraph, counsel for Host maintains, is inconsistent with rule 4.2 of the Model Rules of Professional Conduct and with the Supreme Court's decision in Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402 (1971). In that decision, counsel claims that the Court established three guidelines to test the propriety of agency regulations; promulgation of the regulations must not exceed the agency's statutory authority, regulations must not be arbitrary, and the agency must follow necessary procedural requirements. Despite counsel's argument, the Board, with Court approval, has continued to consider evidence received from a supervisor when the supervisor comes forward voluntarily and has indicated that he does not want respondent's counsel present. Aeroglustics, Inc., 228 NLRB 1157 (1977), enfd. 610 F.2d 455 (6th Cir. 1979); B. C. Hawk Chevrolet, 226 NLRB 527 (1976), enfd. 582 F.2d 491 (9th Cir. 1978). In the present case, the record clearly establishes that Kowalsky came forward voluntarily and did not seek to have Host's counsel present during the interview. It was Kowalsky who contacted the General Counsel and "forced" himself on that representative and Kowalsky certainly indicated that he did not want Host's counsel present during the interview when he told the General Counsel that he did not need Host's permission to talk to him and that he had no attachments to anyone.[25] Accordingly, Kowalsky's testimony will be considered.

C. Whether Deferral to the Arbitrator's Award is Warranted

The General Counsel asserts that the arbitration awards should not be deferred to for three reasons: the awards concern Host's discharge of Rizzo and Sarubbi in 1981 and are not dispositive of the events in 1985; the arbitrator was not presented with the unfair labor practice issue and, therefore, he did not consider it; and the Board does not defer to an arbitrator's decision when an 8(a)(4) violation is alleged. Counsel for Host argues that the arbitrator's awards are binding because the Charging Parties failed to reasonably raise the unfair labor practice issue during the arbitration proceedings and failed to utilize the statutory procedures available to vacate the awards. He further argues that the Charging Parties settled their earlier cases and have made no attempt to reopen those cases and, therefore, the General Counsel is estopped from relitigating those cases. Counsel also argues that although the General Counsel stated that he was not attempting to relitigate the earlier cases but was merely introducing the earlier cases as background evidence, paragraph 23 of the second amended complaint states otherwise. However, if the General Counsel seeks to introduce the evidence surrounding the 1981 discharges only for purpose of background evidence, he should not be permitted to do so because records which would support Host's position that the two individuals were discharged for cause have been destroyed and are not available and, therefore, Host will be denied due process.

As the counsel for the General Counsel notes, the instant case involves events that occurred in 1985 while the arbitrator's awards deal with matters that occurred in 1981. Assuming that deferral was proper in connection with earlier discharges, it cannot be held that the awards encompass events that had not occurred at the time of the arbitration proceeding. Host's argument that the events in 1985 are intertwined with the events of 1981 will be discussed below.

Furthermore, I am not convinced that deferral to those awards would be proper even with respect to the events that occurred in 1981. In this connection, it should be noted that despite the arbitrator's award the Regional Director issued a consolidated complaint in Cases 29–CA–9486–1 and 29–CA–9486–2, wherein he alleged that the discharges of Rizzo and Sarubbi in 1981 were in violation of the Act. And despite the arbitrator's awards, Host agreed to and did pay moneys to settle the allegations of those complaints. Thus, it appears that the Regional Director did not defer to the arbitrator's decision and Host, by its agreement to settle the complaints, accepted the Regional Director's decision not to defer to the arbitrator's awards.

Assuming, that Host did not waive its defense based on the issue of the awards, it should be noted that the arbitrator's awards did not refer to the unfair labor practice issue that occurred in 1981. In Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), the Board adopted the standards that it would apply for deferral to arbitration. The Board stated that they would find that an arbitrator adequately considered the unfair labor practice if (1) the contractual issue were factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue and (2) the arbitrator were presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice issue. In the instant case, the unfair labor practice issue was not presented to the arbitrator. Rizzo testified that he attempted to introduce the issue but the arbitrator did not appear to be interested. Sarubbi testified that he did not raise the issue because he was advised not to do so by the union business agent. In these circumstances, where the issue was not raised, it is clear that the arbitrator could not have adequately considered it because he did not have the facts relevant to the resolution of the unfair labor practice issue. Counsel for Host concedes that the arbitrator did not have the facts relevant to the unfair labor practice issue. However, he argues that the only reason the arbitrator did not have the relevant facts was because Rizzo and Sarubbi chose not to present those facts to the arbitrator despite being afforded the opportunity to do so. Rizzo, credibly, testified that he did attempt to discuss the unfair labor practice issue but the arbitrator expressed disinterest. In any event, the Board has indicated that the fact that there is an opportunity to present the relevant facts on the unfair labor practice issue is not sufficient, absent evidence that the facts were presented. In Electronic Reproduction Service Corp., 213 NLRB 758 (1974), the Board had held that when the arbitration forum was available for the discussion of the unfair labor practice issue and a party chose not to use it and because of that fact the arbitrator did not consider the issue it would, nevertheless, defer to the awards. In Olin, supra at fn. 10, the Board stated, "we are not returning to Electronic Reproduction Service, 213 NLRB 758 (1974), in its entirety . . . . We do not resurrect that part of Electronic Reproduction which required no more than an 'opportunity' to present the unfair labor practice issue to the arbitrator to warrant deferral." In Taylor v. NLRB, 786 F.2d 1516 (11th Cir. 1986), the court refused to enforce a Board order where the Board had deferred to an award by an area grievance committee when there was no showing that the committee had considered any facts relevant to the unfair labor practice.

The evidence in this record establishes that Host decided to discharge Rizzo because he filed the lawsuit and decided to discharge Sarubbi as a coverup for Rizzo's discharge. Swingle, credibly, testified that statements to that effect were made by Supervisors McDougal and Christie on several occasions and both indicated the "shoppers" would be used in order to effect those discharges. Neither McDougal nor Christie was called to refute that testimony. Rizzo, credibly, testified, that Easterling, another supervisor, told him that his name was on a hit list with the names of other employees involved in the lawsuit and that Sarubbi's name was put on the list as a cover for Rizzo's discharge. Easterling was not called to refute that testimony.[26] Based on this unrefuted testimony, I find that Rizzo was discharged because he joined with other employees to file a lawsuit after they were physically restrained on Host's premises because of alleged violation of company rules, without being afforded the opportunity for union representation. I also find that Sarubbi was discharged to cover the discharge of Rizzo.[27] The Supreme Court, in Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 568 (1978), has held that employees are engaged in mutual aid and protection when they seek to improve working conditions by resort to judicial forums.

Although, I have found that the arbitrator's awards are not binding and that Rizzo was discharged because he filed the lawsuit and Sarubbi was discharged as a cover for Rizzo's discharge, I note that there was an out-of-Board settlement regarding those discharges. There is no dispute that during a hearing on the discharges the parties decided to settle the complaint allegations. Host agreed to pay a certain sum of money to Rizzo and Sarubbi and they agreed to withdraw the charges and the lawsuit. However, the parties disagree about whether Rizzo and Sarubbi waived their right to reinstatement and/or reemployment. The parties did not reduce their agreement to writing and much of the discussions concerning the settlement were not conducted in face-to-face meetings. Rather, the Host representatives were in one room and Rizzo and Sarubbi in another room with the Board agents shuttling back and forth with proposals and counterproposals. Due to the manner in which the negotiations were conducted, it appears that the parties misunderstood each other and that there was no true meeting of the minds between the parties. The Board has stated that when there is no meeting of the minds, a settlement agreement may be set aside and the underlying [26] The fact that the waitresses who worked with Rizzo and Sarubbi also were shopped is insufficient to outweigh the testimony given by Swingle, Rizzo, and Sarubbi, particularly when Host failed to call witnesses to refute that testimony and offered no explanation for its failure to do so. When a party fails to call a witness to refute testimony the trier of the facts can presume that they could not refute the testimony. Laredo Coca Cola Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 1338 (5th Cir. 1980).

[27] Host's contention that it was denied due process because it did not have available certain records to rebut the prima facie case established by the General Counsel is without merit. Host failed to call witnesses to rebut the testimony on which I relied to decide that the discharges were in violation of the Act.

issues may be litigated. Stage Employees Local 659 (MPO-TV), 197 NLRB 1187 (1972); Boilermakers Local 5 (Regor Construction), 249 NLRB 840 (1980). D. Whether Host's Claim that Rizzo and Sarubbi Waived Their Right to Future Employment is Relevant

As noted, it is Host's position that during the negotiations to resolve the earlier discharges in Cases 29–CA–9486–1 and 29–CA–9486–2, Rizzo and Sarubbi waived all rights to future employment with Host. Counsel for Host contends that even if there was a misunderstanding about whether Rizzo and Sarubbi waived all rights to future employment, such an honest disagreement does not preclude a good-faith reliance by Host on its understanding of the agreement in determining whether to offer employment to Rizzo and Sarubbi.

Assuming arguendo, that Trosclair had stated during the negotiations that the Company would not reemploy Rizzo and Sarubbi at any time in the future, I do not consider that fact relevant to the issues in this case. The decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi in March 1983 was not made by Trosclair. That decision, according to the evidence in this record, was made solely by Kouba. Kouba testified that he did not know Rizzo or Sarubbi personally, neither had worked for him. He expressed a limited knowledge about either the lawsuit or the charges that had been filed by Rizzo and Sarubbi. In fact, at one point he testified that he did not know that Rizzo had filed a lawsuit or charges and insofar as this record discloses there is no evidence that he knew that the lawsuit and the charges had been settled, nor does it disclose that he knew the details of the settlement. There was no testimony that Trosclair disclosed the details of the settlement to Kouba. Kouba testified that he decided not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi solely because he knew that they had been discharged for cause and it was against company policy to hire employees who had been discharged for cause. At no point in his testimony did Kouba claim that the alleged waiver of future employment entered into his decision not to hire the two individuals. In these circumstances, it is difficult to understand the relevancy of the alleged waiver to Kouba's decision not to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi.

E. Whether Host Refused to Hire Rizzo and Sarubbi in Violation of the Act

Host contends that under Board law a postsettlement violation cannot be proven by presettlement violations when charges relating to presettlement allegations were withdrawn by a charging party or dismissal by the Board and when the postsettlement violation is inextricably intertwined with the withdrawn or dismissed charges. In support of this position, counsel cites Leeward Nursing Home, 278 NLRB 1058 (1986); and Ventura Coastal Corp., 264 NLRB 291 (1982).

In Ventura, an employee filed a charge in May 1978 alleging that during a union organizing campaign an employer coerced and restrained employees by promising benefits and threatening plant closure. That charge was amended to add additional allegations concerning an overbroad nonsolicitation policy, surveillance, and granting of benefits. Between 29 and 31 July 1978 the employee who had filed the charge was advised by a supervisor that the employee had been denied a promotion and a transfer because of his activities on behalf of a union and because he had filed a charge with the Board. The employee did not then file a charge based on these disclosures. Thereafter, the Regional Director, over the objections of the employee, approved a settlement in August 1978 of the charges that had been filed in May 1978. The employee forwarded a letter to the Regional Director in October 1978 wherein he objected to the Regional Director's failure to require the company to post notices in Spanish and in which he advised the Regional Director that the union planned to file new charges. In December 1978, the union did file charges based on the information that the employee had gained from the supervisor about the company's failure to promote and its refusal to transfer him for discriminatory reasons. By the time the charges were filed, the employee had been laid off, not because he was discriminatorily selected for layoff, rather his layoff was the direct result of the company's discriminatory practice against him some months before the layoff. The administrative law judge (Ventura, supra at 298) concluded that under the rule in Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel Co., 235 NLRB 1397 (1978), "a settlement agreement bars subsequent litigation of presettlement conduct alleged to constitute unfair labor practices," unless the violations that occurred prior to the settlement agreement were unknown to the General Counsel, not readily discovered by investigation or specifically reserved from the settlement by mutual agreement of the parties. The administrative law judge concluded in Ventura, with Board approval, that the exceptions did not apply because at the time that the Regional Director approved the settlement agreement the employee was aware of the alleged discrimination against him but failed to disclose it, and before the compliance with the terms of the settlement agreement had been completed the employee had put the Regional Director on notice about the Union's plan to file new charges. In these circumstances, the judge found that the presettlement discrimination against the employee was known to the employee and was readily discoverable by the Regional Director and therefore the exceptions to the general rule in Hollywood were not applicable. He also held that the eventual layoff of the employee was a natural consequence of the settlement-barred demotion, there was no independent evidence concerning the unlawful nature of the layoff, it was necessary to look to the settlement barred demotion to establish that the layoff was discriminatory.

In Leeward, during an organizing campaign, the schedule of an employee, Chang, was changed. As a result of this change in her schedule, Chang was unable to arrive at work on time and she was disciplined for this failure. The union filed charges about this change in Chang's schedule and the discipline in which they alleged that the change in her schedule had been made for discriminatory reasons. Subsequently, the union and the company entered into a settlement agreement to resolve the allegations of this charge and this agreement was approved by the Regional Director on 28 October. On 4 November, the union filed a new charge in which it alleged that the company violated Section 8(a)(3) in relation to Chang because of her changed work schedule. This charge was withdrawn and the withdrawal was approved on 19 November. Chang eventually was discharged on 17 December because of her continual failure to arrive timely to work. It is undisputed that her failure to arrive timely was due to the change in her work schedule, which had been made for discriminatory reasons. On 3 January the union filed new charges but these charges did not mention Chang by name, nor did they contain language that facially covered her work schedule change, her discipline, or eventual discharge. The General Counsel, prior to trial, amended the complaint, which had issued on the basis of the charge filed on 3 January, to allege that the company had violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by its discharge of Chang on 17 December. It is undisputed that there were no independent discriminatory acts by the company in relation to Chang, her discharge was the direct result of the change in her work schedule some months before. The administrative law judge, with Board approval, dismissed the complaint in its entirety. In connection with the dismissal of the allegation, which related to Chang, the judge made two points, first the charge that specifically related to Chang had been withdrawn in November and the charge which had been filed in January was unrelated to the allegations concerning Chang. The Judge, in accordance with the holding in Winer Motors, 265 NLRB 1457, 1458 (1982), found that the withdrawn charge had not been reinstated within the 10(b) period and concluded that Section 10(b) barred consideration of the incidents relating to Chang, which had preceded the withdrawn charges. He also concluded that consideration of the suspension and discharge of Chang were barred by Section 10(b) because the finding of a violation regarding those actions was "inextricably linked to a finding of illegality in the time-barred event."[28]

The second point made by the judge concerning his dismissal of the allegations that related to Chang concerned the effect of the settlement agreement on those allegations. The judge, as he had done in Ventura, concluded that the rule in Hollywood Roosevelt controlled, and none of the exceptions to that rule were applicable and, thus, the presettlement events that surrounded the change in Chang's schedule could not be litigated. He further stated that in a limited number of cases a settlement may have a certain "prospective" reached in that it will bar efforts to litigate alleged postsettlement violations, which are themselves inescapably grounded in presettlement actions that would be barred from litigation by the settlement. He concluded that there were no independent violations of the Act committed by respondent, Chang's discharge was the direct result of the discriminatory change in her schedule, and that issue could not be litigated. Therefore, there was no evidence to support the allegation of discriminatory discharge.

Although, as noted, I do not believe that there was a meeting of the minds with respect to the settlement agreement and, therefore, do not believe that the agreement bars litigation of the 1981 discharges, I note that there are significant differences between the cases cited by counsel for Host and the instant case. In Leeward, the administrative law judge found that the charge, which alleged a violation of Section 8(a)(3) concerning Chang, was withdrawn and no new charge was filed in the 10(b) period. This is not the situation in the instant case. The charge in this case alleged violations based on events that occurred in March 1985 and the charge was filed, timely, with respect to those events. The charge, which was withdrawn in May 1983 after the settlement was reached related to acts by Host that occurred in September 1981. Further, unlike the situation in Ventura and Leeward, I do not find that the discriminatory conduct of Host in March 1985 is "inextricably intertwined" with the events of September 1981. The layoff in Ventura and the discharge in Leeward were the natural consequences of the original discriminatory conduct of the respondents in those cases, those respondents did not commit additional discriminatory acts. This is not the situation in this case. Host's representatives did engage in further discriminatory acts, they refused to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi because they had trouble with them at LaGuardia.[29] This refusal was not the natural flow of the original discriminatory conduct, it was a new act of discrimination within the 10(b) period. Although Powers did not specify what the trouble was that the Company had with Rizzo and Sarubbi when it refused to hire them, it is evident from Board cases that, at the very least, background evidence may be considered to establish what the Company considered the trouble to be. The General Counsel has established that the Company refused to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi because Rizzo had filed a lawsuit and because both had filed charges with the Board. Host failed to rebut that prima facie case. Accordingly, I find that Host has violated the Act. NLRB v. AA Electric Co., 405 U.S. 117 (1972); NLRB v. Globe Mfg. Co., 544 F.2d 1118, 1120 (1st Cir. 1976); First National Bank & Trust Co., 209 NLRB 95 (1974), enfd. 505 F.2d 729 (3d Cir. 1974).

signed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including the posting of remedial notices.

Having found that Host discharged Sarubbi on 15 September 1981 and Rizzo on 24 September 1981 and refused to hire Sarubbi on 14 March 1985 and Rizzo on 15 March 1985, I shall recommend that Host offer them employment and make them whole for any loss of wages or other benefits resulting from their discharges and from the failure of Host to hire them by payment to them of a sum of money equal to the amount they would have earned in wages and other benefits from the date of the discharge and refusal to hire to the date on which employment is offered, less net earnings. The amount of backpay shall be calculated in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977); see also Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

I will recommend also that Host rescind and remove all reference in its records to the discharges of Rizzo and Sarubbi and to the refusal to hire them. I shall further recommend that Host preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying all payroll records, social security records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due to them.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Host is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Host discharged Sarubbi and Rizzo on 15 and 24 September 1981 and failed and refused to hire them on 14 and 15 March 1985 in violation of Section 8(a)(4) and (1) of the Act.

3. The unfair labor practices described above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[30]

ORDER

The Respondent, Host International, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of Marriott Corporation, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging Virgilio Rizzo because he filed a lawsuit and Joseph Sarubbi to cover Rizzo's discharge and failing and refusing to hire Rizzo and Sarubbi for the above reasons and because they filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

(b) In any like or related manner violating provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Virgilio Rizzo and Joseph Sarubbi employment with Host at its facility at the JFK Airport as bartenders or equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges and make them whole with interest in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Rescind and remove all references to their discharges and/or their protected concerted activities and advise them in writing that this has been done and inform them that Host's unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions concerning them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its JFK facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[31] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[30] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[31] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On May 30, 1986, the Regional Director for Region 17 issued a Decision and Clarification of Bargaining Unit in the above-captioned proceeding. In his decision, the Regional Director concluded that the existing unit of all full-time and regular part-time news editors employed by the Employer[1] should be clarified to include the position of sports producer/news writer.

Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review alleging that, contrary to the conclusion of the Regional Director, the sports producers/news writers should be excluded from the unit. The Petitioner filed a statement in opposition, contending that the Regional Director's decision accreting these employees to the unit was correct. By unpublished order dated October 14, 1986, the Board (Member Stephens dissenting) granted the Employer's request for review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Employer operates two radio stations: KMBZ, an AM station with a news, information, and sports format; and KMBR, an FM easy-listening music station which also broadcasts some news. In November 1985 the Employer acquired the right to broadcast Kansas City Royals baseball games and KMBZ, which had always broadcast some sports, made plans to increase its sports coverage with the beginning of the baseball season in the spring of 1986. In March the Employer announced the posting of job openings for two sports producers/news writers. Two news editors, Cook and Poor, were awarded the positions in April 1986.

The news editors, who comprise the existing unit, report to Managing Editor Holderby, who reports to News Program Director Ludlum. They work in the newsroom which they do not leave except in an emergency. Their primary responsibilities are to monitor the broadcasts of the stations on the air, monitor the police "scanners," and "rip" the wire services, that is, tear copy as it comes from the wire service machines and place it in baskets according to topics. News editors must also record certain "audio feeds" or transmissions from the wire services and other sources. They make "beat calls" to police and fire agencies several times each shift looking for news, contact various newsmakers, and conduct telephone interviews. Coordinating this material, the news editors determine what will be heard on the air.[2] Generally the news editors work only 40 hours per week with their schedules being set by Holderby.

Like the news editors, sports producers/news writers Poor and Cook do interviews, but are not heard on the air. Unlike the news editors, they work throughout the studio and are not confined to the newsroom. When the Royals are playing home games, one works at the station and one at the stadium. The sports producer/news writer working at the stadium goes to the locker room and sets up equipment, discusses with the announcer who will be interviewed, and makes arrangements for the interview. Meanwhile, at the station, the other will be putting highlights of the game on tape, monitoring the game to make sure there are no breakdowns, and answering the telephone for the postgame call-in show.

The Employer presented testimony that the sports producers/news writers are supervised by Sports Director Davis who, along with his assistant, Burley, does the sports announcing. Davis is said to have the authority to make recommendations with respect to hiring and firing, but it does not appear whether he is a statutory supervisor. Poor and Cook work with Davis and Burley discussing with them what guests should be interviewed on the shows, making arrangements for the interview, selecting topics for specific programs, and supplying Davis and Burley with interesting facts and background material for the shows.

The sports producers/news writers, conferring with Davis, prepare their own schedules based on the team's schedule and turn them into Ludlum once a week. On occasion, when the team is in town, they work more than 40 hours per week. Like the news editors, they are hourly paid and receive the same benefits. When Cook and Poor became sports producers/news writers they received the same pay rate they had received as news editors with a promise of a review in 90 days.

[2] News editors themselves are never on the air. The Employer's on-air performers are represented by the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (AFTRA).

At the time of the hearing, the sports producers/news writers had not as yet performed any news writer functions. According to the Employer, as news writers they will be "reporters" except that they will not be heard on the air. They will be assigned to cover nonsports news such as news conferences, hearings, and special events in the community. In addition to their news writer assignments, in the off-season they will continue to be involved in sports programming.

The Petitioner filed the instant petition seeking to clarify the existing unit of news editors to include the two sports producers/news writers.

The Regional Director granted the requested accretion, noting that when new employees are found to have common interests with members of the existing bargaining unit and would, if in existence, have been included in the certified unit, accretion is proper. Though noting that sports producers/-news writers spend significant time away from the station, the Regional Director found that both the news editors and the sports producers/news writers are housed in the same facility. Both classifications provide support for on-air performers. The Regional Director relied on evidence that the Employer considered rotating the sports producer function among the news editors and eventually selected news editors to fill the positions. He also relied on Ludlum's having the actual supervisory authority over both groups and pointed out that both classifications enjoy the same wages and benefits and frequently share the same working areas. Finally he found that both classifications are instrumental in determining what will be aired and how it will be presented. Thus he concluded that there was a substantial community of interest among these employees that warranted the inclusion of both classifications in the same unit.

In requesting review, the Employer contends that the sports producers/news writers do not do news editors' work and have entirely different job functions. Further, the Employer points out that another producer, Morrison, whose duties are similar to those of the sports producers/news writers, has never been considered to have functions or interests similar to those of the news editors, and is not included in the existing unit. Morrison produces the midday program which airs each day. The record discloses that Morrison's job is "quite similar" or "about the same" as that of sports producer/news writer in that she lines up guests for interviews and arranges for them to appear on the midday show. She provides the two midday hosts with books, press releases, notes, and other material necessary for the broadcasts and sometimes suggests questions for the hosts to use in interviews.

We agree with the Regional Director's conclusion. In determining whether to grant a petition for unit clarification grounded on accretion, the Board examines whether the employees sought to be accreted not only possess a community of interest with the unit employees, but also lack a distinct identity that would warrant placing them in a separate unit.[3] Here the petitioner seeks the inclusion of a new classification—sports producer/news writer—into the existing unit of news editors. Essentially for the reasons stated by the Regional Director, we find that the sports producers, who produce material for the employees who broadcast the sports shows, have a community of interest with the news editors, who produce material for the employees who broadcast the news shows. In fact, as noted above, the two employees who comprise the new job classification were historically included in the unit as two of the five news editors. On obtaining broadcasting rights to the Kansas City Royals baseball games, the station management found that it must have personnel who could devote substantial time and energy to servicing the new sports shows. Because the skills and experience required to broadcast these events were similar to those required for the broadcast of the news shows, it was quite natural for the Employer to give the new assignment to the two news editors who had expressed an interest in it. But the reassignment did not significantly change or erode the community of interest which existed between the newly dubbed sports producers and their news editor colleagues.

With respect to the Employer's suggestion that the two sports producers have a separate identity in a theoretical unit composed of them and an employee known as the midday producer—apparently a preexisting, previously excluded job classification—we find the record evidence too sketchy and insufficient to conclude, as our dissenting colleague does, that the sports producers share a "greater community of interest" with the unrepresented midday producer. Moreover, we believe that the principal authorities relied on by our colleague are distinguishable. In Armstrong Rubber Co., 180 NLRB 410 (1969), the record evidence clearly demonstrated that the two units which the union sought to accrete into a third unit had a long-established and "close" community of interest with a number of the administrative employees who were unrepresented. United Hospitals, 249 NLRB 562 (1980), is likewise distinguishable on its facts. There the union sought to accrete into a multiemployer service and maintenance unit (covering 21 employers) a group of admitting clerks and interviewers employed by 2 employers who were consolidating operations. The record showed that while some of the admitting clerks employed at one division of one of the consolidating employers were part of the multiemployer unit, the remaining clerks and interviewers working for the second division of the first employer and those working for the second employer were unrepresented. Moreover, an "overwhelming majority" of the admitting clerks and interviewers among all the 21 employing entities comprising the multiemployer association had been historically excluded from the unit. On this basis, the Board declined to accrete those previously unrepresented admitting clerks and interviewers who worked for the two consolidating employers.[4] In contrast, the Union here is not attempting to bootstrap previously unrepresented employees into the unit. Indeed, in a sense, all that is involved is an effort by the Union to maintain continuity of representation in the existing bargaining relationship.

See also Machinists Local 190 v. NLRB, 759 F.2d 1477, 1481 (9th Cir. 1985) (the fact that the employees proposed to be accreted do lack a distinct identity does not necessarily require the accretion be granted; other factors may preclude accretion).

We affirm the Regional Director and clarify the unit to include the two employees now engaged in sports producing/news writing activity.

MEMBER BABSON, dissenting.

Unlike my colleagues, I would not clarify the existing unit of news editors to include the two sports producers/news writers. The Board has traditionally required in accretion cases that the petitioned-for employees share a very strong community of interest with the unit employees.[1] Such is not the case here, where the record makes quite clear that the sports producers/news writers have a greater community of interest with the midday producer, a nonunit employee.[2]

The record shows that the sports producers/-news writers and the midday producer work with hosts to produce shows centered around an interview format, while the unit employees primarily coordinate breaking news for use on newscasts. Employees in both positions deal with background material and interview aids, while the unit employees deal with news. While all three classifications work to support on-air performers, the duties of the sports producers/news writers are more similar to those of the excluded midday producer than to those of the unit employees.

On prior occasions, the Board has not permitted an accretion where the employees sought to be accreted shared a close community of interest with other employees whom the petitioner did not seek to represent. For example, in Armstrong Rubber Co., 180 NLRB 410, 411 (1969), the Board dismissed the clarification petition because the tire laboratory technicians and the scheduling department employees sought to be accreted shared a close community of interest with other nonunit employees who performed similar functions. More recently, in United Hospital, 249 NLRB 562, 563 (1980), the Board rejected a similar attempt at piecemeal expansion of the unit.

Based on the foregoing, I would not add the sports producers/news writers to the existing unit without a self-determination election[3] and, therefore, I respectfully dissent.

[4] It appears that those admitting clerks and interviewers who worked for one of the divisions of one of the consolidating employers and were represented by the Union still remained in the unit, despite the fact that after the consolidation they would be working together in a single department and in the same offices with many of the unrepresented clerks and interviewers. See 249 NLRB at 562-563. In other words, the close community of interests which the represented clerks and interviewers might be expected to develop with nonunion fellow clerks and interviewers would not result in exclusion from the multiemployer unit.

[2] The midday producer position predated the Union's certification, but the record does not disclose why this position was excluded from the unit. The Petitioner does not seek to clarify the unit to include the midday producer.

[3] I find it unnecessary to decide whether a unit consisting of the midday producers and the sports producers/news editors is appropriate because this issue was neither raised nor litigated.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 19, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief. The Union filed limited exceptions and a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions, to modify the remedy,[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The complaint alleged, inter alia, and the judge found, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by terminating its collective-bargaining agreement and making unilateral changes without having served the written notices required by Section 8(d)(3) of the Act.

As set forth in Weathercraft Co. of Topeka, 276 NLRB 452, 453 (1985), enfd. 832 F.2d 1229 (10th Cir. 1987),[2] Section 8(d)(3) unequivocally:

> provides that the duty to bargain includes serving written notice upon the other party to a collective-bargaining agreement of one's desire to terminate or modify it, with notice also to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the appropriate state agency.

As also set forth in Weathercraft, the Board has long held that:

> [f]ailure of a party desiring to terminate or modify a collective-bargaining agreement to give appropriate notice under Section 8(d)(3) precludes it from altering terms or conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement or engaging in a strike or lockout to enforce its proposed changes. This proscription exists notwithstanding that the expiration date of the agreement has past. [Id. at 453. See Meatcutters Local 576 (Kansas City Chip Steak Co.), 140 NLRB 876 (1963); United Marine Local 333 (General Marine Transportation Corp.), 228 NLRB 1107 (1977).]

Thus, an initiating party violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by changing the terms and conditions of an existing collective-bargaining agreement without having given the requisite 8(d)(3) notice to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the proper state mediation agency. See also United Artists Communications, 274 NLRB 75 (1985).[3]

Here, the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, at article II, section 3, provided that either party had the right to request changes in wage rates, and that if agreement was not reached within 60 days after receipt of written notice of such a request, the agreement would terminate "effective that date." On May 27, 1983, the Respondent sent a letter to the Union, which was received on May 30, 1983, giving 60 days' notice of its desire to renegotiate the existing wage and overtime rates. At that time, no notice was given to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service or to the state mediation agency. Although the parties held an initial bargaining meeting on July 18, 1983, no new agreement was reached. A second bargaining session did not occur until September 7, 1983. Thus, the contract, by its terms, could have expired 60 days after

[1] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[3] We are mindful that some courts have held, in varying contexts involving their jurisdiction to enforce contracts under Sec. 301, that an initiating party's failure to give timely 8(d)(3) notices does not result in an extension of the expired contract. See, e.g., Proctor & Gamble Independent Union v. Proctor & Gamble Mfg., 312 F.2d 181 (2d Cir. 1962); Communications Workers v. Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 713 F.2d 1118 (5th Cir. 1983). See also Ottley v. Sheepshead Nursing Home, 688 F.2d 883 (2d Cir. 1982). We need not decide whether an initiating party's failure to give timely 8(d)(3) notices actually "extends" the contract. However, we reaffirm, as set forth in cases like Weathercraft, supra, that an initiating party's failure to comply with Sec. 8(d)(3) extends the time during which it has an independent statutory, not contractual, obligation to refrain from altering terms and conditions of employment established by the contract. See also NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). Pursuant to the Board's exclusive jurisdiction to prevent unfair labor practices under Sec. 10, this statutory obligation to refrain from unilateral changes is enforceable through Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 8(b)(3). Indeed, the courts in Proctor & Gamble, supra, 312 F.2d at 190, and Southwestern Bell, supra, 713 F.2d at 1125, both acknowledged the difference between deciding the pure contract issue in a Sec. 301 suit and determining whether there is a violation of the statutory duty to bargain in good faith. See also Laborers Fund v. Advanced Lightweight Concrete Co., 108 S.Ct. 830 (1988).

Moreover, to the extent that the court precedent cited above may be read as in conflict with the result reached here, we respectfully adhere to the reasoning set out in Weathercraft, supra, and Mar-Len Cabinets, supra. See also the analysis in United Marine Division Local 333, 228 NLRB 1107 (1977); and Carpenters District Council of Denver (Rocky Mountain Prestress), 172 NLRB 793 (1968).

the Union's receipt of the Respondent's reopening letter.

Ultimately, the Respondent delivered a copy of its wage reopener letter to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service on November 30, 1983, and it sent a copy of its wage reopener letter to the State Mediation and Conciliation Service on December 12, 1983. Under these circumstances, the Respondent was obligated—by Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act—to continue in full force and effect all the terms and conditions of the contract until January 12, 1984—i.e., 30 days after proper 8(d)(3) notices were given.

However, subsequent to July 30, 1983, but prior to January 12, 1984, and as more fully described by the judge, the Respondent made certain unilateral changes in the employees' terms and conditions of employment. Specifically, the judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally (a) discontinuing the dues-checkoff and union-security provisions of the contract, (b) discontinuing the grievance/arbitration provisions of the contract, and (c) discontinuing the payment of trust fund contributions required by the contract.

With regard to dues checkoff and union security, the General Counsel and the Charging Party argue, in essence, that these provisions remain in effect to present. They seek a make-whole remedy for the Respondent's failure to withhold and transmit dues. The Respondent contends that these provisions became ineffective on or about July 30, 1983—the date on which the contract, by its terms, could have expired. Thus, the Respondent argues that no make-whole remedy is appropriate.

Based on our finding that the Respondent was obligated to maintain the terms and conditions of the contract until January 12, 1984, we conclude that the dues remained effective until that date.[4] Thus, a make-whole remedy for authorized dues not deducted up to January 12, 1984, is proper.[5]

With regard to the Respondent's failure to adhere to the grievance/arbitration provisions, we find that, consistent with the above discussion, the Respondent was obligated to maintain those provisions until January 12, 1984. Subsequent to that date, the standards clarified by the Board in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 284 NLRB 53 (1987), regarding the scope of the postcontract duty to arbitrate are applicable and define the Respondent's obligations with regard to grievance/arbitration.

The parties stipulated in relevant part that: "At the September 7, 1983 meeting, [the Respondent] confirmed to the Union its position that the contract had expired . . . . [The Respondent] advised the Union that the . . . grievance and arbitration provisions were, therefore, no longer in effect." In subsequent negotiations, the Respondent maintained this position. Accordingly, both before and after January 12, 1984, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to process grievances.[6] See also Bethlehem Steel Co., 136 NLRB 1500, 1503 (1962), enfd. in pertinent part 320 F.2d 615 (3d Cir. 1963). Further, the Respondent's failure to maintain the arbitration provision of the contract until January 12, 1984, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Finally, with regard to the period after January 12, 1984, the Respondent's course of conduct demonstrated an across-the-board refusal to arbitrate hiatus grievances and thus constituted a wholesale repudiation of its postcontractual obligation to arbitrate, thereby violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Based on the above, we shall order, as a remedy, that the Respondent, on request, process any grievances filed both before and after January 12, 1984. Regarding any grievances filed between July 30, 1983, and January 12, 1984, the Respondent will be ordered to arbitrate them, on request.

However, regarding any grievances filed after January 12, 1984, we cannot determine—based on the evidence before us—whether the rights invoked in those grievances arose under the contract. Accordingly, we shall not order that the Respondent arbitrate any post-January 12, 1984 grievances.

Finally, with regard to the Respondent's unilateral discontinuance of trust fund payments, the Board has long held that the obligation to make such payments survives a contract's expiration. See, e.g., Parkview Furniture Mfg. Co., 284 NLRB 947 (1987); Hen House Market No. 3, 175 NLRB 596 (1969). Thus, the judge correctly ordered a make-whole remedy for losses resulting from the Respondent's discontinuance of trust fund payments.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Petroleum Maintenance Company,

[4] The Board has held that dues-checkoff and union-security provisions do not survive the expiration of a contract. See, e.g., Robbins Door & Sash Co., 260 NLRB 659 (1982), and Peerless Roofing Co., 247 NLRB 500, 505 (1980). Similarly, here, the Respondent was obligated to maintain those provisions only until 30 days after it gave the appropriate 8(d)(3) notices.

[5] Interest on the amounts owed is to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, supra.

[6] The judge found that, subsequent to July 30, 1983, the Respondent was willing to, and did, discuss grievances with the Union's grievance committee. However, in light of the Respondent's statement that the grievance procedure was no longer in effect, we shall adopt the judge's finding of a violation of the Act.

Lomita, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraphs 2(c) and (d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(c) Reimburse the Union for all membership dues which the Respondent failed to withhold and transmit to the Union prior to January 12, 1984, pursuant to signed dues-deduction authorizations, with interest as provided in the Board's decision.

"(d) Notify the Union that the Respondent will, on request, process any grievance filed after July 30, 1983, and will, on request, arbitrate those grievances filed between July 30, 1983, and January 12, 1984."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT terminate our collective-bargaining agreement with Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, and its Locals 1-19 and 1-128 and make unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment without giving the proper notices required by Section 8(d) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change bargaining unit employees' terms and conditions of employment prior to offering the terms to and bargaining to a good-faith impasse with the Union.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to furnish the Union with information that it requested which is relevant and necessary to the Union's status as exclusive bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees and, if agreement is reached, embody that agreement in a written, signed instrument.

WE WILL restore, to the extent requested by the Union, the wages, hours, and working conditions which were in effect in the bargaining unit at the expiration of the last bargaining agreement on July 30, 1983.

WE WILL reimburse the Union for all membership dues which we failed to withhold and transmit to the Union prior to January 12, 1984, pursuant to signed dues deduction authorizations, with interest.

WE WILL, on request, process any grievances filed after July 30, 1983, and WE WILL, on request, arbitrate those grievances filed between July 30, 1983, and January 12, 1984.

WE WILL furnish the Union, on request, the requested information relevant to the Union's status as collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL make our employees whole for any losses they incurred as a result of our unilateral discontinuance of the employee benefit trust fund payments and as a result of the unilateral wage decreases, and pay the appropriate interest on such amounts of money.

PETROLEUM MAINTENANCE COMPANY

Raymond M. Norton, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Lana Borsook, Esq. (Kadency, Cohen & Schwaber), of Los Angeles, California, for the Respondent.
Wallace B. Knox, Esq. (Burris, Karp & Mooney), of Beverly Hills, California, for the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard these cases in trial at Los Angeles, California, on March 12, 1985. The cases arose as follows: On September 16, 1983, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, and its Locals 1-19 and 1-128 (the Union) filed a charge against Petroleum Maintenance Company (Respondent) in Case 31-CA-13517. Pursuant to that charge the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing on November 30, 1983. Thereafter, on October 11 and 24, 1984, the Union filed a charge and an amended charge, respectively, in Case 31-CA-14571 against Respondent. On December 31, 1984, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated amended complaint and notice of hearing in both cases. The consolidated complaint alleges, in substance, that Respondent engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record,[1] on the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent has been at all times material a California limited partnership with offices and a principal place of business located in Lomita, California, where it is engaged in the business of providing labor for maintenance and repair of petroleum refineries. During the normal course of its business operations, Respondent annually sells goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers within the State of California, which customers themselves meet one of the Board's jurisdictional standards, other than the indirect inflow or indirect outflow standard. Accordingly, Respondent admits and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The Union is now, and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Effective March 26, 1974, Respondent and the Union entered into a collective-bargaining agreement concerning rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees of Respondent in an appropriate bargaining unit.[2] The collective-bargaining agreement was modified by the parties in June 1982 as set forth in a memorandum of agreement executed on or about June 17, 1982, a schedule "A" dated April 6, 1982, and a letter of understanding executed on or about June 17, 1982. The collective-bargaining agreement, as modified, remained in effect at least through May 1983. Respondent contends that the agreement was terminated on July 30, 1983. The General Counsel and the Union contend that the agreement continued beyond July 30, 1983, until at least January 12, 1984, because Respondent failed to give proper notice to the Federal and State Mediation Services required under Section 8(d)(3) of the Act.[3]

The collective-bargaining agreement provided that it would continue in effect until February 1, 1977, and from year to year thereafter, unless either party gave at least 60 days' notice to the other prior to any February 1 of its desire to modify, amend, or terminate the bargaining agreement. If such notice was given, and if no agreement was reached, then the bargaining agreement would terminate on the following February 1. Either party had the right to request changes in wage rates, and that if agreement was not reached within 60 days after receipt of written notice of such a request, the bargaining agreement would terminate "effective that date."

On May 27, 1983, Respondent sent a letter to the Union, which letter was received by the Union on May 30, giving 60 days' notice of its desire to renegotiate the existing wage and overtime rates. No notice was given to either the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service or the State Mediation and Conciliation Service. On July 18, 1983, Respondent and the Union met to discuss Respondent's proposed changes to the bargaining agreement. Respondent's proposal read as follows:

> When the company performs work at a location covered by a contract with the Union, the job classifications and working conditions of company employees shall be identical with those of the customers' company. Wage rates will be as listed in Schedule A unless the customer company's contract requires payment of wages identical to customer's contract covering the work location.

No schedule A was attached to the proposal and no progress towards agreement on wage rates took place at this meeting. A second meeting was scheduled for July 26, 1983, but that meeting never took place. The second bargaining session did not occur until September 7, 1983.

In a letter dated August 18, 1983, Respondent, by its attorney, William C. Bottger Jr., notified the Union that the bargaining agreement had expired. Respondent had in fact treated the bargaining agreement as having expired on July 30, 1983. Thus, prior to July 30, Respondent accepted and processed grievances from employees in the bargaining unit. Grievances filed prior to July 30 continued to be processed normally. Respondent took the position that grievances filed after July 30 were not subject to the grievance procedure because the contract had expired. However, Respondent was willing to, and did, discuss such grievances with the Union's grievance committee.

On August 15, 1983, Respondent made its last payments to the health and welfare, vacation/holiday, and pension trust funds provided for in the bargaining agreement. These payments were for the period ending July 30. Thereafter, Respondent made no further payments to the trust funds.

At the September 7 meeting,[4] Respondent again stated its position that the bargaining agreement had expired because 60 days had passed since its wage reopener of May 27 and the parties had failed to reach a new agreement. Respondent advised the Union that the union-security, grievance and arbitration provisions, and trust fund provisions were no longer in effect. The Union denied

[1] On April 12, 1985, counsel for the General Counsel filed a motion to correct the transcript. As the motion is unopposed, the motion is granted and the corrections contained therein are incorporated in the record, sua sponte, as ALJ Exh. 1.

[2] I find the unit described in art. I and schedule "A" of the collective-bargaining agreement to be a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act.

[3] The General Counsel and the Union chose the January 12, 1984 date because Respondent did not give notice to the State Mediation and Conciliation Service until December 12, 1983.

[4] Sometime prior to its September 7, 1983 negotiation session with Respondent, the Union determined that Respondent had not sent a copy of the May 27 letter to the mediation and conciliation services. However, the Union did not notify Respondent of this defect.

that the bargaining agreement had expired. During the meeting Respondent contended that it could not compete with its nonunion competitors who were paying lower wages. Respondent stated that these competitors were underbidding Respondent and thereby causing Respondent a loss of work opportunities.[5] The parties agreed to meet again on September 13.

On September 13, Respondent gave the Union its proposed schedule A, setting forth proposed wage rates. This schedule did not include all job classifications. Further, Respondent stated that it was willing to sign a memorandum of agreement covering the wage rates of employees in the Bakersfield, California area. The Union made no counteroffer on wages. On September 16, the Union filed the first of the instant charges against Respondent alleging that Respondent had "unilaterally amended, modified and/or terminated portions of the current Collective Bargaining Agreement" in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

The parties met again on September 20. The Union requested the following information concerning Respondent's competitors: the competitors' rates of pay; their benefit structures; the amount of their bids; and their cost factors. The Union stated it needed the information in order to determine what concessions it would have to make to help Respondent become more competitive. Respondent asked the Union to make a counterproposal regarding wages, but the Union contended that it first needed the information regarding Respondent's competitors.

The parties met again on October 12. Respondent again sought a counterproposal from the Union and the Union again stated that it did not have sufficient information to make a counterproposal. The Union said it was attempting to get the information about the competitors on its own but "that was a lengthy process." The parties again met on October 21 at which meeting Respondent made its second written proposal. Thereafter, the parties met on October 31. At this meeting Respondent provided the Union with a proposed schedule A, which included all job classifications. The parties met again on November 4 and 22. At the November 22 meeting, Respondent amended its wage proposal. Under this proposal, all employees employed prior to 1974 would have no wage reduction. The Union then requested a list of the employees Respondent regarded as having seniority as of 1974. Respondent never provided that list.

On November 30, Respondent delivered a copy of the May 27 wage reopener to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service[6] and on December 12, sent a copy to the State Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Bottger, Respondent's counsel, sent the Union a letter dated January 9, 1984, summarizing the events of the preceding 7 months. Respondent took the position that the parties were at an impasse and that Respondent intended to implement, on January 16, its proposals of October 21 and 31, 1983. In response, the Union sent a letter dated January 13, denying the existence of an impasse and indicating its opposition to the planned implementation of Respondent's last proposal. Respondent did not implement its last offer on January 16, but rather waited until May 14, 1984. On May 14, Respondent implemented a new wage scale, which resulted in wage increases for some employees, decreases for others, and no changes for a few.

On April 4, prior to the implementation of the new wage rates, the parties met at Respondent's offices.[7] The parties first discussed the outstanding complaint in Case 31-CA-13517. After a caucus, Respondent's counsel informed the Union's representatives that he had spoken with William A. Thompson, Respondent's general manager, and that Respondent was not prepared to go forward with collective-bargaining negotiations because the Company was contemplating going out of business. Respondent's counsel requested from the Union a statement of Respondent's withdrawal liability under the pension trust fund, should Respondent go out of business. Respondent's counsel also stated that Respondent would resume payments to the trust funds "retroactive to April 1, 1984 with no strings attached."[8] The Union's counsel stated that Respondent could obtain the withdrawal liability directly from the pension trust in Denver, Colorado. The meeting ended with the parties agreeing to discuss these matters again.

On May 14, Respondent put into effect new wage rates. These wage rates reflected a wage structure negotiated by Respondent and one of its customers in May. Contrary to Respondent's position, the wage rate was not the same as that previously offered to the Union.[9] Respondent admits it gave no written notice of the wage changes other than the letter of January 9. Neither did Respondent give the Union any oral notice of this change. Thompson first informed a union agent of the change shortly after the wage rates had been implemented.

Respondent's wage schedule implemented on May 14 resulted in the job classifications of some employees being changed. Over half of the employees received wage increases and slightly less than half of the employees received wage decreases. A few employees had their wages rates unchanged.

In July and August 1984, Respondent agreed to a union request for an audit of its books concerning the new wage rates and Respondent's liability to the trust funds. Audits by both the Union and the trust funds were carried out in August 1984. On August 14, Respondent provided the Union with information concerning its wage rates.

[5] There is no dispute that the number of employees employed by Respondent has steadily declined since 1983.

[6] The complaint in Case 31-CA-13517 also issued on November 30.

[7] The findings regarding the April 4 meeting are based on the credited testimony of Gregory Mooney, the Union's attorney, which was corroborated by Tom Lind, an International representative for the Union. To the extent that the testimony of Ed Hoy, a labor consultant for Respondent, is inconsistent that testimony is not credited.

[8] Payments to the trust funds were in fact not resumed.

[9] The last wage proposal offered to the Union listed 26 job classifications with a high wage rate of $13.50 per hour and a low of $5 per hour. The wage rates placed in effect in May 1984 listed 14 classifications with a high of $14.50 per hour and a low of $7.53 per hour. Of the 12 classifications common to both lists, 10 received wage rates higher than that in the last offer to the Union and 2 classifications received the same wage rates offered to the Union.

On August 29, Wallace Knox, an attorney for the Union, wrote Bottger, Respondent's attorney, stating that the information provided did not make clear to the Union what changes in wages had taken place. Knox asked for the date of the change as well as a description of each change in wage classifications with an explanation of which classifications had the responsibilities of the new classifications. On September 18, Knox wrote Bottger, stating that he had not received a response to his August 29 request. Knox requested the names; hire dates; job classifications; job locations; and wages of all employees hired, fired, laid off, reinstated, or otherwise terminated or newly employed since January 1, 1984, in addition to the previously requested information. On October 15, Bottger wrote Knox stating that he had forwarded Knox's request to Thompson, Respondent's general manager. Respondent has made no further response.

On November 1, Respondent filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Respondent is now operating its business as a debtor-in-possession. During the course of the bankruptcy proceeding, the Bankruptcy Court ordered Respondent to produce information to the Union regarding its employees and their hours, but not wages. Respondent complied with the order. In November, Ken Lord, an agent of the Union, requested a list of Respondent's current employees and received a list of Respondent's employees for the week ending November 18, 1984.

III. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. Failure to Notify the Federal and State Mediation and Conciliation Services

The General Counsel and the Union argue that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act by terminating the bargaining agreement without giving the proper notice required by Section 8(d). Respondent contends that the bargaining agreement was effectively terminated when the parties failed to reach a new agreement within 60 days after the Union received Respondent's letter of May 27 requesting changes in the wage scale.

Section 8(d) of the Act provided in pertinent part as follows:

> Provided, That where there is in effect a collective-bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce, the duty to bargain collectively shall also mean that no party to such contract shall terminate or modify such contract, unless the party desiring such termination or modification—
> (1) serves a written notice upon the other party to the contract of the proposed termination or modification sixty days prior to the expiration date thereof, or in the event such contract contains no expiration date, sixty days prior to the time it is proposed to make such termination or modification;
> (2) offers to meet and confer with the other party for the purpose of negotiating a new contract or a contract containing the proposed modifications;
> (3) notifies the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service within thirty days after such notice of the existence of a dispute, and simultaneously therewith notifies any State or Territorial agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State or Territory where the dispute occurred, provided no agreement has been reached by that time; and
> (4) continues in full force and effect, without resorting to strike or lockout, all the terms and conditions of the existing contract for a period of sixty days after such notice is given or until the expiration date of such contract, whichever occurs later.

An employer violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act if it terminates or modifies an existing collective-bargaining agreement without having served the requisite 8(d)(3) notice on the proper state agency. Mar-Len Cabinets, 243 NLRB 523, 524 (1974), enfd. in part 659 F.2d 995, 998 (9th Cir. 1981). See also Ft. Smith Chair Co., 143 NLRB 514 (1963), enfd. 336 F.2d 738 (D.C. Cir. 1964).

In United Artists Communications, 274 NLRB 75 (1985), the Board recently emphasized that the initiating party must allow mediation efforts to take place for 30 days. When a notice of dispute is untimely filed, the 60-day period of Section 8(d) is tolled so that mediation efforts may take place for the 30-day period envisioned by Section 8(d)(3).

The notice requirements of Section 8(d) also apply to midterm modifications of existing agreements. Keystone Steel & Wire, 237 NLRB 763, 765–767 (1978); Wisconsin Southern Gas Co., 173 NLRB 480 (1968).

Applying the governing case law to the facts of this case, I find that the contract could have expired, according to its terms, when the parties had not reached agreement, 60 days after the Respondent's reopening letter. However, Respondent was required to continue in full force and effect all terms and conditions of the bargaining agreement until 30 days after notice to the State and Federal Mediation and Conciliation Services. It is well established that in appropriate circumstances the notice provisions of Section 8(d) apply even when no strike or lockout is involved. Mar-Len Cabinets, supra; United Artists Communications, supra. Respondent would not have been justified in making the unilateral changes by reason of an asserted impasse in collective-bargaining negotiations. Even if a genuine bargaining impasse had existed, this, on the facts of this case, does not eliminate the necessity of complying with the notice provisions of Section 8(d)(3) of the Act. Mar-Len Cabinets, supra; see NLRB v. Huttig Sash & Door Co., 377 F.2d 964, 968 (8th Cir. 1967).

Thus, Respondent's unilateral discontinuance of the contractual dues checkoff and union-security requirements constituted violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Campo Slacks, Inc., 250 NLRB 420 (1980), enfd. 659 F.2d 1067 (3d Cir. 1981). Respondent's discontinuance of the payments into the trust funds provided by the contract violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1). Wayne's Dairy, 223 NLRB 260, 265 (1976); Hudson Chemical Co., 258 NLRB 152, 157 (1981). Respondent's refusal to abide by the grievance and arbitration clause similarly violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1). See American Sink Top & Cabinet

Co., 242 NLRB 408 (1979); Digmor Equipment & Engineering Co., 261 NLRB 1175 (1982).

B. The Wage Increase of May

It is well established that an employer violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally changing a condition of employment that is under negotiation irrespective of whether the action is taken in good faith. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962); J. Hofert Co., 269 NLRB 520 (1984); Western Publishing Co., 269 NLRB 355 (1984). The primary exception to this rule is that when negotiations reach an impasse, the employer is free to implement changes in employment terms unilaterally, as long as the changes have previously been offered to the union as a bargaining proposal. Carlsen Porsche Audi, 266 NLRB 141 (1983); Ace Galvanizing, Inc., 217 NLRB 144 (1975); Times Herald Printing Co., 221 NLRB 225 (1975).

In the instant case, Respondent could not change the agreement until 30 days after proper notice to the Federal and State Mediation Services, i.e., January 12, 1984. However, before Respondent could lawfully implement any changes there had to have been an impasse. The next question is whether an impasse existed when Respondent implemented its wage changes of May 14, 1984.

In the lead case of Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), enfd. 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. Cir. 1968), the Board utilized the following guidelines for determining the existence of an impasse:

> Whether a bargaining impasse exists is a matter of judgment. The bargaining history, the good faith of the parties in negotiations, the length of the negotiations, the importance of the issue or issues as to which there is disagreement, the contemporaneous understanding of the parties as to the state of negotiations are all relevant factors to be considered in deciding whether an impasse in bargaining existed.

In E. I. duPont & Co., 268 NLRB 1075, 1076 (1984), the Board reaffirmed its adherence to the Taft Broadcasting guidelines and added the following comment:

> Finally, there need be no undue reluctance to find that an impasse existed. Its occurrence "cannot be said to be an unexpected, unforeseen, or unusual act in the process of negotiations since no experienced negotiator arrives at the bargaining table with absolute confidence that all of his proposals will be readily and completely accepted." Hi-Way Billboards, 206 NLRB 22, 23 (1973).

In applying the impasse guidelines to the facts of this case, one cannot overlook the realities of the situation. As it was attempting to implement a wage reduction, it was to Respondent's advantage to arrive at impasse as soon as possible. On the other hand, the Union was in a position where an impasse would result in implementation of a wage reduction. Thus, it was to the Union's advantage to avoid reaching impasse. Moreover, in May 1984, looming over the negotiations were the unremedied unilateral discontinuance of payments to the trust funds and the pending question of whether Respondent would go out of business.

Respondent argues that an impasse existed in May 1984 because negotiations were deadlocked and there were no further efforts to break the deadlock. The General Counsel and the Union argue that no impasse could be reached in May due to the unremedied unfair labor practices.

The bargaining history lends support to a finding of impasse. However, the other factors, particularly Respondent's unremedied unfair labor practices, preclude a finding of impasse.

In Wayne's Dairy, 223 NLRB 260, 265 (1976), the Board found that an employer could not parlay an impasse resulting from its own misconduct into a license to make unilateral changes. An impasse attributable to the employer's unlawful failure to restore the status quo ante regarding the unilateral discontinuance of health and welfare trust payments was held not to be a good-faith impasse.

In Little Rock Downtowner, 168 NLRB 107, 108 (1967), enfd. 414 F.2d 1084 (8th Cir. 1969), the Board stated:

> It is well settled that where further negotiations appear to be futile, a union is justified in not seeking to continue them. Respondent's unilateral changes of working conditions without consultation with the bargaining agent are violations which strike at the heart of the Union's ability to effectively represent the unit employees. There is no clearer or more effective way to erode the ability of the Union to bargain for the employees than for Respondent to make such changes without consultation with the Union. Respondent, after having committed violations which reasonably resulted in the Union's decision to regard further attempts to bargain as futile, may not seize upon its own wrongs to charge an abandonment by the Union of the unit employees or to infer a loss of employee support.

See also M. A. Harrison Mfg. Co., 253 NLRB 675, 684 (1980); and Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89, 90 fn. 5 (1980), enf. denied in pertinent part 665 F.2d 970 (9th Cir. 1982).

Further supporting the conclusion that Respondent cannot claim an impasse in May 1984 to privilege its wage changes is the fact that Respondent broke off negotiations and refused to bargain in April based on the possibility that it might go out of business. A deadlock caused by a party who refuses to bargain in good faith is not a legally cognizable impasse justifying unilateral conduct. Bethlehem Steel Co., 147 NLRB 977, 978 (1964); Northland Camps, 179 NLRB 36 (1969). See also NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 572 F.2d 1343, 1349 (9th Cir. 1978).

More important, even if the parties were at impasse, Respondent could only implement a wage change reasonably comprehended within the proposal Respondent had offered to the Union during the bargaining. See, e.g., Ace Galvanizing, 217 NLRB 144 (1975); Times Herald Printing Co., 221 NLRB 225, 229 (1975); Wayne's Dairy, Inc., supra. The last wage offer to the Union froze wages for employees hired prior to 1974 and reduced wages for all other employees. The offer implemented made no distinction for pre-1974 employees and granted wage increases to a majority of the employees. Of the 12 job classifications common to the last offer and the implemented offer, 10 classifications received wage rates higher than that offered to the Union. Whether Respondent's changed offer would have broken the impasse and/or changed the Union's bargaining position is a matter of doubt. However, it is Respondent's conduct that causes such doubt. Accordingly, as the changes in wage rates were not reasonably comprehended within the proposals Respondent had offered to the Union during the bargaining, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) even if an impasse existed. Robbins Door & Sash Co., 260 NLRB 659 (1982). Cf. Carlsen Porsche Audi, supra (where the change implemented was well within the "flexible parameters" discussed with the union).

C. The Refusal to Furnish Information

The General Counsel and the Union argue that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to provide the wage rate and job classification information requested by the Union and that the information revealed to the Union did not clarify the job duties pertaining to particular job classifications. Respondent takes the position that it provided the Union with the information requested to the extent possible.

Following the unlawful unilateral change of wage rates in May, the Union, in August, requested from Respondent information concerning the wage rates paid in each classification at each job location. After a response from Respondent, the Union sought clarification because the job classifications listed by Respondent did not correspond with the job classifications utilized prior to the unilateral change. On August 29, the Union requested the names, hire dates, job classifications, job locations, and wages of all employees hired, fired, laid off, reinstated or otherwise terminated, or newly employed since January 1, 1984. Respondent did not offer this information to the Union. Auditors were permitted to inspect Respondent's books in August. However, the information given the auditors would not show the job functions of the employees. Without such information the Union still could not determine the effect of the changes in wages and classifications implemented in May.

It is well settled that an employer has a statutory obligation to provide a union, on request, with relevant information the union needs for the proper performance of its duties as a collective-bargaining representative. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–436 (1967); Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). In determining whether an employer is obligated to supply particular information, the question is only whether there is a "probability that the desired information [is] relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., supra at 437. As the Supreme Court has stated, the disclosure obligation is measured by a liberal "discovery-type standard," not a trial-type standard, of relevance. Ibid.

Where the requested information deals with information pertaining to employees in the unit, which goes to the core of the employer-employee relationship, the information is "presumptively relevant." Emeryville Research Center, 441 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1971). Where the information is presumptively relevant, the employer has the burden of proving the lack of relevance. Prudential Insurance Co., 412 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1969). Where the requested information concerns wage rates, job descriptions and other information pertaining to employees within the bargaining unit, the information is presumptively relevant. Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916, 918 (1984); Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 421, 425 (1970). In the instant case, the Union, after unilateral changes in wages and classifications, sought information from which to ascertain the effect of such changes on the unit employees it represents. The changes in classifications, without information regarding job duties, resulted in the Union's inability to determine with any degree of certainty which job classifications received increases and which received decreases. During the Union's audit, certain of the requested information was revealed. However, the information clarifying job duties and job classifications was never provided or revealed during the audits. Accordingly, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by not furnishing the information requested by the Union.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Respondent shall be ordered to reinstate the wages, hours, and working conditions in effect at the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement, and to maintain such wages, hours, and working conditions in effect until modified by agreement with the Union or reaching a valid impasse in negotiations.[10]

[10] I find NLRB v. Cauthorne, 691 F.2d 1023 (D.C. Cir. 1982), cited by Respondent, does not circumscribe the remedy. In NLRB v. Cauthorne, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit rejected any presumption that an employer's unilateral change in wages or benefits precludes the possibility of meaningful negotiations and prevents the parties from reaching a good-faith impasse. The Court held that in designing a remedy for an unlawful unilateral change, a crucial variable is the duration of the refusal to bargain. If the refusal persists until the time of the Board's order continuous make-whole relief may be appropriate. But if bargaining was resumed and carried forward at some point between the initial refusal and the time of the Board's order, make-whole relief must be circumscribed—at least in cases where the unilateral change did not violate the terms of a valid collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, the Court held that where an employer and a union have bargained in good faith despite the employer's prior unilateral changes in wages or conditions of employment, the employer's ongoing liability for the unlawful unilateral changes terminates on the date when the parties execute a new agreement or reach a lawful impasse. In the instant case, Respondent did not cure its wrongdoing but rather engaged in further unlawful unilateral changes in the absence of a good-faith impasse. Even assuming that impasse was reached following the first unilateral changes, the wage rates implemented in May, which were not fairly comprehended by the offer to the Union, constituted a further unlawful unilateral change. Thus, Respondent's unfair labor practices appear to be continuous and a continuous make-whole remedy would be appropriate under NLRB v. Cauthorne.

Respondent shall be ordered to make whole its employees for any losses that may have resulted from Respondent's discontinuance of payments to the trust funds by proper payments to the trust funds, with interest to be computed in accordance with Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

Respondents shall also be ordered to make whole its employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the unilateral wage decreases. See, for example, NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 400 (1952). Backpay is to be computed in a manner consistent with Ogle Protection Services, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest thereon as set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

In the case of the unilateral wage increases, on the other hand, it is the Board's established policy not to require the employer to revoke increased benefits even though they were given unlawfully. See Stayer's Johnsonville Meats, 174 NLRB 693 fn. 3 (1969). See also Carmichael Construction Co., 258 NLRB 226, 231 (1981), enfd. 728 F.2d 1137 (8th Cir. 1984).

Respondent will also be ordered to provide the Union, on demand, with the requested information concerning the job classifications.

As noted earlier, Respondent filed a petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on November 1, 1984. The extent to which Respondent will be able to comply with the remedial order is subject to the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Court. See Airport Bus Service, 273 NLRB 561 (1984).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Petroleum Maintenance Company, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union, AFL–CIO and its Locals 1–19 and 1–128, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By terminating its collective-bargaining agreement on July 30, 1983, and instituting unilateral changes in the grievance and arbitration procedure, union security and dues checkoff and payments to the employee benefit trust funds, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

4. By unilaterally changing wage rates in May 1984, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. By failing and refusing to furnish the Union with the requested information relevant to the Union's status as exclusive bargaining representative, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The bargaining unit described in the last collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union is an appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

7. The unfair labor practices described above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondent, Petroleum Maintenance Company, Lomita, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Terminating its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment without giving the proper notices required by Section 8(d) of the Act.

(b) Unilaterally changing bargaining unit employees' terms and conditions of employment prior to offering such terms to and bargaining to a good-faith impasse with the Union.

(c) Failing and refusing to furnish the Union with information that it requested, which is relevant and necessary to the Union's status as exclusive bargaining representative.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action that is necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees, and if agreement is reached, embody that agreement in a written, signed instrument.

(b) Restore, on request by the Union, the wages, hours and working conditions that were in effect in the bargaining unit at the expiration of the last bargaining agreement on July 30, 1983.

(c) Furnish the Union, on request, the requested information relevant to the Union's status as collective-bargaining representative.

(d) Make its employees whole for any losses they incurred as a result of Respondent's unilateral discontinuance of the employee benefit trust fund payments and as a result of the unilateral wage decreases, and pay the appropriate interest on such amounts of money, as more fully described in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its facility in Lomita, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On August 5, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and brief in support thereof and in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Geo. C. Christopher & Son, Inc., Wichita, Kansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] No exceptions were filed to the judge's failure to find that, assuming Sec. 8(d) did not preclude altering the terms and conditions of the contract, the Respondent's unilateral reduction of wages was still unlawful because the parties had not reached a legal impasse in their bargaining over wages.

[2] In addition to the rationale set forth in the judge's decision concerning the Respondent's failure to give 8(d)(3) notices and its resultant obligation to refrain from making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment established by the parties' contract, we rely on the Board's analysis of this obligation in Petroleum Maintenance Co., 290 NLRB 460 (1988).

[3] The General Counsel's exceptions urge modification of the recommended Order to include a provision for a visitatorial clause. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

Stanley D. Williams, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Milo M. Unruh and Stuart R. Collier, Esqs., of Wichita, Kansas, for the Respondent.
Robert L. Dameron, Esq. and Donald L. Spatz, of Kansas City, Kansas, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried at Witchita, Kansas, on 18–19 December 1986[1] and on 12–16 January and 25–27 February 1987. The charges were filed by the Union 23 April and 16 September, and a consolidated complaint was issued 16 October.

Faced with large financial losses the company in January reopened its 1985–1988 agreement with the Union, seeking a wage reduction. On failing to agree on the amount of the reduction the Company notified the Union on 4 April that it was terminating the agreement, even though it had failed to send the 30-day notices required by Section 8(d)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The primary issues are whether the Company, the Respondent, (a) told an employee that the Union no longer represented the employees and (b) unlawfully failed to continue in effect the terms and conditions of the agreement by reducing wages, making other changes, and laying off employees without honoring the contractual seniority provisions, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

On the entire record,[2] including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a corporation, fabricates structural steel and operates a steel service center in Wichita, Kansas, where it annually ships goods valued over $50,000 directly outside the State. The Company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Failure to Give 8(d)(3) Notices

1. Statutory requirement ignored

On 1 April 1985 the Company and the Union signed a collective-bargaining agreement effective from then until 1 April 1988 (G.C. Exh. 1E, Exh. 1, art. 29.1 at 33). The 1985–1988 agreement provided (art. 28 at 32) for the following wage reopener:

> 28.6 The Company agrees to meet with the Union during the month of January for the purpose of considering the wage rates to become effective April 1, 1986 . . . .
> 28.7 Upon failure on the part of the parties to reach an agreement under 28.6, either party may give notice of intent to terminate this Agreement effective April 1, 1986 . . . .

It is undisputed that there was never any mention of the statutory notice requirements in 1982 when a similar wage reopener was included in the prior agreement, in 1985 when the 1985–1988 agreement was negotiated, or in 1986 during the wage negotiations before 1 April (Tr. 1261–1268, 1295).

[1] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] By agreement of the parties an amended seniority list is received as G.C. Exh. 27.

On 3 January the Company sent the Union a reopener letter (G.C. Exh. 2). In the wage negotiations that followed the Company proposed a 20-percent wage reduction to be effective 1 April, and the Union proposed an 18- or 20-percent wage increase. By their third negotiating session on 31 March the Company and Union reduced their wage demands in a continuing effort to reach agreement. The Union proposed a 7-1/2-percent reduction (deferring a wage increase), and the company reduced its demand to a 14-percent reduction. (Tr. 112, 1258; G.C. Exh. 1E, Ledermann's affidavit at 14.)

Meanwhile the Company (Tr. 26) failed to give the 30-day notice of the dispute to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Kansas Department of Human Resources as required in Section 8(d)(3) of the Act. Weathercraft Co. of Topeka, 276 NLRB 452, 453 (1985).

In the 31 March meeting Union Representative Donald Spatz (the International's director of education) suggested that a Federal mediator be invited to assist in the negotiations, but to no avail. He credibly testified (as confirmed in his 9 April letter discussed below) as follows (Tr. 116):

> A. I think I had made a suggestion during the course of the meeting that a . . . federal mediator might be helpful to us in resolving the difference between us.
> Q. Okay. And did the company respond at all to your suggestion?
> . . . .
> A. Mr. [George] Christopher [the company president] indicated that (inaudible).

(I find it unnecessary to make a finding on the content of this and other "inaudible" testimony—or to correct other errors in the transcript typist's understanding or identifying persons speaking at the trial—resulting from the use of an electronic reporting system in these proceedings.)

Ignoring its failure to give the 8(d)(3) 30-day notices, the Company produced a letter at this 31 March meeting to terminate the agreement at 12:01 a.m. on 1 April if a wage agreement was not reached. It "volunteered," however, to extend the agreement 3 days to give the union membership an opportunity to vote on accepting its last proposal. (Tr. 114, 1260, 1462; Ledermann's affidavit at 14.) It then presented to the Union, and they signed, a previously prepared extension agreement entitled "Interim Agreement" (G.C. Exhs. 1E and 2). It stated that > Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary appearing in Article 28.6 . . . or in Article 28.7 of the [1985–1988] Agreement . . . the undersigned parties stipulate and agree that if an agreement [on] wage rates . . . is not reached by 11:59 p.m. on April 3, 1986, either of the undersigned shall have the right to terminate the . . . Agreement by notice in writing delivered to the other not later than 11:59 p.m. on April 4, 1986 . . . .

> If either of the undersigned terminates the . . . Agreement pursuant to the terms of this Stipulation and Agreement, the effective date of termination shall be 12:01 a.m., April 1, 1986.

On 4 April the Company again ignored its failure to give the 8(d)(3) 30-day notices and the requirement in Section 8(d)(4) that it continue "in full force and effect . . . all the terms and conditions of the existing contract for a period of sixty days after [the Section 8(d)(1) termination or modification] notice [followed by the 30-day notices] is given." After learning that the Union had rejected its last offer, the Company on 4 April sent the Union a notice (G.C. Exhs. 1E and 3) that the 1985–1988 agreement is "declared terminated as of 12:01 a.m. April 1, 1986."

On 9 April Representative Spartz sent the Company a letter (G.C. Exh. 11) responding to the termination notice, requesting continued negotiations, and stating that

> As I stated in our last negotiations, I believe assistance of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service may be helpful. May I have your position on this?

On 23 April the company counsel answered (G.C. Exh. 12) stating in part that

> With respect to the company's view on the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, our client believes that the mediation service may (and should) decline to participate in such mediation until the parties have had sufficient negotiations . . . to define any unresolved issues which may exist between them. [Emphasis added.]

2. Contentions and concluding findings

The Company contends in its brief (Br. 8–9) that "by executing the interim agreement dated March 31, 1986," the Union (1) is "estopped to claim that notice by the Company to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service must be given at least 30 days prior to termination," (2) "waived any right it had to claim the Company had not given 30 days prior notice," and (3) "acquiesced in and clearly recognized and acknowledged the company's right to terminate the contact."

The Company argues (Br. 16–17) that

> [T]he interim agreement provides the method of termination of contract. No contention has been made by the General Counsel or the union that the interim agreement is unlawful or that any term [in it] is prohibited by law. Additionally, this writer has researched and can find no statutory prohibition of waiver of the 8(d) notices. Curiously the General Counsel has totally ignored what would appear to be the crux of the whole matter. What were the parties' rights and obligations following execution of the interim agreement? [The Company] suggests . . . that the interim agreement must be enforced as agreed to by the Union; and that to imply into the agreement the 30-day notice provision of 8(d)(3) would totally obliterate what the parties agreed to > in clear and unequivocable language. General Counsel would have [the Company] do the impossible, i.e., give 30 days notice prior to the termination date called for by the interim agreement (April 3). The parties couldn't have possibly intended such an absurd result. . . . The interim agreement must be enforced as written.

The Company overlooks, or ignores, the often-cited ruling by the Supreme Court that the 8(d) "notice requirement operates wholly independently of whatever notice requirement the parties have fixed for themselves." NLRB v. Lion Oil Co., 352 U.S. 282, 292–293 (1957).

The Board cited this ruling in United Marine Division Local 333 (General Marine), 228 NLRB 1107, 1108 (1977), in which a contractual provision permitted the union to terminate the agreement without notice if the employer became delinquent in making payments to the pension and welfare fund. The Board held that the 8(d)(3) 30-day notices (as well as the 8(d)(1) 60-day termination notice) must be sent.

> The lack of contractual notice requirements for such "mid-term" termination cannot operate . . . as a license to the parties to ignore the statutory notice requirements . . . . In [the Lion Oil case] the Supreme Court found that the congressional intent was that parties not be able to avoid the notice requirements of Section 8(d) . . . . Thus, the Supreme Court stated, "One thing the most authoritative gloss of § 8(d), the report of the Senate Committee, makes clear is that the statutory notice requirement operates wholly independently of whatever notice requirement the parties have fixed for themselves."

As held in Weathercraft Co., supra, 276 NLRB at 453, "Failure of a party desiring to terminate or modify a collective-bargaining agreement to give appropriate notice under Section 8(d)(3) precludes it from altering terms or conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement." Whether the 31 March interim agreement is "in substance and form a Collective Bargaining Agreement" and "a binding contract" (as the Company contends in its Br. 9 and 20) or whether it is merely a 3-day extension of the 1985–1988 agreement, the Company was obligated to continue in effect the terms and conditions of the agreement until 30 days after the 8(d)(3) notices were sent. The obligation was a statutory requirement that existed both before and after the interim agreement was signed. The "statutory notice requirement operates wholly independently of whatever notice requirement the parties have fixed for themselves."

The Company, having failed to give the 8(d)(3) 30-day notice to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Kansas Department of Human Resources (Tr. 1316, 1461; G.C. Exh. 22), I find that it was required by Section 8(d)(4) to continue in effect "all the terms and conditions" of the collective-bargaining agreement until 30 days after it has given the statutory 30-day notices.

B. Coercive Statements

The complaint alleges that about 11 April Vice President George Ledermann and Employee Service Manager Stan Koehler told an employee that the Union no longer represented the employees in the bargaining unit.

Employee Michael Donohue testified that on 11 April, when he and others were called to the office (to be laid off), he asked Koehler for a union representative at the meeting. He recalled (Tr. 152–153) that Koehler said "that I was not entitled at this time to union representation because as far as the company was concerned we no longer had a contract with the union and the union was not our bargaining party." He also recalled (Tr. 153–154) that Ledermann later told him that "the contract being no longer in effect I was not entitled to union representation, that the union was not my bargaining committee anymore." Similarly employee Patrick Bauer (who overheard Donohue's conversation with Koehler) recalled (Tr. 164) that Koehler said, "We no longer recognize the union because we're working without a contract anyway."

Although Donohue and Bauer impressed me as being honest witnesses, I find that they either misunderstood or did not recall correctly why Koehler and Ledermann told Donohue that he was not entitled to union representation at the meeting. Both Koehler and Ledermann recalled telling Donohue that this was not the kind of meeting that required union representation, and Ledermann recalled: "I mentioned to him that the contract was no longer in effect" because "I gleaned from him that he felt that the contract provided for him to have a representative whenever he had to come to Personnel." (Tr. 1342, 1354–1455.)

I credit the denials (Tr. 1371, 1455) and find that this allegation must be dismissed.

C. Reduced Wages and Other Changes

Since 4 April the Company has taken the position that it lawfully terminated the 1985–1988 agreement effective 1 April and that none of the contractual provisions have been in effect since then. On 11 April the Company implemented the proposed 14-percent wage reduction contained in its 31 March offer. By letter dated 11 April (G.C. Exh. 5) it notified the employees that the reduction would be effective 14 April.

In addition, without any notice to the Union, the Company in April made other changes on which there had been no bargaining. (1) It failed (Tr. 1444–1445) to abide by the grievance-and-arbitration procedure in the 1985–1988 agreement. (2) It promoted (G.C. Exhs. 10 and 18) fabrication leadmen Stephen Hogg, James Miser, and Mark Throckmorton; maintenance leadman Robert Wellner; material leadman Benny Jackson; parts leadman Francis Newman; and the service center leadman Donald Conrad to the supervisory position of crew chief. The Company admits (Tr. 90) that these seven persons continued to perform the same work even though article 28.1(g) of the agreement (at 31) prohibited crew chiefs from performing bargaining unit work "while employees are laid off in that classification." (3) The Company refused to honor the dues-checkoff provisions in the agreement. (4) The Company discontinued making the pension benefit contribution of 24 cents an hour required in the agreement (art. 6), although it has placed the contributions in an escrow or accrued account (Tr. 95, 97) pending the outcome of this proceeding. (5) It failed to follow the contractual layoff requirements, as discussed below.

The Company admits in its brief (Br. 10) that it reduced the wages, instituted a new grievance procedure, promoted leadmen to crew chiefs, ceased collecting union dues, and ceased making contributions to the future service pension plan. It contends, however, that "upon the termination of the April 1, 1985 agreement the Company had fulfilled its duty to bargain with the Union and lawfully instituted terms and conditions of employment."

As found, the Company was required by Section 8(d)(4) to continue in effect "all the terms and conditions" of the 1985–1988 agreement until 30 days after it has given the 8(d)(3) 30-day notices, which were not given. I therefore find that the wage reduction and the other five changes in the terms and conditions of the agreement were made unlawfully and that the Company refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5). Its economic difficulties are no defense.

I also find that even if the Company were not required by Section 8(d)(4) to continue "in full force and effect . . . all the terms and conditions" of the 1985–1988 agreement, it unlawfully refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) by making most of the changes. Excluding the reduction in wage rates (the "only" purpose of the 1986 wage reopener), the Company made the changes without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain. It therefore made unlawful changes in conditions of employment when it unilaterally instituted a new grievance procedure, allowed promoted supervisors to perform bargaining unit work, discontinued making the pension benefit contributions, and ignored the seniority rules when laying off employees. (The checking off of dues, on the other hand, was not a condition of employment. Bethlehem Steel Co., 136 NLRB 1500, 1501 (1962).) As ruled in NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 747 (1962), "Unilateral action by an employer without prior discussion with the union does amount to a refusal to negotiate about the affected conditions of employment . . . and must of necessity obstruct bargaining, contrary to the congressional policy."

D. Failing to Follow Contractual Layoff Requirements

1. Seniority provisions ignored

In April the Company laid off a total of 46 of its 128 bargaining unit employees: 24 on 14 April, 1 on 15 April, 1 on 18 April, and 20 on 25 April (G.C. Exh. 27). The General Counsel contends that the Company wrongfully laid off 26 of these 46 employees because, as senior qualified employees, they should have been retained under article 14.1 of the agreement (G.C. Exhs. 1E and 1 at 12).

The layoff provision, article 14.1, required that

> Any layoff shall be on the basis of seniority on a plantwide basis, provided the senior employees retained for work are qualified to perform the work. No employee will be placed on layoff when there is work available in the same or a lower pay level which the employee is as qualified to perform and which an employee with less seniority is performing. . . . [Emphasis added.]

Thus the layoff provision requires that employees must be retained on the basis of plant seniority if they are "qualified" to perform the available work, and that they must not be laid off if they are "as qualified" as junior employees performing available work in the same or lower pay level.

The Company admits, however, that when it started making a list on 5 April of employees to be laid off, it did not consider itself bound by any contractual constraints in selecting the employees (Tr. 1470). It took this position when the Union first presented grievances on 15 April. Employees complained in the grievances that they should not have been laid off because they were qualified to perform work in their classifications and "also qualified to perform work in other classifications with less senior employees" (G.C. Exh. 13).

On the morning of 15 April when Union Representative Spatz handed Vice President Ledermann the grievances and sought explanations for the layoff of these senior employees, Ledermann stated "it was the company's prerogative who to lay off" and that seniority "had no application" because the contract had been terminated (Tr. 127, 1463). (Ledermann refused to accept the grievances, except as complaints (Tr. 125), and later refused (Tr. 232) to arbitrate the layoff grievances.) When Employee Services Manager Koehler joined the discussion that afternoon, he informed Spatz that "the decision who to retain was based on which person was most capable" (Tr. 129).

Again on 6 June Vice President Ledermann confirmed the Company's belief tht it was not required to honor the employees' seniority. He stated in a letter to Spatz (G.C. Exh. 16) that

> A review of those grievance forms indicates rather clearly that they suggest the Company did not follow Article 14.1 of [the 1985–1988 agreement]. As you know, Don, the Company's view and position is that Agreement was terminated in total effective April 1, 1986. It follows, naturally, that the Company's view is that all provisions of that Agreement including Article 14.1 were of no force and effect after April 1, 1986.

2. Opposing contentions

The Company asserts in its brief (Br. 27) "that although it did not consider itself bound by the agreement because [the agreement] was terminated, the results obtained from the layoffs were consistent with" article 14.1. Thus it contends that it complied with the contractual requirement that employees must be retained on the basis of their plant seniority if they are "qualified" to perform the available work, or if they are "as qualified" to perform the available work of junior employees in other classifications.

The word "qualified" is not defined in the 1985–1988 agreement. The General Counsel contends that it means "sufficient ability to perform the job" and that "the senior qualified employee will be entitled to preference even though the junior employee possesses greater skill and ability."

The Company contends that qualification should be interpreted to mean "versatility, flexibility, efficiency, proficiency, and skill" and that the laid-off employees were not "qualified to perform the work then available."

President Christopher gave the following explanation why higher employee qualifications are necessary for the Company to reverse its heavy losses in recent years and to become more competitive (Tr. 1280–1281):

> My marketing committee and I developed a plan in the first three months of 1986 that was directed toward heavy bridges . . . complex welding projects . . . the types of projectrs that other people didn't want . . . because they were complicated, high man hour, quality production type projects. We realized that we could not be competitive on shopping centers, simple beam and column jobs.
> As long as we couldn't do the bread and butter type fabrication anymore, because we weren't competitive, those people who worked for us who were only capable of doing the bread and butter type work were just not going to be able to carry their share of the load.

Christopher further explained the Company's evaluation system, which is devised to pay employees up to 10 percent more than the negotiated base wage rates for superior performance and to encourage the employees to advance to higher levels by enhancing their capabilities. He expressed his feeling that "if all our welders were number 1 welders, we would probably be able to weld better than anybody else that we were dealing against, and that was what was going to be the advantage for the company, by having people in higher paid category." (Tr. 1287.) Under this evaluation system the employees are presently being paid between 7 and 8 percent above the base wage rates (Tr. 1291). The employees' average rating is therefore between 107 and 108, entitling them to be paid 107 and 108 percent of the base rates.

I agree with the General Counsel that the contractual requirement that senior employees be retained if "qualified to perform the work" does not require the senior employee to be the best qualified. That is not what the parties to the agreement negotiated. I agree with the Company, however, that the senior employee must be "qualified to perform the work then available." I also find that for a senior employee to be entitled to bump into another classification, he must be "as qualified" as the junior employee to perform the available work there.

Fortunately it is not necessary to rely solely on the conflicting testimony to determine the qualifications of the 25 senior employees who the General Counsel contends were improperly laid off. I find that the evaluation system, on which the premium wages are based, contains persuasive evidence of the Company's own appraisal of the employees' qualifications.

I find that only 7 of the 26 senior employees were improperly laid off.

3. Rulings on alleged improper layoffs

Welder-Fitters

The following list contains names of laid-off welder-fitters (classes 1 and 2) and junior welder-fitters who were retained. It also shows the dates of layoff, the latest evaluations (if in evidence), and the seniority dates.

WF-1	Melvin Riley	Apr. 14	103	9/9/74
WF-1	Alfred Cox	Apr. 14	101	2/14/77
WF-1	Michael Maddox	Apr. 25		8/18/80
WF-1	Jonathan Meyer		109	8/18/80
WF-1	Delmar Brown		108	1/12/81
WF-1	James Kahre		109	2/9/81
WF-1	Michael McConnell	Apr. 25	104	5/11/81
WF-1	Robert Brown Jr.	Apr. 14	106	9/8/81
WF-1	Phillip Newman	Apr. 14		11/22/82
WF-1	Daniel Schumacker		106	5/13/85
WF-1	Christopher Lacour		103	6/17/85
WF-1	Tom Thomas		106	8/19/85
WF-2	Michael Donohue	Apr. 14	98	10/27/81
WF-2	Cliff Gardner	Apr. 25	107	9/7/83
WF-2	Theodore Phillips			11/14/83
WF-2	Patrick Bauer	Apr. 14	102	7/15/85
WF-2	Edward Randall		107	9/23/85
WF-2	Maurice Gray		105	1/2/86

Melvin Riley. He had a low evaluation of 103 (G.C. Exh. 26V). On a scale of minus 5 to plus 10, he was rated zero on quality and 2 on quantity and job knowledge. Supervisor Eddie Winkle (who appeared to be an honest witness) credibly testified (Tr. 592) that he "was very limited [in] what I could use him on . . . if you got him into more complicated things, he was out of his element and could not perform." I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that WF-1 Riley was qualified to perform the available work.

Alfred Cox. He had a lower evaluation of 101. He was rated 6 for job knowledge, but only 3 on quality and minus 2 on quantity. (G.C. Exh. 26J.) Supervisor Winkle credibly testified that Cox was weak in interpreting blueprints, and "Al was very limited in what areas we could use him. He had arthritis in his hands," causing him problems in holding a welding stinger. He had trouble climbing on truses, and he could not work in the colder buildings in severe weather (Tr. 518–520, 595–596.) I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that WF-1 Cox was qualified to perform the available work.

Michael Maddox. On 24 April he made a written request (R. Exh. 13) for a "volunteer layoff to help work load and conditions" at the Company. Complying with his request, the Company laid him off along with others on 25 April (Tr. 269). There is no basis for finding WF-1 Maddox's layoff to be improper.

Michael McConnell. He had recently been promoted from WF-2 to WF-1. His first evaluation of 104 in that higher level (G.C. Exh. 26S) gave him a low rating of 2 on both quality and job knowledge. In the absence of other evidence I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that WF-1 McConnell was qualified to perform the available work.

Robert Brown Jr. He had a 106 evaluation and rating of 7 and 8 on quality and job knowledge (G.C. Exh. 25I). He was a highly versatile welder-fitter, doing many types of jobs including the fabrication of bridges in the South Shop (Tr. 1126, 1129). He did much full-penetration welding, having earned four welding certificates—two of them state certificates required for doing bridge work. These welding certificates were more than any other welder-fitter had earned with only 5 years of seniority. (Tr. 1117–1119.)

None of the supervisors testified about Brown's work except Supervisor Winkle, who had little familiarity with his accomplishments. Winkle was not familiar with Brown's welding certificates or his work on bridges in the South Shop. Winkle admitted: "I always had a lot of faith in his ability," but testified that he "did not perform as we expected" on certain truss work. (Tr. 529–531, 592.)

I find that the General Counsel has proved that WF-1 Brown was fully qualified to perform the available work.

Phillip Newman. One supervisor gave him a low 3 rating on quantity and quality. Another supervisor rated him 5 on both quantity and quality. In the absence of any testimony about his qualifications I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that WF-1 Newman was qualified to perform the available work.

Michael Donohue. He was demoted on 9 February from WF-1 to WF-2 (Tr. 1568). With an evaluation of 98, he was the only employee in the plant with an evaluation below 100 (Tr. 1430). On one of the evaluation sheets, which rated him minus 3 on quantity and job knowledge, the comments are: "I can't tell if he really knows his job or just doesn't care!" and I don't know how he ever got to be a fitter." (G.C. Exh. 25P.) The General Counsel has failed to show that WF-2 Donohue was qualified as a welder-fitter to perform available work or that he was as qualified as a junior employee working in another classification.

Cliff Gardner. In his evaluation of 107 he is given the high rating of 8 on both quantity and quality of work, and the very high rating of 9 on job knowledge, with the notation that this is "E" (exceptional), indicating tht he "Executes all jobs without question on procedure or technique. Advises others." (G.C. Exh. 25V.) The evaluation recommends that he "should be moved to Fitter Welder #1."

Supervisor Winkle did not participate in this 6-month evaluation in January because of unfamiliarity with Gardner's work. (Leadman Mark Throckmorton, who made the evaluation—on which Gardner's premium pay is based—was not called to testify about Gardner's accomplishments that warranted the high ratings.) Gardner was performing simple welder-fitter tasks during the shortage of work before his layoff. Although Winkle found certain faults with his performance (Tr. 520–522, 595), I find that the Company's own evaluation system demonstrates that WF-2 Gardner was qualified to perform available work in his classification.

Patrick Bauer. He had a low evaluation of 102 and was rated (on the scale of minus 5 to plus 10) 1 on quality and 2 on quantity and job knowledge. Supervisor Winkle noted on the evaluation that he was "learning but has a way to go." (G.C. Exh. 26B.) I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that WF-2 Bauer was qualified to perform the available work or that he was as qualified as a junior employee working in another classification.

Welders

This list contains names of laid-off welders (classes A1, 1, and 2) and junior welders who were retained. It also shows the dates of layoff, the latest evaluations (if in evidence), and the seniority dates.

W-A1	Max Sward	Apr. 25	106	1/19/59
W-A1	Luis Campos		108	3/20/62
W-A1	Baudelio Marquez		110	2/27/63
W-A1	Willie Douglas	Apr. 25	106	5/13/66
W-A1	Leo Hood		110	1/15/75
W-A1	Charles Crump		109	10/27/75
W-A1	Alfred Gallard		108	5/1/79

W-1	Jim Begaye	Apr. 25	107	10/15/74
W-1	Nathaniel Billingsley			2/7/79
W-1	Curtis Langford	Apr. 25	.....	1/30/80
W-1	Mark Bircher		107	1/7/80
W-1	Gene Williams	Apr. 14	105	5/5/80
W-1	Thanh Huynh		110	5/18/81
W-1	Thomas Bealby		110	11/24/82
W-1	Ora Hoogendoorn		109	1/11/83
W-1	Diego Amador			7/1/85
W-2	Arlie Hammar	Apr. 14	106	8/1/79
W-2	Leon Hines		108	9/3/85

Max Sward. Although he was classified as an A-1 welder, he was performing mostly nonwelding work on the squeeze machine in the bridge shop. He was no longer able to do full-pen (full-penetration) welds, but his W-A1 rate was red-circled because "he was a senior employee and a loyal employee." He was laid off when there was no longer full-time work on the squeeze machine. (Tr. 256, 266.) I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that W-A1 Sward was qualified to perform the available work.

Willie Douglas. His evaluation had dropped from 108 to 106 (G.C. Exhs. 25Q and 26K). Although he had passed the state certifications to perform bridge work as an A-1 welder, he had been transferred from the South Shop because of quality problems, which continued on simpler welding in the Center Shop (Tr. 552, 570, 883, 1572). I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that W-A1 Douglas was qualified as a welder to perform available work or that he was as qualified as a junior employee working in another classification.

Gary Burnett. He had a 105 evaluation, with a low 3 rating on both quality and job knowledge (G.C. Exh. 26G). Although he was classified as a class 1 welder, Supervisor Winkle credibly testified that he could not be used on full-pen welds (Tr. 594). The General Counsel has failed to prove that W-1 Burnett was qualified to perform the available work.

Jim Begaye. Although classified as a class 1 welder, he had been working primarily on the squeeze machine with W-A1 Sward since 1977, performing mostly nonwelding work and no full-pen welds (Tr. 1020, 1025, 1028). He was laid off with Sward when there was no longer full-time work on the squeeze machine. I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that W-1 Begaye was qualified to perform the available work.

Curtis Langford. The Company does not dispute that he was a fully qualified class 1 welder, performing such work as full-pen welds on state jobs (Tr. 1074, 1085). The only apparent reason for his layoff was a reprisal for his reinstatement with backpay, ordered by an arbitrator in 1985, following his discharge resulting from a personality clash with a supervisor (Tr. 1076, 1100, 1403–1404). I find that W-1 Langford was fully qualified to perform the available work.

Gene Williams. His work had deteriorated, with his evaluation going from 108 to 105 (G.C. Exhs. 25CCC and 26BB). As Supervisor Winkle credibly testified (Tr. 593); "I . . . have a file on Gene and his continuing ongoing problems with quality, both with full-pen welds and fillet welds. It was just an ongoing problem." I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that W-1 Williams was qualified to perform the available work.

Arlie Hammar. He had a 106 evaluation. Although he was classified as a welder, he was assigned to making and flattering parts in the parts department, doing welding only occasionally. He wore heavy glasses because of nearsightedness, and the Company apparently had removed him from welding work in the belief that his poor vision interfered with his welding. (Tr. 974–975, 1003–1011.) I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that W-2 Hammar was qualified to perform the available work.

Machine Operators

This list contains names of laid-off operators (classes I and 2) in Machine Group I and II, as well as junior operators who were retained. It also shows the dates of layoff, the latest evaluations (if in evidence), and the seniority dates.

M1-1	Bradley Lupto	Apr. 14		3/14/77
M1-1	Juan Romero	Apr. 14	108	1/23/78
M1-1	Eddie Blanchard	Apr. 25		10/23/78

M1-1	Barry Brown			7/30/79
M1-1	John Eisenhour			9/17/79
M1-1	Barney Tucker		108	1/28/80
M1-1	Richard Fagan		106	2/20/80
M1-1	Robert Garrett	Apr. 14	108	3/24/80
M1-1	Richard Murray			6/1/81
M1-1	Vernon Woodruff		110	8/8/83
M1-2	Terry Hendrickson			1/20/86
M2-1	Katheryne Bryant	Apr. 14	108	3/13/74
M2-1	Mike Rausch			11/22/83

Bradley Lupton. Since 1977 he worked at various lesser skilled machine and utility jobs the plant, until he was promoted to welder-fitter 2d class. There, in his words, "I kind of felt like I was a little bit above my head" (Tr. 806). He was returned to the Saw Department, where he was demoted to M1-1 (G.C. Exh. 25II). At the time of his layoff he was working as a helper in the Rebar plant. I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that M1-1 Lupton was qualified to perform the available work.

Juan Romero. He worked as an M1-1 machine operator in the Saw Department, where Supervisor Roger Cordoba estimated that it would take "five to ten minutes" of instruction to operate the bandsaw and "I would say 15 minutes to 20, to a half hour" to operate the cold saw (Tr. 666–667). Cordola admitted (Tr. 643–644) that an M1-1 operator "would be qualified or possess the necessary skills" to operate a bandsaw, a cold saw, and an Anglematic machine, and that an M1-2 operator should also be able to operate the Anglematic if "they have the necessary skills."

It is undisputed that Supervisor Cordoba promised to train Romero to operate all the machines in the Saw Department and that Romero was eager to learn, but Cordoba kept him busy operating the Do-All bandsaw and continually postponed the training. Romero did operate the cold saw 4 hours on Saturday, when shown by the leadman how to run it. During the last 30 days before Romero's layoff, Coroba apologized for not giving him the training on the Anglematic, drill line, and other machines in the Saw Department. Cordoba told him, "I need you" on the bandsaw because bars were being beveled on the Great Bend project and Romero was "the only one that knew how to set up for that." (Tr. 833–834.)

Supervisor Cordoba admitted that Romero was a "hard worker" (Tr. 666). He gave Romero a high rating of 8 on both quantity of work and job knowledge, a rating of 6 on quality, and a good overall evaluation of 108 (G.C. Exh. 26U). (I note that Vice President Ledermann testified (Tr. 1436–1437) that Romero's earlier 107 evaluation was "above average" for a band saw operator.) Cordoba admitted (Tr. 621) that he promised to put Romero through a training course on the computerized equipment, plus the cold saw, in the Saw Department.

Despite Romero's hard work and good evaluation, the Company laid him off on April 14 and retained less senior M1-1 machine operators. These included Richard Fagan, who had a lower 106 evaluation (G.C. Exh. 26M), who then was "running the band saw or helping move material," and who was later trained to operate the cold saw, Anglematic, and drill line (Tr. 637)—instead of Romero. I discredit Cordoba's claim that "I got a couple of weeks on the cold saw for [Romero] and he just wasn't up to par for that skill" (Tr. 621) and his claim "that's just my opinion" that Romero "didn't have quite enough talent to put him on equipment like the drill or the Anglematic" (Tr. 666).

There was ample work on the bandsaw and cold saw after the layoff to keep Romero busy. Cordoba grudgingly acknowledged (Tr. 658) that "I assume under close supervision, yes, [Romero] probably could do [cold saw work]." Cordoba admitted that after the layoff the cold saw was running about 90 percent of the time, one of the bandsaws was running about 50 percent of the time, and the other "possibly" 80 percent of the time. (Tr. 645–646.)

Both the General Counsel and the Union suggested at the trial (Tr. 1139) that the Company's knowledge of Romero's upcoming surgery (scheduled the next week, at the Company's expense) "may have been a factor in their decision to lay Mr. Romero off." The Company in its brief (Br. 32–33) acknowledges that Romero had surgery scheduled for 17 April, but contends that "Juan Romero was laid off because the type of work for which he was qualified to perform simply dwindled to nothing. He wasn't qualified to perform any other tasks in the company's opinion. The unrebutted evidence would indicate that Romero was not laid off to avoid Romero's medical expenses." (Senior Vice President James Liddell testified (Tr. 1524–1525) that he did not remember any discussion about Romero's going into the hospital before the decision was made to lay him off.)

After weighing all the evidence I find that whether the Company's decision for the layoff was motivated by the expense of M1–1 Romero's surgery, the General Counsel has proved that Romero was qualified to perform the available work and was improperly laid off in violation of his seniority rights under the contractual layoff provision.

Eddie Blanchard. On his January 106 evaluation Supervisor Robert Ketz rated him 6 on quantity, quality, and job knowledge as well as on dependability and commented: "Eddie is getting better on the shears, could improve on quantity also on dependability" (G.C. Exh. 25G). On his April evaluation Ketz gave him the same 6 rating on quantity and dependability and a 7 rating on quality and job knowledge, but Crew Chief Roger Lyon rated him 3 on dependability, 4 on quality, 5 on quantity, and 6 on job knowledge. These were his evaluations as operator of only one of the shear machines (Tr. 917).

Blanchard was a utility employee from 1978 until about 1984, when he began working in Ketz' department mostly as a forklift driver (Tr. 918–919, 1556). There, when operating the one shear machine in 1985, he worked mostly on noncritical template work, not on more accurate regular production work (Tr. 1550). Because of M1–1 Blanchard's limited ability, I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that he was qualified to perform the available work.

Robert Garrett. He is an able, very versatile employee. On his 108 evaluation he had the high ratings of 8 for quantity and quality and the very high rating of 9 for job knowledge.

His principal job was operating the CNC (computer numerically controlled) drill line (Tr. 1146–1147). He also operated the Airco CNC cutting machine (on which he was trained at the factory before instructing two operators in its use), the CNC Anglematic machine and other machines in the Saw Department, the various shears in the Shears Department, and the vertical mill in the South (bridge) Shop (Tr. 1150–1152, 1161, 1163). He has served as leadman in both the warehouse and the Shears Department (Tr. 1168).

The only apparent reason for the Company's laying off this talented employee was his 1984 back injury. He credibly testified, however, that his back surgery was successful and he had no physical limitations after his recovery (Tr. 1169). I find that M1–1 Garrett was fully qualified to perform the available work.

Katheryne Bryant. She had a 108 evaluation as operator of the bolt threader machine, on which she had worked about 11 years (G.C. Exh. 26F; Tr. 904). When that work fell off the Company was unable to find other regular work for which she was qualified (Tr. 273, 907–910, 1432–1433, 1451). I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that M2–1 Bryant was qualified to perform the available work.

Other Challenged Layoffs

Luther Friday. He was the most senior of three shipper-checkers. His seniority was 10/20/76, David Brewer's was 6/25/79, and Frederick Smith's was 2/23/81.

It is undisputed that when Smith was promoted to leadman, Friday protested and charged racial discrimination. He then said, "Well, go ahead and lay me off." The Company complied and laid him off with others on 25 April.

Friday did not testify, and there is no contention that he was improperly laid off instead of the junior employee Brewer. His greater seniority did not entitle him to a promotion under the contractual layoff provision. I therefore find no basis for ruling that shipper-checker Friday's layoff was improper.

Lonnie Kemp. He was a machinist in labor grade 2, the second highest labor grade in the plant. He was three levels higher than the M1–1 machine operators, who were in labor grade 5. (G.C. Exh. 1E, Exh. 1 at 35.) In his 15 years of service he was first a laborer and M1–2 machine operator, a M1–1 machine operator in 1974, and a machinist in 1978. Since then he has been the only machinist performing highly skilled machine work in the machine shop, which is located in the South (bridge) Shop. (Tr. 1051–1055, 1058–1062, 1071.) In this skilled work he had a 108 evaluation, with a high 8 rating on quantity, quality, and job knowledge (G.C. Exh. 25FF).

Taking the position that the contractual layoff provisions were no longer in effect, the Company ignored his seniority and laid him off on 25 April without offering him continued employment on any of the lesser skilled machine operator jobs. In the Company's 14 July response to his and others' claim for bumping rights (G.C. Exh. 19), it asserted that "Other categories did not fit [Kemp's] talents with the possible exception of Machine 1-1 and that in the area of the radial drill or mill" (work performed by two other senior employees). The Company ignored the remaining machine operator jobs, including those on which he had previously worked. As a highly skilled operator, he undoubtedly was as qualified as many of the junior employees who were still employed on the lower skilled machine operator jobs.

Because of machinist Kemp's good evaluation in the high-skilled machine shop work, I find (1) that the General Counsel has proved that he was as qualified as various junior employees performing available work in lower pay levels and (2) that Kemp should have been retained to perform the remaining machinist and other available work.

Richard Martin. Two of the three remaining utility employees were U-1 Richard Martin (with a seniority date of 2/2/76) and U-1 Henry Cordoba (with a seniority date of 4/18/79). Martin had a 108 evaluation, with a high 8 rating on quantity, a very high 9 rating on quality, and a 5 rating on job knowledge (G.C. Exh. 25LL). Supervisor Roger Cordoba gave Henry Cordoba a high 8 rating on quantity and quality and a 7 rating on job knowledge. Despite the comparable evaluations, the Company laid off Martin on 25 April and retained Henry Cordoba, who had 3 years less seniority.

The Company's only stated reason for laying off the more senior utility employee was that U-1 Martin was primarily operating a roll machine (Tr. 288) whereas U-1 Cordoba "was operating one of the saws," that Martin "had not operated that saw," and "That was what we needed at that particular moment in time" (Tr. 295). As discussed above, Supervisor Roger Cordoba estimated that it would take only a few minutes to instruct an employee how to operate the saw. At the time, Martin was also helping on the shears and Henry Cordoba was also working in the bull gang (Tr. 1045-1047).

I find that the stated reasons for not honoring U-1 Martin's greater seniority was merely a pretext and that Martin, with 10 years of service as a utility employee, was qualified to perform the available work.

Francisco Santiago. He was admittedly an excellent worker, although he was unable to read English and spec sheets. Both he and the other 2d class painter were laid off, leaving only the 1st class painters. There is no basis for finding P-2 Santiago's layoff to be improper.

Bradley Steven. He was classified as a crane operator 2d class, but he had not been trained to operate the overhead crane (Tr. 1033-1034). Apparently because of his exceptional 110 evaluaton (G.C. Exh. 26Y) he was reclassified from a utility employee to enable him to become an all-around crane operator. He was working primarily as a forklift operator and was laid off when there was insufficient work to keep him busy. The junior CO-2 J. K. Hawkins, who was retained, did operate the overhead crane. (Tr. 285-286, 1434.) I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that CO-2 Stevens was qualified to perform the available work.

In summary, the Company in April laid off a total of 46 employees. Although the General Counsel contends that the Company's failure to honor the contractual seniority provisions resulted in the improper layoff of 26 of them, I find that only 7 of the employees were laid off in violation of their seniority rights under article 14.1 of the 1985-1988 agreement. They were Robert Brown Jr., Cliff Gardner, Robert Garrett, Lonnie Kemp, Curtis Langford, Richard Martin, and Juan Romero.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By failing to continue in effect all the terms and conditions of the 1985-1988 collective-bargaining agreement until 30 days after it has given the 8(d)(3) notice of a dispute to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Kansas Department of Human Resources, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By making unilateral changes in the conditions of employment without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

3. By (a) reducing wages 14 percent on 14 April and also in April (b) changing the grievance procedure, (c) promoting leadmen to crew chiefs and permitting them to perform bargaining unit work, (d) ceasing the checkoff of union dues, (e) stopping the making of pension benefit contributions, and (f) failing to follow the contractual layoff requirements, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

4. By laying off Robert Brown Jr., Robert Garrett, and Juan Romero on 14 April and Cliff Gardner, Lonnie Kemp, Curtis Langford, and Richard Martin on 25 April in violation of their seniority rights under article 14.1 of the agreement, the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

5. The Company did not tell an employee that the Union no longer represented the employees in the bargaining unit.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find that it must be ordered to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including the restoration of all the terms and conditions of the 1985-1988 collective-bargaining agreement until 30 days after it has given the 8(d)(3) notice to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Kansas Department of Human Resources.

The Respondent must make the employees whole for the loss of earnings and other rights and benefits suffered as a result of its reduction of wages and other changes in the terms and conditions of the agreement while failing to comply with Section 8(d)(3), as well as make the Union whole for any loss of dues suffered as a result of the cancellation of the dues checkoff, Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682, 683 (1970), enfd. 444 F.2d 502 (6th Cir. 1971), plus interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).

The Respondent, having unlawfully laid off seven employees, it must offer them reinstatement and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of layoff to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest.

The Respondent must transmit to the pension fund the contributions it has failed to make while not in compliance with Section 8(d)(3). Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at this adjudicatory stage for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Any additional amount owed the pension fund shall be determined as in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Geo. C. Christopher & Sons, Inc., Wichita, Kansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Terminating or modifying a collective-bargaining agreement with Boilermakers Local Lodge 286 until 30 days after it has given the 8(d)(3) notice of a dispute to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Kansas Department of Human Resources.

(b) Making unilateral changes in the conditions of employment without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Restore all the terms and conditions of the 1985–1988 agreement until the notice requirements of Section 8(d)(3) have been complied with.

(b) Make the employees whole for the loss of earnings and other rights and benefits suffered as a result of its reduction of wages and other changes in the terms and conditions of the agreement while failing to comply with Section 8(d)(3) of the Act.

(c) Make the Union whole for any loss of dues suffered as a result of the cancellation of the dues checkoff.

(d) Offer Robert Brown Jr., Cliff Gardner, Robert Garrett, Lonnie Kemp, Curtis Langford, Richard Martin, and Juan Romero immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of their unlawful layoff, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful layoffs and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the layoffs will not be used against them in any way.

(f) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Geo. C. Christopher & Son, Inc. at its facility located in Wichita, Kansas, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(g) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(h) Post at its facilities in Wichita, Kansas, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 17, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(i) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[3] If no exceptions as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT terminate or modify an agreement with Boilermakers Local Lodge 286 until 30 days after giving the required 8(d)(3) notice of a dispute to the Federal and State Mediation Services.

WE WILL NOT make changes in your conditions of employment without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL restore all the terms and conditions of the 1985–1988 agreement until we have complied with the 30-day notice requirement.

WE WILL make you whole for the loss of earnings and other rights and benefits resulting from the wage reduction and other changes in the agreement, plus interest.

WE WILL offer Robert Brown Jr., Cliff Gardner, Robert Garrett, Lonnie Kemp, Curtis Langford, Richard Martin, and Juan Romero immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their layoff, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify each of them that we have removed from our files any reference to his layoff and that the layoff will not be used against him in any way.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employee in the bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Geo. C. Christopher & Son, Inc. at its facility located in Wichita, Kansas, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Cases 18–CA–7654 and 18–CA–7971

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On October 24, 1983, Administrative Law Judge George Norman issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs to which the Respondent filed an answering brief. On February 6, 1986, pursuant to the Board's remand order of July 6, 1984, Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief[1] to which the Charging Party filed a reply brief. The Respondent also filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judges' rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

Before setting forth our rulings on each of the issues raised by the complaints, the decision, and the supplemental decision, we shall first summarize the background of the case.

As set out below, the complaint in Case 18–CA–7654 alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) and Section 8(d) by unilaterally transferring the manufacture of Sea Hawk pedestal cranes from its unionized Cedar Rapids, Iowa facility to its nonunionized Bowling Green, Kentucky plant and further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain in good faith during concession bargaining requested by the Respondent during the term of the parties' contract. The complaint also alleged that certain supervisors made threats and engaged in interrogations which violated Section 8(a)(1) and further violated Section 8(a)(5) by directly dealing with employees in an effort to get employees to agree to the proposed concessions. The complaint in Case 18–CA–7971, also more fully detailed below, alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) and Section 8(d) by failing to bargain about the decision to transfer certain admitted bargaining unit work (small crawler cable cranes) from its unionized Cedar Rapids plant to its nonunionized Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky facilities and further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain about the effects of the transfer and failing to provide certain requested information regarding this decision and its effects.

The complaints in Cases 18–CA–7654 and 18–CA–7971 were the subject of a hearing before Judge Norman in March and May 1983. On October 24, 1983, Judge Norman issued a decision dismissing the complaints in their entirety. Regarding Case 18–CA–7654, he summarily found, inter alia, that various allegedly unlawful supervisory remarks and inquiries concerning the Sea Hawk work were expressions of opinion of "lower echelon people" that were not authorized by the Respondent and that such conduct did not show that the Respondent acted in retaliation in transferring the Sea Hawk in violation of Section 8(a)(3). He did not make any specific factual findings regarding any of the seven allegedly unlawful statements nor did he decide whether they separately constituted 8(a)(1) violations or whether they were indicative of direct dealing in violation of Section 8(a)(5).[3] With respect to the complaint allegations of Case 18–CA–7971, Judge Norman found that the 6-month 10(b) period commenced with the Respondent's announcement to the Union on May 24, 1982, of its decision to transfer unit work and that this period had run by the date on which the charge in that case was filed—December 1, 1982. Thus, the judge found that Section 10(b) precluded

[1] The Respondent thereafter filed a motion to dismiss the complaints on the basis that the controversy was moot. The Charging Party filed a response. We find no merit to the Respondent's arguments in support of its motion and deny it.

[2] The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judges' credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that the resolutions are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for overruling the findings.

[3] In finding that these remarks did not show retaliatory intent, the judge recommended "the dismissal of the 8(a)(3) allegation with respect to the interrogations and remarks by the supervisory personnel concerning the Sea Hawk decision." It appears that the judge's reference to an 8(a)(3) allegation in this context is an inadvertent error as the complaint does not allege that these remarks violated Sec. 8(a)(3). It is not clear, however, that the judge's discussion there was intended to dispose of all the 8(a)(1) allegations where the judge set out none of their specifics and simply referred to them as statements "concerning the Sea Hawk decision" and made by "lower echelon people." We note also that one of the alleged unlawful remarks was attributed to the plant manager and several remarks and inquiries concerned employee thoughts about concessions without reference to the Sea Hawk decision. Accordingly, we do not read Judge Norman's decision as containing recommendations regarding the disposition of these alleged 8(a)(1) violations.

consideration of the allegations pertaining to the transfer decision as well as the allegations pertaining to the failure to engage in effects bargaining and to supply the requested information, which he found were dependent on and subsidiary to an obligation to bargain about the decision. He thus dismissed this complaint without further discussion.

By order dated July 6, 1984, the Board remanded this case to the chief administrative law judge (Judge Norman having retired on December 31, 1983) for designation to another judge who was to make specific factual and legal findings regarding the 8(a)(1) allegations of threats and interrogations in Case 18–CA–7654. The order also directed the designated judge to make specific factual and legal findings regarding the 8(a)(5) effects bargaining and information allegations of Case 18–CA–7971. A decision on all the issues in both cases was held in abeyance pending the issuance of the supplemental decision. Thereafter, Judge Gershuny, to whom this case was assigned, issued a supplemental decision on February 6, 1986. He set forth the factual findings pertaining to the seven alleged 8(a)(1) interrogation and threat allegations, finding that several of the statements violated the Act and dismissing the others. He further found that the Union had requested bargaining about the effects of the decision to transfer small crawler cranes on June 2, 1982, and that, as admitted by the Respondent, no effects bargaining had taken place. He failed to rule formally on this 8(a)(5) allegation, however, finding it intertwined with and dependent on the decision bargaining allegation, which he found that he was not authorized to rule on as it had not been included in the Board's remand order. With respect to the information request allegation, he found that the Union had requested certain information on June 2, 1982, but he otherwise failed to set forth facts or to rule on the information request issue, noting that the parties' briefs did not "address" the relevance of each item requested or the adequacy of each piece of information provided by the Respondent.

Turning now to the merits of this case, we find as follows:

A. Case 18–CA–7654

1. The complaint in Case 18–CA–7654 alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) in various respects. First, it was alleged that the Respondent unilaterally and without the consent of the Union relocated certain alleged bargaining unit work (the manufacture of a Sea Hawk pedestal crane) from its unionized Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant to its nonunionized Bowling Green, Kentucky facility. Second, it was alleged that, by this transfer, the Respondent sought to evade its contractual obligation.

Judge Norman dismissed both these allegations. He found that Sea Hawk was a new product line and that the decision to build it at Bowling Green did not involve a transfer of bargaining unit work. Thus he found that despite the fact that employees believed, based on the statements and actions of certain supervisors and anticipatory preparations at the Cedar Rapids plant, that Sea Hawk would be manufactured at Cedar Rapids, the Respondent was not obligated to bargain with the Union regarding its decision to produce Sea Hawk at Bowling Green and therefore did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) when it failed to do so. He further found that the decision to produce Sea Hawk at Bowling Green was prompted by legitimate business considerations, including the fact that Bowling Green was the principal manufacturing site for most of the Respondent's pedestal cranes. He further found that, at most, there was a loss of work at Cedar Rapids on the production of one Sea Hawk prototype and that this loss had a de minimis effect on employees.

We agree with Judge Norman's dismissal of these 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) allegations for the following reasons. First, regarding the 8(a)(5) allegation that is based on the specific proscription of Section 8(d), we rely on the Board's later decision in Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984) (Milwaukee Spring II).[4] Here, as was found in Milwaukee Spring II, there is no evidence that the parties' contract contained a provision which restricted or otherwise preserved the performance of the Sea Hawk work to the Cedar Rapids facility. Similarly, there is no clause which restricts the Respondent's decision-making regarding work relocation. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent did not modify the parties' contract and thus did not

[4] Subsequent to the issuance of Milwaukee Spring II, supra, the General Counsel in this case filed a motion to withdraw its exceptions to the extent that its earlier-filed exceptions relied on the Board's decision in Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982) (Milwaukee Spring I). That motion was granted. We note, however, that the Charging Party, which had separately excepted to the judge's findings on these issues, did not join in this motion to withdraw. Hence, the issue remains before us for our consideration.

In Milwaukee Spring II, 268 NLRB 601 (1984), the Board found that the respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 8(d) when it failed to obtain the union's consent to its decision to transfer certain bargaining unit work from one location to another. In so doing, the Board found that while an employer may not unilaterally institute proposed changes in contractual terms and conditions of employment which are mandatory subjects of bargaining, Sec. 8(d) proscribes unilateral modification of contractual terms only where the modified term is contained in the contract. The Board found that the parties' contract did not contain a clause requiring the bargaining unit work in question to remain at the Milwaukee plant and that the relocation did not disturb existing wages and benefits of unit employees. Thus, the Board found that the respondent did not unlawfully modify the terms of the contract in violation of Sec. 8(d) when it transferred the work.

violate Section 8(a)(5) as defined in Section 8(d) when it decided to manufacture the Sea Hawk crane at its Bowling Green facility.[5] We further dismiss the second alleged theory of an 8(a)(5) violation. Thus, we find that the unilateral transfer of the Sea Hawk crane work did not violate the Act even if it were bargaining unit work. We note in this regard that the credited testimony, as found by Judge Norman, shows that the decision to manufacture the Sea Hawk crane at Bowling Green involved a number of business reasons, including higher productivity, lower scrap costs, and lower wage rates at Bowling Green as well as the fact that Bowling Green was the Respondent's principal pedestal crane manufacturing site. We thus find that the Respondent's decision to manufacture Sea Hawk at Bowling Green did not violate Section 8(a)(5) under any of the views expressed in Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984) (Otis Elevator II).

In adopting Judge Norman's conclusion that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) by removing the Sea Hawk prototype from Cedar Rapids to Bowling Green, we find it unnecessary to rely on his finding that the loss of such work was de minimis. Rather, we note that the General Counsel, in contending that the transfer of the Sea Hawk project was unlawful, did not allege or argue that the removal of the Sea Hawk prototype alone violated the Act. We further find that the issue of whether the removal of the prototype alone was unlawful was not fully litigated.[6]

2. The complaint also alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by seven separate statements of Cedar Rapids supervisory personnel, i.e., that Plant Manager McCafferty, at an employee meeting, threatened employees with a loss of existing jobs if concessions were not supported; that Powers, a supervisor, interrogated employees regarding concessions and threatened them with loss of jobs; that Chesmore, a supervisor, unlawfully interrogated employees concerning their position on concessions and threatened them with loss of work; that Klingman, a supervisor, interrogated employees on their positions on concessions; that Uldrich, a supervisor, threatened employees with loss of work if concessions were not agreed to; that Hootman, a supervisor, interrogated an employee concerning his and other employees' views on concessions and threatened him with loss of employment if concessions were not accepted; and that Wolfe, a supervisor, threatened employees with loss of jobs if concessions were not accepted.

As noted above, Judge Norman did not set out factual findings with respect to any of these alleged statements. On remand, Judge Gershuny in his supplemental decision made various findings on these allegations. We agree with Judge Gershuny's finding that Wolfe and Chesmore's statements violated the Act and that McCafferty's,[7] Hootman's, and Uldrich's[8] remarks did not. Contrary to the judge, however, we do not find that Powers' and Klingman's statements violated the Act.

Regarding Powers, the judge found that Powers asked employee Brundrett "what did the guys out in the shop" think of the concessions and expressed the opinion that salaried employees were making greater concessions than were hourly employees. The judge found this inquiry violated Section 8(a)(1). We disagree. The record shows that concessions were a common topic of conversation around the plant. The record also shows that Brundrett was a union shop steward and that the nature of the inquiry, which took place in Brundrett's work area, was general and nonthreatening. Accordingly, we do not find this inquiry violated Sec-

[5] In Member Johansen's view, Sec. 8(d) defines the duty to "bargain collectively." It is an "unfair labor practice" as defined in Sec. 2(8), pursuant to Sec. 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3) "to refuse to bargain collectively." Sec. 8(d) merely defines conduct which will violate either Sec. 8(a)(5) or 8(b)(3). Sec. 8(d) is not itself violated by that conduct.

[6] Chairman Stephens does not reach the question whether, assuming the production of the Sea Hawk were unit work at Cedar Rapids, the decision to subcontract it to another plant would be a mandatory subject of bargaining under the Otis Elevator test. Rather, he would affirm the judge's finding, based on the credited testimony of Division Manager Robert Price, that the Respondent's initial decision regarding the location for producing the Sea Hawk was the decision to manufacture it at Bowling Green. Thus, it never became unit work at Cedar Rapids and there is no work transfer issue in the case, at least so far as production of the Sea Hawk is concerned. Chairman Stephens agrees with the judge that this was a decision regarding the location in which manufacturing of a new product line would be started up and that such decisions are entrepreneurial decisions that are not subject to a bargaining obligation under the Act.

With respect to the work on the Sea Hawk prototype, Chairman Stephens would find that the work of building at least one Sea Hawk prototype was removed from the bargaining unit. He reaches this conclusion on the basis of the credited evidence that the building of prototypes was customarily done at Cedar Rapids and that a decision to build one prototype at Cedar Rapids had been prepared for and publicly announced. He does not, however, agree with the judge's conclusion that loss of this work resulted in only a "de minimis" loss to the employees and that unilateral removal of the work could therefore not constitute a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5). Obviously the loss of 500 hours of work on the prototype harmed Cedar Rapids employees who were laid off and who could have performed that work. Chairman Stephens would find a violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) in the unilateral removal of that work from the bargaining unit because none of the reasons, other than wage rates, which the Respondent offered as its entrepreneurial reasons for locating the production work on the Sea Hawk at Bowling Green would apply to the removal of the work on this prototype. Chairman Stephens would find that the decision to remove this particular work was clearly a mandatory subject of bargaining under Otis.

[7] In dismissing the allegation regarding McCafferty, we rely only on the judge's finding that employee Brundrett's testimony on the point was vague and uncertain. While the judge further found that employee Dusil testified that no such threat was made, we note there were a number of employee meetings and no evidence that Dusil and Brundrett attended the same one. Thus, contrary to the judge's indication, Dusil's testimony is not necessarily inconsistent with that of Brundrett.

[8] We find it unnecessary to pass on the allegation regarding Uldrich because the finding of such an additional violation would be cumulative.

tion 8(a)(1). See, e.g., Sunnyvale Medical Clinic, 277 NLRB 1217 (1985).

The judge also found that Supervisor Klingman's inquiry of employee Feiereisen regarding what Feiereisen thought were the feelings of the employees about the concessions violated Section 8(a)(1). We do not agree. The record shows that the remark occurred in a conversation described by employee Feiereisen as "small talk" and was, unlike Chesmore's remarks, not accompanied by other, potentially coercive remarks. Accordingly, we find this a general, innocuous inquiry which does not violate Section 8(a)(1). See, e.g., Sunnyvale, supra.

3. The complaint also alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by engaging in bad-faith bargaining during concession bargaining. In this connection, the complaint further alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to provide the Union with certain requested financial information supporting the Respondent's request for concession bargaining and that the Respondent engaged in direct dealing with the employees, evidenced both by holding meetings with employees and by the employee interrogations and threats discussed above.

Judge Norman dismissed these 8(a)(5) allegations. In so doing, the judge characterized the concession bargaining as a "full and fair airing on a wide variety of subjects on both sides" and found that, despite the absence of any agreement on any proposal advanced by either party, substantive good-faith prevailed. The judge further found that where, as here, the Respondent clearly indicated that it could afford to meet its contract obligations and would honor them even if the concession proposals were not accepted, there was no obligation to provide the Union with assertedly relevant financial information. The judge also concluded that there was no evidence that the Respondent bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees. Rather, the judge found that employee meetings were not unusual occurrences and that the Respondent sought and obtained the Union's permission to hold these employee meetings, each of which was attended by at least one union officer.

We agree with Judge Norman's finding that the Respondent did not engage in bad-faith bargaining during concession bargaining for the reasons cited in his decision. We also agree with his conclusion that the Respondent did not independently violate Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to provide the requested financial information for the judge's reasons as described above,[9] and we agree with Judge Norman's dismissal of the direct dealing allegations. In dismissing the direct dealing allegations, we note the evidence as found by the judge shows that the Respondent's meetings were held only after its proposals were presented to the Union, that the Union was informed of the Respondent's intent to hold the meetings, and that the meetings were held in the presence of Union officers. The evidence further shows that at the meetings all the Respondent did was to present the proposals as previously presented to the Union. Under these circumstances, we find the meetings did not constitute unlawful direct dealing.

As noted above, the complaint asserts that the alleged unlawful interrogations and threats, discussed above, also constituted direct dealing in violation of Section 8(a)(5). Judge Norman, however, failed to make any specific findings regarding their 8(a)(5) aspects. The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to make these findings. In her brief, the General Counsel argues that by the alleged 8(a)(1) conduct the Respondent sought to obtain employee support for its concession proposals directly. The General Counsel also argues that this conduct not only constituted an independent violation of unlawful bypassing of the Union and direct dealing with employees, but further evidenced overall bad-faith bargaining on the part of the Respondent.

In our above discussion, we have found that remarks made by Chesmore and Wolfe violated Section 8(a)(1). We, however, have dismissed allegations of bad-faith bargaining with respect to the Respondent's actual conduct during concession bargaining, its failure to provide financial information to the Union, and its holding of employee meetings to discuss concession proposals. In these circumstances and viewing the nature of the 8(a)(1) violations we have found, we do not find these 8(a)(1) violations sufficient to establish direct dealing or overall bad-faith bargaining.

4. Finally, the complaint alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) under two theories. First, it alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) under Milwaukee Spring I, supra, 265 NLRB 206, where, as part of a plan to escape the economic obligations of a collective-bargaining agreement, it transferred the Sea Hawk project from a unionized to a nonunionized plant, adversely affecting unit employees by the accompanying loss of work. The complaint also alleged that the transfer of Sea Hawk independently violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) because it was in retaliation for the Union's refusal to agree to concession proposals.

[9] The General Counsel contends that this case is similar to Goodyear Aerospace Corp., 204 NLRB 831, enfd. in part, 497 F.2d 747 (6th Cir. 1974), in which the Board found that the respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to provide requested financial information in connection with its request for concession bargaining. In Goodyear, the respondent sought concession bargaining in an effort to remain competitive, but did not indicate an affirmative intent to abide by the terms of the contract in the event that concessions were not granted. Additionally, in presenting its proposals at meetings with employees, the respondent in Goodyear represented to employees that it was engaged in a "profitless" operation and if it waited for the expiration of the current contract to discuss proposed changes, there would be "no need for talking," and that the Union was unwilling to make the changes. Accordingly, we find Goodyear, supra, distinguishable from the instant case.

Judge Norman dismissed these 8(a)(3) allegations. In so doing, he distinguished this case from Milwaukee Spring I, supra, finding that in this case, unlike Milwaukee Spring I, lower labor costs were only one of the reasons the Respondent advanced for its decision to build the Sea Hawk at Bowling Green. The judge further dismissed the independent 8(a)(3) allegation that the decision to produce Sea Hawk was in retaliation for the Union's failure to agree to concession proposals. In so doing, he credited the testimony of the Respondent's division manager that the decision was made solely for business reasons, i.e., higher productivity, lower scrap costs, the fact that Bowling Green was the principal pedestal crane manufacturing site, and lower labor rates, and was not related to the ongoing concession bargaining which continued thereafter. In connection with this allegation, the judge also found that the various alleged job-loss threats and interrogations by the Respondent's supervisory personnel made in connection with the Sea Hawk decision (as described above) did not truly reflect the Respondent's reasons for its Sea Hawk decision as they were merely expressions of opinion by lower-level supervisors which were not authorized by the Respondent.

We agree with the judge that the various 8(a)(3) allegations should be dismissed. In so doing, we note that the 8(a)(3) allegation based on the first theory is derived from Milwaukee Spring I, which was overruled in Milwaukee Spring II, to which we adhere. Regarding the second 8(a)(3) theory of the complaint, we adopt Judge Norman's findings, based in part on credited testimony, that the evidence does not support a finding that the Respondent sought to retaliate against employees by transferring the Sea Hawk crane work because of the Union's failure to agree to the proposed concessions. Finally, we also find that the two 8(a)(1) violations that we have found are insufficient to establish that the Respondent's transfer of the Sea Hawk crane was for an unlawful purpose.

B. Case 18–CA–7971

As noted above, the complaint alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) by failing to provide the Union with an opportunity to bargain about its decision to transfer the assembly and manufacture operations of small crawler cable cranes (admittedly existing bargaining unit work) from its Cedar Rapids plant to its Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky plants. The complaint further alleged that this transfer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by its adverse effect on bargaining unit employees. The complaint also alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain at the Union's request about the effects of this transfer and by failing to provide or to timely provide certain requested information pertaining to this transfer decision and its effect on employees.

As noted above, Judge Norman dismissed this complaint in its entirety, finding that the alleged failure of the Respondent to bargain about the transfer decision was barred by Section 10(b) and that as the effects bargaining and information allegations were derived from the related charge pertaining to the transfer decision, that Section 10(b) also precluded their consideration. In his supplemental decision, Judge Gershuny likewise failed to make legal findings on the effects-bargaining issue on the basis that the terms of the remand did not give him the authority to do so. He also failed to make full factual and legal findings regarding the information request.

The following facts are relevant to our findings on these decision bargaining, effects-bargaining, and information request issues. The record shows that on May 24, 1982, the Respondent announced that in light of the Company's reorganization and pursuant to recommendations of a task force, the assembly and manufacture of small crawler cable cranes would be transferred beginning June 21, 1982, from Cedar Rapids to Bowling Green and Lexington. On May 24, the Union served notice on the Respondent that it would grieve the transfer and it did so on June 3. On June 2, 1982,[10] the Union, in writing, protested the transfer, requested effects bargaining, and requested information "which would help the Union to discuss this effect properly." The Union, however, did not make a request to bargain over the transfer decision. On August 6, 1982, by which time the transfer of the small crawler cable crane work had begun, the Respondent sent the Union a letter with accompanying documents in response to the Union's June 2 letter. The Respondent, at the hearing, conceded that no effects bargaining took place.

First, we agree with Judge Norman's dismissal of the allegations pertaining to the Respondent's refusal to bargain over the transfer decision. The [10] The parties stipulated that the letter is misdated May 2, 1982.

General Counsel initially alleged two theories under which the transfer decision violated Section 8(a)(5). In dismissing the first theory, we rely, as we did in dismissing the complaint allegation concerning the Respondent's decision to manufacture the Sea Hawk crane at its Bowling Green plant, on Milwaukee Spring II, supra. Thus, where, as here, the contract contains no provision which restricted or otherwise preserved the performance of small crawler cable crane work to the Cedar Rapids facility or restricted the Respondent's decision-making regarding work relocation, we do not find that the Respondent unilaterally modified the parties' contract in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(d) when it decided to transfer this work to its Bowling Green and Lexington plants. Regarding the second theory, i.e., that the relocation constituted a unilateral change in the employees' terms and conditions of employment about which the Respondent had to bargain, we find that even assuming arguendo that the Union had a right to bargain about the transfer decision, the Union waived this right. Thus, we note that although the Union received clear notice of the Respondent's decision to transfer the assembly and manufacture of the small crawler cable cranes from Cedar Rapids, it did not request bargaining over this decision. Accordingly, we dismiss this allegation.[11]

Contrary to Judge Norman, however, we find that effects-bargaining and information request issues are separate issues involving independent events.[12] Thus, our dismissal of the allegation concerning a failure to bargain over the Respondent's decision to transfer bargaining unit work does not preclude our consideration of an effects-bargaining allegation on the same transfer issue. See, e.g., Otis Elevator II, supra. Accordingly, based on the facts set forth above, we shall now examine both the timeliness of the charge regarding the effects-bargaining and information request issues and the merits of these allegations.

With respect to the effects-bargaining allegation, we first find no merit to the Respondent's contention that this complaint allegation is barred under Section 10(b). The record shows that the request for effects bargaining occurred on June 2, 1982, and that a charge alleging a failure to bargain over the effects was filed December 1, 1982, within the 6-month period. Turning to the merits of the allegation, we note that the Respondent concedes that no effects bargaining took place.[13] Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) in failing to accede to the Union's request for effects bargaining.[14]

The record shows that the Union's information request of June 2 listed 41 numbered items.[15] Of these, items numbered 32–33 and 37–41 appear to relate to effects bargaining regarding the transfer.[16] The letter includes requests for seniority lists

[11] In light of our finding, we find it unnecessary to address the Respondent's contentions that the allegation pertaining to the transfer decision was precluded from consideration by Sec. 10(b); that the Union had contractually waived its right to bargain about the issue; or that the matter should be deferred to an arbitrator's decision favorable to the Respondent. Further, in light of our dismissal of the 8(a)(5) and 8(d) allegations regarding the transfer, we also shall dismiss the derivative 8(a)(3) allegation. Milwaukee Spring II, supra at 604.

[12] The Respondent contends that if consideration of the complaint is not barred by Sec. 10(b), the complaint should be dismissed in deference to an arbitration award on the transfer decision issued in December 1983. As we find the effects-bargaining and information request issues are matters which warrant our independent consideration, we do not find merit to the Respondent's contention that they should be deferred to an arbitration award covering only the transfer decision.

[13] The Respondent contends that it was not obligated to bargain with the Union regarding the effects of the decision to transfer the small crawler cable cranes where, inter alia, the transfer had no detrimental effect on the bargaining unit. We note that the cases cited by the Respondent involve subcontracting in accordance with past practice and with a minimal effect on employee jobs. In contrast, the facts in this case do not show a past history of subcontracting. Further, the transfer of small crawler cable crane work constituted approximately 20 percent of future bargaining unit work at Cedar Rapids. Accordingly, we find these cases inapplicable.

[14] Although the Respondent concedes that no effects bargaining took place, it suggests in its brief that the Union failed to act on the Respondent's offer in its letter of August 6 to bargain about the matters relating to the transfer. Thus, the Respondent argues that the Union waived its right to bargain over the effects of the decision.

The letter, in pertinent part, states:

> The Company has met with the Union in the past to discuss the subject of transfer of work and is ready to discuss at the Union's request any other subject that relates to the transfer of work and which has impact on the bargaining unit personnel.

We note, by its own language, the Respondent's letter fails to respond to or even acknowledge the Union's previous request for effects bargaining. We also note that the letter was sent approximately 2 months after the transfer had begun. Further, even if this letter were to be construed as expressing the Respondent's willingness to engage in effects bargaining, we note, in view of our finding below, that the Respondent made this offer at the same time it was unlawfully refusing to provide the Union with requested information relevant to the effects of the work transfer and thus precluded a meaningful opportunity to bargain. We thus find that the Respondent's letter did not satisfy its obligation to bargain about effects and that the Union's failure to respond to the Respondent's letter did not constitute a waiver of its right to engage in effects bargaining.

[15] Judge Gershuny found that the Union requested 61 numbered items. The letter introduced into evidence lists 41 items.

[16] The General Counsel contends, and the Charging Party does not otherwise contradict, that the first 31 items pertain to the decision to transfer the small crawler cable cranes. As we have dismissed the allegation regarding the Respondent's failure to bargain about the decision, we find it unnecessary to discuss items 1–31 in terms of their relevance or to pass on whether the Respondent complied with the Union's request for information on these items.

Further, items 34–36 in the June 2 letter refer to information about toxic substances, about substances subject to Federal OSHA or state OSHA standards, and reports and/or analyses regarding employee health matters. The complaint is narrowly drafted to allege as unlawful the refusal to supply information concerning the effects of the decision to transfer the work. As we do not construe items 34–36 to relate to that decision, we do not further address these items.

Finally, the record shows that in addition to its information request of June 2, the Union made requests for timestudies. The record also shows that the Respondent subsequently provided the Union with timestudies. We find it unnecessary to pass on whether the material requested was relevant to effects bargaining or whether the Respondent satisfied its obligaand lists of any employees on layoff and sick leave. The letter also makes inquiries concerning employee transfer rights, job assistance, relocation benefits, and severance settlement. The record also shows that the materials signed by its personnel director and sent by the Respondent to the Union on August 6 included a seniority list of employees and information concerning retirees. This letter, however, informed the Union that lists regarding employees on sick leave or eligible for workers' compensation should be requested from the labor relations manager and further that, as layoff lists were regularly provided to the Union, the Union should look to its own records for this information. The letter provided no additional information requested by the Union regarding effects bargaining.

It is well established that an employer has a duty to furnish a union, at its request, necessary and relevant information to enable it to carry out its obligations as the employees' bargaining representative. Further, under the standard of relevancy applied by the Board and the Courts, it is sufficient if the information requested is shown to be probably or potentially relevant. See NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967).

In this case, the Union's letter clearly requested effects bargaining and also clearly requested information which would be relevant to bargaining about effects. The information requested included employee lists, including seniority and lay off, and lists of employees on sick leave. The letter further requested, inter alia, information regarding whether the Company would provide severance pay and job assistance. There can be no dispute, and we so find, that these subjects are clearly relevant to the effects of the Respondent's transfer decision and information on them would be relevant and necessary to the Union to perform its statutory representative function.

Having determined that the requested information is relevant, we shall now examine the question of whether the Respondent complied with the request. In this regard, we note that "[i]t is an employer's obligation to provide relevant and material information to the collective-bargaining representative, to make a reasonable effort to secure the requested information, and if unavailable, explain or document the reasons for the asserted unavailability [footnote omitted]." Goodyear Atomic Corp., 266 NLRB 890, 896 (1983).

The record shows that the Respondent provided the Union with a seniority list, a retiree list, and a cost benefits list in its August 6 response, sent some 2 months after the Union's request. The Company did not answer or even acknowledge the Union's questions regarding matters such as severance pay or job assistance. Further, in response to several of the union questions, the Respondent simply referred the Union to another department in the Company.

We thus find that, in most respects, the Respondent's letter did not respond adequately to the Union's request for information. We further find that when the Respondent provided the information sought, it provided this information in an untimely manner.

The Respondent contends that it complied with the request for information in good faith and within a reasonable amount of time, given that it was overburdened with requests for information and it was involved in court litigation and with another major layoff unrelated to this case. We find that these reasons do not excuse the Respondent's delay in responding to the Union's information requests. We further note that with respect to the Respondent's merely referring the Union to another company department as to certain requested information, it offers no explanation why it could not have taken steps to acquire the information or have informed the Union sooner of the need to obtain the requested information from another department. Moreover, the fact that the Respondent was involved with other matters does not explain why it did not respond in any way to certain of the requests made by the Union.

In summary, having found that the Respondent's August 6 reply to the Union's information bargaining request was both untimely and inadequate and that the Respondent has offered no reasonable explanation for its delay in providing the information or failure to do so, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1). See, e.g., Florida Steel Corp., 235 NLRB 941 (1978).

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Specifically, having found that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union about the effects of its decision to transfer small crawler cable crane work out of the Cedar Rapids bargaining unit, we shall accompany our order to bargain with a limited backpay requirement designed both to make whole employees for losses, if any, suffered as a result of the violation and to recreate in tion to provide the information requested as it does not appear from the language of the complaint itself or from the General Counsel's and the Charging Party's arguments that a failure to provide the timestudies was a subject of the complaint.

some practicable manner a situation in which the parties' bargaining position is not entirely devoid of economic consequences for the Respondent.[17] We shall do so in this case by requiring the Respondent to pay backpay to its employees in a manner analogous to that required in Transmarine Corp., 170 NLRB 389 (1968), and Interstate Tool Co., 177 NLRB 686 (1969). Thus, the Respondent shall pay employees backpay at the rate of their normal wages when last in the Respondent's employ, from 5 days after the Board's decision until the occurrence of the earliest of the following conditions: (1) the date the Respondent bargains to agreement with the Union on those subjects pertaining to the effects on its employees of the decision to transfer work out of the bargaining unit; (2) a bona fide impasse in bargaining; (3) the failure of the Union to request bargaining within 5 days of this decision, or to commence negotiations within 5 days of the Respondent's notice of its desire to bargain with the Union; or (4) the subsequent failure of the Union to bargain in good faith; but in no event shall the sum paid to any of these employees exceed the amount he would have earned as wages from the date on which he was laid off to the time he was recalled or secured equivalent employment elsewhere, or the date on which the Respondent shall have offered to bargain, whichever occurs sooner; provided, however, that in no event shall this sum be less than these employees would have earned for a 2-week period at the rate of their normal wages when last in the Respondent's employ. See Uncle John's Pancake House, 232 NLRB 438 (1977).

Additionally, the record shows that the Respondent has permanently closed its Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant and has laid off all unit employees. Accordingly, in lieu of posting, we shall order the Respondent to mail a copy of the attached notice to each bargaining unit employee who was on layoff status or on the Respondent's payroll at its Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant as of the date the Respondent permanently closed its plant, at his or her last known address, as disclosed in the Respondent's records.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, FMC Corporation, Cable Crane and Excavation Division, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating its employees regarding their or other employees' sentiments about the Respondent's request for certain midterm contractual concessions or threatening employees with job loss if the Union fails to agree to the requested concessions.

(b) Failing to bargain with the United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, as the exclusive representative of its unit employees, over the effects on unit employees of its decision to transfer bargaining unit work (small crawler cable cranes) from its plant at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to its Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky plants.

(c) Failing to comply in a timely and adequate manner with the Union's request for information relevant and necessary to the Union's functioning as the collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees concerning the effects of the Respondent's decision to transfer bargaining unit work.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union over the effects on unit employees of the Respondent's decision to transfer unit work (small crawler cable cranes) from its Cedar Rapids, Iowa facility to its Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky plants.

(b) Pay the employees who were laid off as a result of the work transfer for the period set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(c) Furnish the Union with the information it requested concerning the effects of the Respondent's decision to transfer bargaining unit work.

(d) Mail a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix"[18] to each bargaining unit employee who was on the Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant payroll or layoff status on the date final notice was given of the plant's closure. Such notice shall be mailed to the last known address of each employee.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[17] In its motion to dismiss, the Respondent proferred evidence of a termination agreement executed between the parties and dealing, inter alia, with the effects of the Cedar Rapids plant's permanent closing on June 28, 1984. We find that this termination agreement dealing with the effects of the plant's closing in June 1984 does not preclude our remedying the Respondent's failure to bargain about the effects of its decision to transfer certain unit work in May 24, 1982.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT interrogate our employees regarding their or other employees' feelings about requested economic concessions or threaten our employees with job loss if the Union fails to agree to the requested concessions.

WE WILL NOT fail to bargain with United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, as the exclusive representative of our unit employees over the effects of our decision to transfer bargaining unit work (small crawler cable cranes) from our Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant to our Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky plants.

WE WILL NOT fail to comply in a timely and adequate manner with the Union's request for information relevant and necessary for the Union's functioning as the collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees concerning the effects of our decision to transfer bargaining unit work.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request by the Union, bargain collectively with it, over the effects of our decision to transfer unit work from our Cedar Rapids, Iowa plant to our Bowling Green and Lexington, Kentucky plants.

WE WILL furnish the Union with the information it requested concerning the effects of our decision to transfer bargaining unit work.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE NORMAN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried on March 14–17 and May 24, 1983, in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, pursuant to an order consolidating complaints issued by the Regional Director for Region 18 on February 2, 1983.

The complaint in Case 18–CA–7654 is based on a charge filed by United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW (the Union) on April 5, 1982.[1] On November 26, a complaint was issued alleging that the FMC Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by unilaterally transferring the manufacture of a pedestal crane known as "Sea Hawk" from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to Bolling Green, Kentucky. That action is separately alleged to be in derogation of Respondent's duty to bargain, an abrogation of a collectively bargained wage schedule and in reprisal for the Union's failure to agree to "concessions" sought by Respondent beginning on or about March 31. The alleged transfers are also claimed to have resulted in the layoff of approximately 100 bargaining unit employees. The complaint further alleges that Respondent engaged in "surface bargaining" with respect to concessions, failed or refused to furnish relevant information sought by the Union in the course of such bargaining and threatened, surveilled, and interrogated employees and thereby bypassed the Union as the collective-bargaining representative. All such conduct is alleged to have occurred between approximately March 26 and April 6.

The complaint in Case 18–CA–7971 issued on February 7, 1983, is based on a charge filed by the Union on December 1. That complaint alleges violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) because of Respondent's alleged failure to bargain over a transfer decision, the claimed effects thereof on unit employees, the abrogation of collective-bargaining provisions, and Respondent's delay in furnishing, and refusal to furnish, purportedly relevant information sought by the Union after it was informed of the transfer decision.

The Regional Director initially deferred consideration of the December 1 charge under Dubo Mfg. Corp., 142 NLRB 431 (1963), because the issue of Respondent's contractual authority to transfer work was then pending before arbitrator Burton I. Luskin. On December 20, Arbitrator Luskin issued his decision and found that the company had such express contractual authority. On January 25, 1983, the Regional Director revoked the Dubo deferral, ruling that the arbitrator's decision was "repugnant" to the Act under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). Respondent contends that the charge in Case 18–CA–7971 was time-barred under Section 10(b) of the Act.[2] In both complaints, the General Counsel,

[1] All events occurred in 1982 unless otherwise stated.

[2] Respondent filed three pretrial motions: motion to dismiss, motion to sever, and motion to strike, contending that Respondent's substantive and procedural due-process rights were violated by: (1) the issuance of complaints in both cases based on a new and enlarged Board doctrine or theory (see Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982)), which did not exist at any time when Respondent allegedly engaged in its supposedly illegal conduct, and (2) the issuance of a complaint in Case 18–CA–7971 when the Regional Director had failed or refused to establish jurisdiction over the underlying unfair labor practice charge pursuant to Sec. 10(b) of the Act, and when the undisputed facts and law presented to him showed the absence thereof.

inter alia, seeks return of the work allegedly transferred from Cedar Rapids.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and a thorough consideration of the briefs submitted by the General Counsel, Respondent, and the Union, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges and Respondent admits that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Decision to Manufacture the Sea Hawk Crane at Bolling Green, Kentucky

FMC (Respondent), a diversified manufacturing company, produces cable cranes, pedestal cranes, hydraulic cranes, and excavators at plants located in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Bolling Green and Lexington, Kentucky, and Woodstock, Canada. Cranes and excavators may be mounted either on tracks (or crawlers) or on truck bodies and are used in heavy construction. Pedestal cranes are produced primarily at Bolling Green and are mounted on stationary platforms and used primarily in offshore oil drilling. The Union has represented production and maintenance employees at Cedar Rapids since 1950 and at Woodstock, Canada, since the mid-1960s. The employees of the Kentucky plants are not represented by any union.

It is undisputed that although for several years Respondent successfully manufactured and sold pedestal cranes used in offshore oil drillings, in 1981, because of a demand for a lighter, more weather resistant hydraulically controlled crane to be mounted on offshore drilling platforms, the Company's sale of pedestal cranes used in offshore oil drillings fell sharply.

Cable crane and excavator division management[3] did not consider a specific product to fill this market void until November 30, 1981. On that day, Product Manager Frank Foster presented a 12-step program for the design, engineering, and manufacture of Sea Hawk to Division Manager Robert Price and his staff. Price approved both the Sea Hawk design and its production plan. A short time later he recommended it to Vice President and Group Manager John McKeon who also approved it. No decision was made at either meeting with respect to where the Sea Hawk was to be manufactured.

Division Manager Price testified that although Cedar Rapids had greater knowledge of hydraulic principles he preferred the Bolling Green facility because it was already the principal manufacturing location for almost all the Company's pedestal cranes, was a more productive and efficient facility than Cedar Rapids, and had lower labor rates. Price further testified that he made no selection at that time because Bolling Green, unlike Cedar Rapids, was then operating at or near capacity and he feared that it might not be able to manufacture Sea Hawk on schedule if that product obtained the market success Price anticipated.

Bolling Green's workload diminished significantly in January and February due to a general slackening in demand for all company products caused by a near depression in the construction industry. By March 23, production or build schedule for Bolling Green showed that substantial layoffs would be required unless work could be found for the plant.

Price further testified that layoffs at Bolling Green would result in a permanent loss of a skilled work force. He said he preferred Bolling Green because of the quality, productivity, and other cost advantages it had over Cedar Rapids. He said that sometime in the week of March 29, he made the decision to assign production of Sea Hawk to the Bolling Green plant and notified that plant's manager of his decision. Price further testified that he informed the rest of his staff on April 5. There is no dispute that at the time of Price's decision, concession bargaining, which had begun March 26, was then going on and Price was disappointed in its progress.

Also undisputed is the fact that in the several months preceding Price's decision, but apparently not known or authorized by him, preparations were being made to produce one Sea Hawk prototype at Cedar Rapids, where such prototypes normally are built and tested. The evidence showed that some structural changes were made in the old prototype area located on Bolling Street in Cedar Rapids. It is also undisputed that the Sea Hawk is similar in design to other models manufactured at Respondent's Cedar Rapids facility and its Bolling Green facility and that both facilities had the capability of producing this new crane. Storage bins were cleared for Sea Hawk parts, a few of which were ordered and received, and a "A-1" code or labeling system was developed in order to expedite the handling of Sea Hawk parts and equipment. Also on March 19, during a management union meeting, Frank Foster and Phil McCafferty elaborated on the manufacturing and marketing concepts underlying Sea Hawk.

Despite such preparations and expectations created by them, the only Sea Hawk produced at all in 1982 was a prototype manufactured at Bolling Green, Kentucky, months after the charge and complaint in Case 18–CA-7654 was filed. The work thereon required 500 "standard man-hours."[4]

After hearing arguments on those motions, the motions to strike and sever were denied and ruling on the motion to dismiss complaint in Case 18–CA–7971 was reserved.

[3] Until May 1, a divisional operation existed between the companies cable crane and excavator division, whose headquarters and engineering facilities were in Cedar Rapids, and the hydraulic crane division, which was located in Lexington, Kentucky. The other plants comprised in the cable crane and excavator division were Bolling Green, Kentucky, and Woodstock, Canada.

[4] "Standard man-hours" is the time it would take one employee working 100-percent efficiency to perform assigned work during a measured hour. The Company keeps no record of actual hours worked but the evidence shows that Bolling Green, Kentucky plant productivity is approximately 85 percent of standard.

The General Counsel contends that Respondent had sufficiently committed the Sea Hawk to Cedar Rapids to give rise to a claim that it constituted bargaining unit work, that Respondent relocated this work in derogation of its bargaining obligations under the Act, and that Cedar Rapids employees were adversely affected as a consequence thereof. The General Counsel relies on the following to support its contention: What the Union and employees were told concerning the proposed production of the Sea Hawk; what preparatory measures were taken at the Cedar Rapids facility in anticipation of the Sea Hawk production; and what the Union and employees were told at the time the decision to produce the Sea Hawk in Bolling Green, Kentucky, was announced.

The Union first learned about the Sea Hawk crane at a meeting held on March 19. Respondent's representatives at that time were Frank Foster, product development manager, and Phil McCafferty, plant manufacturing manager for the Cedar Rapids facility.[5] During that meeting Foster showed the union representatives a model of the Sea Hawk and told them it would be built in the "S Bay" of the old prototype building. Foster also told the union representatives that it was Respondent's intention to get the Sea Hawk off the drawing board and into production as soon as possible.[6] In order to accomplish this, Respondent intended to speed up production by producing more parts itself rather than buying them from suppliers. At the meeting McCafferty said that Sea Hawk parts would be given A-1 designation (would receive priority), and that Respondent would begin manufacturing the parts "before the ink was even dry on the blueprint." McCafferty also stated that because of a downturn in work, this would be an opportune time to build a Sea Hawk at Cedar Rapids and, using an overhead projector, gave an elaborate presentation on the Sea Hawk. Employees McDowell and Tollefson testified that they and other employees were told by McCafferty, in the presence of Ron Weaver, division manufacturing manager, that the Sea Hawk would be built in Cedar Rapids. McDowell further testified that McCafferty stated that production would begin within the next few weeks or months. Tollefson testified that Foreman Igou told him that cabs for the Sea Hawk would be built in the "S Bay" of the old prototype building.[7]

B. Conclusions with Respect to the Decision to Build the Sea Hawk at Bolling Green

It is not disputed that although the Sea Hawk is basically a pedestal crane hydraulically operated as are other cranes manufactured at both Cedar Rapids and Bolling Green, it is a new product line. That particular product had not previously been produced at Cedar Rapids or anywhere else until after the charge in this case was filed. No production work was actually performed on it at any time at any plant.

The Supreme Court's decision in Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1974), and decisions after that have held that work "transferred," "relocated," or "subcontracted" and concerning which decision bargaining is required must be existing bargaining unit work. Even under Milwaukee Spring, supra, there was a relocation of substantial and significant amounts of existing bargaining unit work (assembly operations).

There is no duty to bargain where no bargaining unit work existed at the time the decision was made. The decision was about placement of future manufacturing work and I am aware of no case that has ruled that in those circumstances an employer must bargain about such a decision. To require advance union approval for such a decision would invite direct union participation in fundamental management decisions respecting the growth and direction of an enterprise and would give the Union a veto over those decisions at least during the life of a collective-bargaining agreement.

The fact that Cedar Rapids employees believed it would be built in Cedar Rapids based on the statements and actions of responsible managers, anticipatory preparations, and acknowledged capacities in personnel and equipment to produce it does not in itself create a duty to bargain. The Board has never equated dissappointed expectations with an actual alteration in wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment, the only statutory subjects over which bargaining is mandatory. Moreover, the Board has held that no bargaining obligation can be imposed unless the employer's decision results in a real change in employment circumstances that are significantly detrimental to unit employees. See, e.g., Kennecott Copper Corp., 148 NLRB 1653 (1964); Rochester Telephone Corp., 190 NLRB 161 (1971).

Furthermore, the General Counsel has failed to prove that the Sea Hawk decision resulted in the layoff of "approximately 100 employees" as alleged. At best, if anything was lost, considering the evidence that Bolling Green and not Cedar Rapids was the established manufacturing site for most of FMC's pedestal cranes, and Cedar Rapids, the headquarters of division engineering, was the site for prototype production, it was the loss of work on the manufacture of one prototype crane. Employees were informed that only one Sea Hawk prototype model would be built there. Therefore, the most that would be lost would be the 500 standard man-hours or, given Bolling Green's 85-percent productivity level, approximately 565 actual man-hours of work.[8]

The evidence also indicates that because of the lower cost of production at Bolling Green, it was more economical to produce Sea Hawk there than at Cedar Rapids. The General Counsel's contention that the decision to place the Sea Hawk production in Bolling Green was in retaliation for the Union's failure to agree to concessions, which will be discussed later in this decision, is, inter alia, rebutted by the evidence that the concession [5] Neither McCafferty nor Foster testified at the hearing.

[6] The proposed building schedule indicates that a prototype was to be completed by June 1, and that seven machines were to be shipped by February 28, 1983.

[7] It should be noted that at the time of the decision to manufacture the Sea Hawk in Bolling Green the manufacture of the prototype had not begun in Cedar Rapids. Wage rates in Bolling Green were roughly $3.50 per hour less than in Cedar Rapids.

[8] I do not consider such a loss to be a significant detriment to employees as required in the cases cited supra.

discussions continued for at least four more sessions (April 7, 8, 12, and 15) after Price announced the decision to produce Sea Hawk at Bolling Green. There is also evidence that at the time of the decision, plant management at Cedar Rapids was actively engaged in seeking FMC and non-FMC contracts for the Cedar Rapids plant.

In sum, we have here a decision to build a new product line at a particular location rather than at another, rather than a transfer of bargaining unit work, despite the expectations and preparations without any actual production and at most a de minimis effect on the bargaining unit employees. In the circumstances, I find that there was no duty to bargain over the decision to manufacture the Sea Hawk crane at Respondent's Bolling Green plant and, accordingly, I shall recommend the dismissal of those allegations of the complaint.

C. The Alleged 8(a)(1) and (3) Allegations Concerning the Sea Hawk Decision

According to the evidence, the Sea Hawk decision did not result in any employee terminations, denials of reinstatements, or effects on the bargaining unit employees, as was the case in Milwaukee Spring, supra. Accordingly, in agreement with the Respondent, I find that the consequences of this Sea Hawk decision on unit employees were "either totally speculative and immeasurable or de minimis." Moreover, the employer's decision in Milwaukee Spring, supra, though one based on economics, was influenced almost entirely by the lower labor rates at the nonunion facility. The Board held that, for that reason, the relocation constituted a repudiation of a negotiated wage schedule. In the instant case, however, lower wage rates was one of many factors influencing the decision of Division Manager Price[9] who testified that higher productivity and lower scrap costs at Bolling Green were significant considerations as was Bolling Green's established expertise as the principal pedestal crane manufacturing site and his fear that layoffs at Bolling Green would lead to permanent loss of skilled employees to other local enterprises. In other words, lower labor rates was only one of many reasons that Bolling Green was selected over Cedar Rapids.

D. The Alleged Retaliatory Motive for not Agreeing to Concessions

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) in that the Sea Hawk decision was made in reprisal for the Union's failure to agree to concessions. As previously mentioned, employees of Respondent's facilities in Bolling Green and Lexington accepted the concessions that the employees at Cedar Rapids rejected. Price admitted that the request for concession emanated from him, that he received periodic reports from J. D. Lewis concerning the status of negotiations of Cedar Rapids, that he was very disappointed that Cedar Rapids' employees refused what other employees accepted, and that the disparity in wage rates was a factor in the ultimate decision to produce the Sea Hawk in Bolling Green. Price, however, denied any connection among the concessions, negotiations, and decision. Price testified that he made the decision during the week of March 23, that the Union flatly rejected any economic concessions on March 26, and that the decision was communicated to Bolling Green officials during the week of March 29. In sum, the General Counsel contends that the Company's articulated business reasons are a pretext to camouflage the Company's retaliatory motive. That contention is based almost entirely on the timing of Price's decision in relation to apparently stalemated concession meetings. The evidence also shows however, that at the same time that Price made the Sea Hawk decision, other of Respondent's managers were making efforts to bring work into Cedar Rapids from other companies and FMC divisions. Union witness Dusil testified that he attended the April 7 meeting and that McCafferty spoke about his efforts to bring work from other companies including Gardner-Denver, and that at that time the Company had decided not to produce the Sea Hawk in Cedar Rapids. When such alleged retaliatory treatment of employees is coupled with evidence of favorable or beneficial conduct Board cases have held no reprisal was involved. See Service Spring Co., 263 NLRB 812 (1982); Rice Food Markets, 255 NLRB 884 (1981). I am constrained to conclude that the General Counsel's alleged retaliation against the Union for refusing to agree to concessions was the motive behind the Sea Hawk decision must fall in view of the evidence that the Respondent made efforts at the same time of the Sea Hawk decision to secure work for its Cedar Rapids plants.

As for the interrogation by foremen and other supervisors and other statements concerning connecting the Sea Hawk decision with the Union's refusal to agree to concessions, I am not persuaded that Respondent either authorized or condoned such lower echelon people to make such statements nor do I believe that the remarks truly reflected Respondent's reasons for its Sea Hawk decision. Moreover, the lower echelon supervisory personnel were as anxious to have the Sea Hawk built in Cedar Rapids to protect their own jobs as were the rank-and-file employees. I view their remarks as merely expressing their individual opinions as well as indicating their frustrations over the decision to build the Sea Hawk in Bolling Green and not Cedar Rapids. I shall therefore recommend the dismissal of the 8(a)(3) allegation with respect to the interrogations and remarks by the supervisory personnel concerning the Sea Hawk decision.

1. The concession meetings

On or about March 23, Respondent instituted a wage freeze and benefits reduction for salaried employees at all plants and for hourly employees at Bolling Green and Lexington, Kentucky. Such became effective on April 1. At the same time Respondent sought the comparable, economic, and certain noneconomic changes from the Union for both the Cedar Rapids and Woodstock, Canada plants. An initial eight-point proposal was prepared by J. D. Lewis, Cedar Rapids' director of personnel, and presented by him at the outset of concession meetings. The first three proposals were purely economic and involved freezes on wages and "COLA" and the elimination of personal days off. The balance of the request involved noneconomic issues effecting plant productivity. The concession meetings took place in seven separate sessions from March 26 through April 15.

[9] Price testified in a positive and unhesitant manner. The fact that he was no longer employed by FMC places him in a category of a somewhat disinterested witness. His testimony was not controverted but rather supported by other evidence of record which influences favorably his credibility.

Respondent and the Union have been parties to successive bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective by its terms from April 1, 1981, until April 1, 1984. The agreement applies to employees employed at two plants located in Cedar Rapids.

2. The March 26 meeting

On March 26 a meeting was held between representatives of the Respondent and the Union. The Union was informed the sales prospects were bleak and that concessions were necessary in order for the Cedar Rapids facility to compete with other clients within the corporation and with outside competitors. At the conclusion of the meeting, Respondent proposed, and the Union agreed, the Respondent be permitted to meet with the employees and inform them of conditions in the marketplace. At no time did the Union agree that Respondent could meet directly with employees to discuss proposed concessions and contract modifications. Bill Stewart, the Union's International representative, informed Respondent's representatives that in the absence of financial data disclosing the need for concessions, the Union would not discuss economic matters further but would be willing to discuss noneconomic matters.

In attendance at that meeting, besides Bill Stewart, was James Hurtt, then local president of the Union, who acted as chief spokesman for the union negotiating committee. Stewart appeared at the first meeting and at the final meeting only. J. D. Lewis acted as the principal company spokesman at all the meetings. Also present on behalf of Respondent was Ronald Weaver, division manager of manufacturing. Lewis and Weaver spoke initially about the cost-saving instituted for salary and nonunion hourly employees and the glum outlook facing both the Company and its industry. Lewis then stated that the Company was seeking comparable concessions at Cedar Rapids. Stewart responded saying that when companies request concessions, it is the UAW policy and practice to request financial information supporting the need for same. Steward then requested it. Lewis replied that FMC was not asking for concessions because it could not afford to meet the contract terms, that if the Union did not agree to economic concessions, the Company "would honor the contract" and further, if the Union preferred to talk about noneconomic matters, the Company would do that instead. That remained the Company's position with respect to financial information throughout concession meetings.

Stewart asked if the Company would consider certain quid pro quos for concessions and mentioned such matters as profit sharing, a layoff moratorium, and a guarantee that work not be transferred from Cedar Rapids in the future. Lewis repeated that the Company was not interested in reopening the collective-bargaining agreement, but, instead, sought to obtain temporary economic and noneconomic relief in order to make Cedar Rapids competitive. That remained the Company's position with respect to similar union requests at all subsequent meetings.

3. The March 29 meeting

Lewis reviewed the eight-point concession proposal and then discussed the relatively sudden increase and available operating capacity at Bolling Green due to order cancellations and its implications for the higher cost and less efficient Cedar Rapids plant.[10]

4. The meetings of March 30 and April 7, 8, 12, and 15

The meetings after March 29 followed somewhat the same pattern as the earlier meetings without reaching agreement on any of the concession requests or other matters. The Union refused to deviate in any respect from the contract and the Company refused to entertain requests for financial information or to expand discussions to include fringe benefits such as profit sharing, early retirement, or a moratorium on layoffs and transfers.

After the March 30 meeting, the Union at the Company's request agreed to and distributed to its members copies of FMC's modified five-point concession proposal. The Union did not bring this proposal to a membership vote.

5. The alleged refusal to bargain in good faith during concession meetings

The complaint in Case 18–CA–7654 alleges, in effect, that Respondent's overall conduct, and particularly its refusal to provide relevant financial information and to consider the Union's proposals, constitute the type of bad-faith bargaining prohibited under Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Section 8(d) of the Act expressly relieves both parties to a collective-bargaining agreement of any obligation to bargain concerning modifications that are to be effective prior to expiration of the agreement. In the instant case, Respondent, during the first year of a 3-year agreement,

[10] The Union never asked for any financial information or other data to buttress the comparisons that McCafferty made at that meeting between the costs at Bolling Green and Lexington and Cedar Rapids. However, Union President Hurtt questioned the statements or stressed that the Kentucky plants were nonunion and naturally less costly for that reason. Hurtt then referred to recent Ford and General Motors settlements asking whether the Company would negotiate over profit-sharing and similar matters and suggested the Company undertake further cutbacks in its salaried work force. Lewis declined. Lewis then said the contract was still in effect and would not expire until April 1984. The Union then repeated its request for general financial information and Lewis again refused stating that the books would not be opened and that there would not be any opening of the contract. He further stated that to open books was saying that they cannot financially meet their obligations under the contract and that the Respondent was not saying that, that they could meet their financial obligations under the contract and that was not the issue at hand.

On either March 29 or the day after the Respondent altered its eight-point concession proposal and presented a five-point proposal instead. It modified its wage freeze proposal and three of the productivity requests.

proposed that the Union accept certain concessions and contract modifications. The Union, of course, could have refused to consider or discuss such matters. However, faced with representations that concessions were necessary for survival and to remain competitive, the Union met with Respondent and seriously considered its proposal. Respondent refused, however, to provide the Union with what the General Counsel considers the information necessary and relevant to the Union's evaluation of Respondent's claims. The Respondent, on the other hand, stated its position clearly and emphatically that it could afford to continue with the existing contract and that the financial condition of the Cedar Rapids plants was not relevant and, accordingly, refused to provide the financial information requested by the Union.

I am persuaded by the evidence that the Company acted with as much "good faith" as the Union. With respect to the allegation of surface bargaining, the evidence shows that seven separate concession meetings were held within less than a 3-week period and apparently all but one were considerably lengthy. The International representative was invited by the Company to attend and did participate in the first and last meetings. An examination of the transcribed minutes of these meetings shows that each party listened to the concerns about concession proposals of the other. The Union discussed the 4-day work schedule, the pay raise for and layoffs among the salaried work force, the staffing and performance of the Cedar Rapids personnel department, and the number of arbitration cases, among other things. The Company modified its original concession list and agreed to discuss only noneconomic issues and, when the Union asked, the Company committed itself to reconsider its position on short-term concessions if such were granted and business then improved. The meetings appeared to be conciliatory, open, and responsive throughout. If agreement were possible, it appears that both were seeking it.

It is true that the Company did not agree to union proposals with respect to early retirement, profit sharing, and job security. And the Union refused to accept any of the Company's original or modified concession proposals or to put the proposals to a membership vote. Each party continually reminded the other that the contract was the law. In the circumstances, I believe that there was a full and fair airing of a wide variety of subjects at the concession meetings and despite the absence of agreement on any proposal advanced by either party, substantive good faith prevailed. I therefore will recommend dismissal of those allegations of the complaint alleging bad-faith bargaining on the part of Respondent.

The contention that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to provide the Union with division financial information it requested as soon as the Company asked for concessions is also unsupported by the evidence.

The record shows that Respondent has never claimed "inability to pay" or any financial impediment to meeting its contractual commitments. Rather, from the beginning, Company Negotiator Lewis consistently reassured the Union that it could afford to meet its contract obligations and would honor them even if its concession efforts failed. Moreover, Company Representative McCafferty, in a session on April 15, provided specific evidence of the Company's ability to pay when he said that the division had earned approximately $500,000 in fiscal 1981. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956).

What was relevant, however, was the data presented by the Company to support the Company's unfavorable comparison of Cedar Rapids productivity, quality control, and other costs with the Bolling Green and Lexington plants. However, the Company's claims in that regard did not precipitate any information or request from the Union. The Union merely argued the validity of the comparison or excused them on the grounds of any advantage the Kentucky plants possess is attributable to their nonunion status. The Union did not seek the kind of information truly relevant to the issues under discussion.

I am persuaded, therefore, that the complaint allegations alleging that the Company refused to provide the Union relevant financial information violated Section 8(a)(5) should be dismissed and I shall so recommend.

6. The alleged bypassing

The complaint in Case 18–CA–7654 alleges that the Company bypassed the Union by threatening employees or questioning them with respect to their attitude toward concession proposals. The General Counsel contends the Respondent bypassed the Union and took its case directly to its employees, and interrogated and threatened them concerning the proposed concessions and contract modifications. It further contends that Respondent's overall conduct and particularly its refusal to provide relevant financial information and to consider the Union's proposals constitute the type of bad-faith bargaining prohibited under Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The General Counsel cites Goodyear Aerospace Corp., 204 NLRB 831 (1973), enfd. in part 497 F.2d 747 (6th Cir. 1974), stating that the material facts in Goodyear are in virtually all respects identical to the facts herein.

I disagree. In that case, the employer proposed midterm concessions and contract modifications; claimed that it was not competitive because of its relatively high labor costs; refused to supply any financial information to document its claim; and dealt directly with and threatened its employees with regard to the proposed concessions. In those circumstances, the Board concluded: "Where, as here, a party proposes an unsettling change during the contract term, he indicates a desire not to hold firm to the terms and conditions of the contract, at least with respect to the change. In this situation there is no reason for not requiring him to fulfill his normal bargaining obligation about the proposal which he himself initiated, if the other party requests it." 204 NLRB at 832.

Unlike Goodyear, the Respondent in the instant case did not indicate a desire not to hold firm to the terms and conditions of the contract but did just the opposite. It stated that it could and would meet the conditions of the contract if the union refused to grant the concessions. In Goodyear, in view of the employer's statement that it could no longer afford the higher labor costs, the financial information to support the employer's position was indeed relevant and necessary to the Union in the bargaining process. The Employer's normal bargaining obligations do not include a duty to provide irrelevant information.

The evidence shows that employee meetings were not unusual at the Cedar Rapids plants and that particular meetings in question took place only after concession proposals were presented to and thoroughly discussed with the Union and after the Company had informed the Union of its intention to meet with employees and to obtain the Union's agreement and encouragement. Moreover, one or more union officers were invited to and did attend every meeting to listen and monitor what took place.

The General Counsel's position is that although the meetings between the company officials and the employees are not alleged as unlawful bypassing in the complaints, the record evidence summarized here is important in determining whether Respondent bargained in bad-faith concerning the proposed concessions and contract modifications. The General Counsel further contends that that does not however, preclude a finding that Respondent in fact bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees. To offset Respondent's contention that the presence of employer officers of the local union precludes such a finding the General Counsel cites the letter sent by the Union President Hurtt as expressing the Union's vigorous opposition to the Company's conduct.[11]

I do not agree with the General Counsel that the manner in which the Company planned and held employee meetings, its solicitation of union cooperation and the Union's presence at those meetings supports the complaint allegation of bad faith on the part of Respondent. I shall therefore recommend dismissal of those allegations. Moreover, I do not find any "by-passing."

7. Case 18–CA–7971 and the 10(b) issue

On May 24, the union committee was informed that a decision to transfer parts and fixtures in connection with its decision to transfer work on its small crawler crane line from Cedar Rapids to Kentucky had been reached and would be implemented within the month. On being so informed, Local President Hurtt immediately served notice on Respondent that he would grieve and file NLRB charges. He said that the transfer violated the parties' letter of agreement regarding subcontracting, that the Union would grieve the action and file NLRB charges. On June 3 the Union did grieve. On June 21, the Union also sought and obtained ex parte a temporary restraining order prohibiting the transfer of tooling, fixtures, and parts from Cedar Rapids. However, the Union did not file a charge with the NLRB until December 1, 6 months and 6 days after the day that it had been informed of the transfer.

Respondent's decision was announced by Ron Weaver at a company-union meeting held May 24. He read a letter from Group Operations Manager Smith, dated May 20, as follows:

> With the next (non-division) structure basically in place, we are now proceeding to implement some of the concepts recommended by the task force. Within the next 30 days, we will move assembly operations of the small cable crawlers to the Bolling Green plant; fabrication, welding, and related machining operations to the Lexington plant with much of the gear and shaft operations remaining at the Cedar Rapids plant.

Weaver then stated that the transfer of parts ultimately to be fabricated, welded, and assembled would commence on June 21, and on the same day, due to continued poor business conditions, a plant shutdown of approximately 4 to 6 weeks' duration would begin. According to Weaver's testimony the June 21 date for both shutdown and parts transfer was intentionally coincident in order to accomplish the latter with minimum disruption from what otherwise would be normal plant activities. Weaver also stated that he anticipated that machining or manufacturing of gears and shafts, then being performed at all plants, eventually would be centralized at Cedar Rapids.

At no time since the announcement on May 24 has the Union orally requested bargaining about the decision or the possible effects thereof on the unit. On June 3, Local President Hurtt gave Weaver a letter with a four-page questionnaire form attached. The letter stated that the Company had violated the contract and purported to seek "effects" bargaining. Beginning June 20, William Holz, labor relations manager, responded to the letter and to other informational requests. Holz delivered to the Union much data and explanatory cover material in response to the Union's request.

on June 29, after hearing, the TRO was dissolved and the transfer of fixtures and parts resumed. The plant shutdown caused by general economic conditions ended in the first week of August and employees laid off as a result were recalled. Through October 1, the work force continued to build small cranes in accordance with the established production schedule, and Cedar Rapids continued to fabricate gears and other parts to the end of the year. However, in the last quarter of 1982, Bolling Green assembled five small crawler cranes, each of which required 200 standard labor hours.

[11] There is in evidence, G.C. Exh. 11, a letter dated March 31 from "Jim J. Hurtt, UAW President," to "Bob Price" that reads as follows:

Dear Bob:

This is to serve official notice to FMC Crane and Excavator Division of the Union's Notice to Terminate the Companys [sic] dealing directly to [sic] our union membership. The Company is trying to renegotiate contract language and benefit by acting to undermind [sic] the representing union UAW, Local 299. We demand this repatitish manor [sic] be stopped immediately.

Also the company has made comments of a threatening nature to our membership of cheaper labor costs and routing of work on a comparison of non-union FMC plants. We will reserve the legal rights [sic] to pursue this action in a manor [sic] of not freedom of speech but damaging to union and company. N.L.R.B. Section 8(a)(5), 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1).

Apparently, though not entirely clear, the above letter was making reference to Respondent's conduct at the meetings. There is no evidence the union representatives who attended made any protests to Respondent's representatives at the time the alleged conduct was taking place.

8. Conclusions with respect to the 10(b) issue

It is well established that the Board and courts have held that the 6-month statute of limitations in 10(b) starts to run on the date the union (or employee) is fully and fairly informed of the facts that give rise to the alleged unlawful conduct. Southeastern Michigan Gas Co., 198 NLRB 1221 (1972), enfd. 485 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir. 1973). As previously stated, the Union first learned of the relocation at a meeting held on May 24. The actual relocation of work commenced on June 21. The charge involving the relocation of the small crawler cranes was filed on December 1.

According to the General Counsel, the 10(b) period commenced on June 21 and not on May 24 as contended by Respondent. The General Counsel relies, inter alia, on Farmingdale Iron Works, 249 NLRB 98, 99 (1980), to support its contention that in 8(d) cases generally, it is the act and not the announcement of the act that triggers the commencement of the 10(b) period. In Farmingdale however, the act and not the announcement became the starting point because the announcement was not clear and unequivocal. Here however, and the record is clear, on May 24, the union committee was clearly and unequivocally informed that a decision to transfer parts and fixtures from Cedar Rapids to Kentucky had been reached and would be implemented within the month. Union President Hurtt understood precisely what was said and its implications because he immediately served notice on the Company that he would grieve and file NLRB charges. Not only did the Union know of facts that could support a charge but acted on that knowledge with every apparent intention of filing one. Notwithstanding, nothing was done until after 6 months from the announcement of the decision. The TRO proceeding commenced; the arbitration was heard; and only after that, on December 1, did the Union file its charge. In addition, there was no obligation to furnish the Union with information with respect to the parts transfer because that bargaining obligation was subsidiary to and dependent on the existence of an obligation to bargain about the decision itself. Accordingly, if indeed a bargaining obligation did arise, it arose with the announcement of a company decision on May 24, a date beyond the 10(b) period.

In the circumstances, the informational delay and related allegations in the complaint cannot revive a legally defunct charge. I will therefore recommend dismissing the complaint allegations based on the language of the December 1 charge as untimely under Section 10(b) as well as other allegations in the complaint deriving from that charge including the informational delay and related allegations in the complaint and the allegation that the parts transfer was in retaliation for the Union's failure to agree to concessions a year earlier. That allegation was never made a subject of a timely charge and therefore it too must be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent has not violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

3. The charge filed with regard to the relocation of the small crawler crane and the complaint based thereon are barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

James L. Fox, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Richard H. Schnadig (Vedder, Price, Kaufman & Kammholz), of Chicago, Illinois, for the Respondent.
Jerome Schur, Esq. (Katz, Friedman, Schur & Eagle), of Chicago, Illinois, for the Charging Party.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. By Order dated 30 October 1985, I was designated to supplement the findings and conclusions of the 23 October 1983 decision of Administrative Law Judge George Norman (now retired), in accordance with the Board's remand order of 6 July 1984.

I conducted a telephonic pretrial conference on 15 November 1985, the parties filed statements of position in January 1986 about the issues to be decided, and Respondent filed a motion to dismiss on 19 December 1985, alleging mootness based on the expiration of the labor agreement, the permanent closure of the plant, and a 1 March 1985 termination agreement incorporating "a complete understanding by the parties concerning the shutdown [of the plant], employee termination and the effects of both." The agreement and the other factual assertions of the motion are undisputed and are made a part of the record for purposes of this supplemental decision. With this exception, the findings and conclusions herein are made on the existing record and briefs. Credibility resolutions are made, of course, without consideration of witness demeanor.

1. The Motion to Dismiss: Respondent seeks dismissal on grounds of mootness, based on uncontroverted facts occurring subsequent to the 1983 hearing. In remanding these cases, the Board expressed the "opinion that a full disposition of the issues in this proceeding [including those held in abeyance] requires additional factual and legal findings." Given such explicit, limiting instructions, I am without authority to entertain the motion. Nevertheless, the termination agreement and other factual assertions concerning expiration of the contract and plant closure have been received in evidence, to permit the Board, if it is so disposed, to consider Respondent's mootness contention.

2. The 8(a)(1) Allegations in Case 18-CA-7654: (a) Paragraph 5(a) of the complaint alleges that Plant Manager McCafferty, at a meeting of employees, threatened a loss of existing jobs if concessions were not accepted. The only witness to support this allegation, former Steward Brundrett, was uncertain whether the threat was made by McCafferty or by Division Manager Weaver. Both admittedly are supervisors. None of the other nine witnesses called by the General Counsel to testify about those meetings confirmed Brundrett's testimony of a threat. Indeed, one such witness, Dusil, testified that no such threat was made. Based on the record evidence alone, I am unable to creidt the testimony of Brundrett for the reasons that it is vague, uncertain, and totally unsupported in this respect by any other witness called by the General Counsel. Accordingly, paragraph 5(a) of the complaint is dismissed for want of evidence.

(b) Paragraph 5(b) of the complaint alleges that Powers unlawfully interrogated employees concerning their position on concessions and unlawfully threatened loss of jobs. The latter is unsupported by any testimony and is dismissed for want of evidence. Brundrett testified that such an inquiry was made of him by Powers, who, admittedly, is a supervisor. Powers, employed elsewhere at the time of the hearing, did not testify. There is no reason to discredit Brundrett's version of this one-on-one conversation with a company supervisor. It was an innocuous question—what did the "guys out in the shop" think of the concessions—and was combined with an opinion by Powers that the salaried employees were making greater concessions than the hourly employees. Brundrett's response—that it would destroy the Union and was one-sided—indicates that Brundrett certainly was not intimidated by the inquiry, but this, of course, is irrelevant. Tested objectively, the interrogation was coercive in nature and, hence, violative of the Act.

(c) Paragraph 5(c) alleges that Chesmore unlawfully interrogated employees concerning their position on concessions and threatened them with loss of work. Chesmore admittedly is a supervisor. Employee Campbell testified that he and several other employees were asked by Chesmore what they thought of the concessions and that Chesmore was afraid the facility might lose the Sea Hawk project. None of the other coworkers was called to testify. Chesmore denied making the inquiry, but admitted that he and other foremen were instructed to learn employee sentiment. I credit Campbell's testimony, despite its vagueness about the details of the inquiry and other remarks and, on this record, find that the inquiry was violative of the Act despite its informal nature. As I stated above, the question, viewed objectively, was a coercive one. Moreover, I find that Chesmore's remarks, in response to a general employee question, that "the Company could shut the door Monday morning if it wanted to" and that he was "afraid we would lose the Seahawk project," are sufficiently suggestive of a threat of loss of jobs if concessions were not agreed to, as to constitute an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

(d) Paragraph 5(d) alleges that Klingman, admittedly a supervisor, interrogated employees concerning their positions on concessions. Employee Feiereisen testified without contradiction that Klingman "asked . . . what I thought . . . was the feelings of the employees about the concessions." Tested objectively, the question constitutes a coercive, and thus unlawful, interrogation.

(e) Paragraph 5(e) alleges that Uldrich, admittedly a supervisor, threatened employees with loss of work if concessions were not agreed to. Employee Rhoads was the General Counsel's only witness. He testified that he and two other employees were urged to vote for the concessions and that, later, he overheard Uldrich say to two other supervisors that the Sea Hawk crane would be built elsewhere unless concessions were granted. Although the remark was not addressed to Rhoads and not intended to be heard by him, he interjected, "at least we'll get to build a prototype." He testified that Rhoads replied, "No, it goes south, too." Uldrich denied the latter conversation (the only one alleged as a violation) and the General Counsel did not call any of the other participants. Under the circumstances, I cannot find that a threat was made, in the absence of corroborating testimony. But, even assuming the statement to have been made, it does not constitute a violation. The conversation during which the statement was made was a private one, between supervisors in a supervisor's office. It was not intended for employee consumption. The fact that it was overheard by a unit employee who voluntarily entered the office in the midst of the conversation does not convert an otherwise lawful statement into an unlawful threat of loss of employment. This allegation is dismissed.

(f) Paragraph 5(f) alleges that Hootman, admittedly a supervisor, unlawfully interrogated an employee concerning his and other employees' views on concessions and threatened him with loss of employment if concessions were not accepted. Brundrett testified that Hootman asked him on 5 April what he thought about the concessions. Brundrett "believed" Hootman also said: "If we wanted to protect our jobs we probably ought to accept those concessions"; there was insufficient work for all the Company's plants; and (after reviewing his affidavit), "if we wanted that contract we'd probably better make the concessions." I am unable to credit Brundrett's testimony. Again, it was too vague and unconvincing to carry the General Counsel's burden. Clearly, Brundrett was confusing several different conversations with more than one supervisor. Clearly, he was unsure what was said by Hootman and, clearly, he used his affidavit as a prop, rather than as a refresher. This alone tends to destroy any confidence in his testimony. Accordingly, this allegation must be dismissed for want of proof.

(g) Paragraph 5(g) of the complaint alleges that Wolfe, admittedly a supervisor, threatened employees with loss of jobs if concessions were not granted. Employee Brown testified that, on 6 April, Wolfe came into his work area, slammed some doors, and said, "You guys have done it now. You didn't take those concessions, and now we are going to move [the work] out of cedar Rapids," and "It won't make any difference anyway. They are going to close the plant within 30 days." Another employee who was present was not called by the General Counsel. Wolfe could not recall making such statements, but, as chief steward for 8 years, Wolfe testified he was aware that threats were unlawful. On this record, I have no basis for not crediting the testimony of Brown. Wolfe's remarks clearly reflected his frustration about deteriorating business conditions at the plant. Nevertheless, when taken in context, they amounted to an explicit threat that jobs would be lost unless concessions were granted to the Company and, thus, were violative of Section 8(a)(1).

3. The 8(a)(5) and (1) Allegations in Case 18–CA–7971: In its remand order, the Board noted that, in Case 18–

CA-7971, Judge Norman "did not fully address the factual and legal aspects of the Union's requests to bargain about the effects of the transfer decision . . . or to provide certain requested information in that case and Respondent's compliance therewith." The Board ordered that specific factual and legal findings be made (1) "regarding Respondent's alleged refusal to bargain about the effects of its decision to transfer work" and (2) its alleged refusal to provide certain requested information, including, but not limited to, the relevance of the information requested and the degree to which Respondent complied with this request."

(a) Effects Bargaining: First, it should be noted that the remand order seeks further findings only with regard to the effects bargaining allegations of paragraph 10 of the complaint. Further findings about the decision bargaining allegations of the same paragraph are not encompassed in the Order.

Second, it should be noted that the relevant facts about effects bargaining are not in dispute. The decision to relocate was announced at a company-union meeting on 24 May 1982. The Union announced that it would grieve the action and file an unfair labor practice charge. A grievance was filed on 3 June and denied on 20 December. A restraining order was obtained by the Union in the district court on 21 June and was dissolved on 29 June. The charge was filed on 1 December, more than 6 months after the initial announcement. Admittedly, a written request for effects bargaining was made by letter dated 2 June and, by letter dated 6 August, the Company replied that it was ready at the Union's request "to discuss any other subject that relates to the transfer of work and which has impact on the bargaining unit personnel." There is no evidence of any further union request, oral or written, and, admittedly, no effects bargaining was conducted. Counsel do not suggest what further findings might be appropriate under the Board's remand order.

Because the issue of whether an obligation existed to engage in effects bargaining is closely intertwined with, and dependent on, the decision bargaining issue that the Board has held in abeyance, I am unable to make conclusions of law at this time.

(b) Request for Information: Approximately 61 individual requests for information were submitted by the Union, and the Company provided voluminous documents in response. The posthearing briefs of the parties do not address the items individually, the relevance of each, or the adequacy or inadequacy of each piece of information provided. The General Counsel treats the information issue only by way of footnote, noting that "Although Respondent ultimately furnished some of the requested information . . . the relocation [of the work] already has been consummated," but failing to discuss any particular request or response. Respondent comments only that "It is beyond the scope of this brief and the reader's endurance to attempt a detailed analysis of the propriety and relevance of each of the [61] questions originally propounded by the Union in its June 2, 1982 letter." The Charging Party's brief (as supplemented on 8 January 1986) makes only limited reference to individual items of requested information. Presumably counsel have recognized that the posture of this case, both at the time of the hearing and at present, does not warrant the time and expense of preparing the type of detailed analysis that would be essential to the factfinder. I am reluctant, at this late date in the proceeding, to direct counsel to prepare such an analysis and, not having presided over the receipt of this voluminous documentary evidence, I am unable to do the analysis apparently directed by the Board.

In addition, I take note of the fact that almost 4 years have lapsed since the decision to relocate; that the contract expired in 1985; that the Cedar Rapids plant has been permanently closed since June 1984; and that the Union and the Company have entered into a termination agreement on 1 March 1985 encompassing severence pay and benefits of unit employees. Under these circumstances, I do not believe the Board intended to require the kind of detailed analysis of the information requested and provided, which its Order appears to suggest.[1]

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On November 12, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Parties filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions. The General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and limited exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's limited exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified, but not to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

1. We agree with the judge that Hank Plumlee was not a supervisor. However, we do not rely on the judge's differentiation between Hank Plumlee's status before and after May 15, 1986. Although the Respondent asserts that Plumlee had the authority to make hiring decisions, the record indicates that Plumlee, as well as other employees, could suggest persons for employment, but it fails to show that the Respondent invested Plumlee with the discretion to make hiring decisions or to exercise independent judgment in any other area. We conclude that the record as a whole fails to establish that Hank Plumlee was a supervisor before or after May 15, 1986.

On July 1, 1986, Hank Plumlee arrived at the construction trailer at 6:30 a.m. As he entered the trailer, President Saum said he had caught Randy Gosseen pilfering company property that morning, and that charges were being pressed. Plumlee turned to leave the trailer to begin work and Saum said, "Yeah, get out there and bust your ass and . . . if you don't think you can handle the heat of that . . . just hit the fucking road." Plumlee told Saum not to "hard ass" him, and to fire him if that is what he wanted to do. Plumlee then indicated he was quitting by walking over to the desk and putting down his keys. Saum asked Plumlee if he was quitting, and Plumlee walked to the door. Saum told Plumlee to leave the hardhat, and asked Superintendent Lakey to go with Plumlee to remove any of the Respondent's property from Plumlee's pickup truck.

The judge found that new, albeit unspecified, working conditions were imposed on Plumlee and were intended to be so unpleasant as to cause him to quit. The Respondent excepts to the judge's finding that Hank Plumlee was constructively dis-

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In her limited exceptions, the General Counsel notes several inadvertent errors in the judge's decision. We correct the judge's decision as follows. (1) The judge states that this case involves the unlawful discharge of six individuals. As is evident from the remainder of the decision, the judge found that seven individuals were unlawfully discharged and that the Respondent unlawfully failed to hire an eighth individual. (2) The judge refers to "Gosseen" passing the welding test. The reference should be to "Muse." (3) The judge states that Company President Saum told employee Muse, "[Y]ou been going to the office complaining about being harassed . . . you haven't seen harassment yet." In fact, Project Superintendent Rick Lakey made this statement.

We note that the Respondent does not except to any of the judge's 8(a)(3) termination findings. Rather, the Respondent argues that the unlawfully terminated welders' (Tom Morgan, Bob Morgan, and Jim Muse) reinstatement rights ceased because of their violation of code welding procedures. We agree with the judge's finding that this defense is pretextual and that any deviation from code was on express instruction of Rick Lakey.

[2] The judge recommended broad cease-and-desist language. However, we have considered this case in light of the standard set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), and have concluded that the narrow cease-and-desist language is appropriate. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

In her limited exceptions, the General Counsel notes that the judge found the Respondent unlawfully threatened employee Gosseen with arrest in retaliation for his union activity, as alleged in par. 6(g) of the complaint. The judge failed to include a remedy for this violation in the recommended Order and notice. We shall conform the recommended Order and notice with the judge's findings.

We agree with the judge that Parish Plumlee's May 15, 1986 layoff violated Sec. 8(a)(3). To remedy this violation the judge ordered that Parish Plumlee be made whole for any loss of wages or benefits resulting from the discrimination, but failed to provide him with reinstatement rights. It appears the judge decided that Plumlee's recall as a laborer for a week in July satisfied the Respondent's reinstatement obligation. The General Counsel excepts. We shall provide the traditional reinstatement remedy and leave to compliance whether Parish Plumlee's job as a pipefitter's helper existed at the time of his recall and, if not, whether his recall as a laborer was substantially equivalent to his former position.

Regarding the representation case, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to direct the Regional Director to open and count the ballots of the six employees found to be eligible and, thereafter, to issue the appropriate certification. Because the Respondent's objections are overruled and the Union filed no objections, we will not set aside the election results.

In the absence of exceptions, we pro forma adopt the judge's rulings on the challenged ballots.

charged in violation of Section 8(a)(3). We find merit in the Respondent's exception.

The Board has held that a constructive discharge occurs when an employee quits because an employer has deliberately made working conditions unbearable. Keller Mfg. Co., 237 NLRB 712 (1978). Two elements must be proven to establish a constructive discharge. First, the burdens imposed on the employee must cause, and be intended to cause, a change in working conditions so difficult or unpleasant as to force the employee to resign. Second, it must be shown that those burdens were imposed because of the employee's union activities. Crystal Princeton Refining Co., 222 NLRB 1068, 1069 (1976).

We find that the facts fail to demonstrate that the Respondent imposed conditions on Hank Plumlee that were so intolerable as to force him to resign. Unlike the judge, we find that Saum's statement to Hank Plumlee—"Yeah, get out there and bust your ass and . . . if you don't think you can handle the heat of that . . . just hit the fucking road"—although demeaning, did not change Plumlee's work circumstances. See Algreco Sportswear Co., 271 NLRB 499 (1984). Saum's statement may well be a threat to impose onerous working conditions, but "[a] threat is not the equivalent of the actual imposition of unlawful conditions of employment; it does not in any meaningful sense render the conditions of employment so intolerable as to compel an employee to leave his job." Central Casket Co., 225 NLRB 362, 363 (1976). Because we cannot find that any new conditions were imposed on Plumlee,[3] we conclude that he was not constructively discharged and is not entitled to reinstatement and backpay.

2. In her limited exceptions, the General Counsel argues that the judge erred by not finding an additional 8(a)(3) violation because the Respondent conditioned Jim Muse's reemployment on his dropping his unfair labor practice charges. We do not agree with the General Counsel that the Respondent's offer to reinstate Muse on the condition that he drop his unfair labor practice charges constituted a separate violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Rather, we find that this statement was a conditional offer of reinstatement, made in the context of settlement negotiations with employee Muse. Muse was free to accept or refuse this settlement offer. He chose to pursue his rights under Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The Respondent's conditional settlement offer, however, does not satisfy its obligation to offer the unlawfully discharged Muse full and unconditional reinstatement, nor does the offer toll the Respondent's backpay obligation.[4]

[3] In this respect, we find the case is distinguishable from K & S Circuits, 255 NLRB 1270 (1981), cited by the judge, in which the respondent actually imposed onerous working conditions on the employees found to be constructively discharged.

[4] Member Cracraft agrees with her colleagues that the Respondent's conditional reinstatement offer did not satisfy its remedial obligations; she finds it unnecessary to reach the issue of whether the offer itself violated the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Adscon, Inc., Renton, Washington, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating employees regarding their own union activity and the union activity of other employees.

(b) Threatening to discharge employees because of their union activity.

(c) Telling employees that the Company will prolong negotiations and will never sign a contract with the Union.

(d) Threatening employees with a reduction in wages if they vote for the Union.

(e) Threatening to contract out work if the employees vote for the Union.

(f) Creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activity.

(g) Withholding pay increases because of the advent of the Union.

(h) Threatening to close the fabrication shop if the Union is voted in.

(i) Imposing more onerous working conditions on employees because the Union was voted in.

(j) Telling employees that they will be blacklisted because of their union activity.

(k) Refusing to hire employees because of their union affiliation.

(l) Discharging and demoting employees because of their union activity.

(m) Threatening employees with arrest in retaliation for their union activities.

(n) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) To the extent it has not already done so, offer Parish Plumlee immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Offer Bob Morgan, Earl (Tom) Morgan, Jim Muse, Don Fox, Randy Gosseen, and Dean Herd

immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, in the case of Dean Herd, the job he would have been hired for or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, or that they would have been entitled to, and make them, and also Parish Plumlee, whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and refusal to hire and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that these actions will not be used against them in any way.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its main office in Renton, Washington, and in all field offices and mail a copy of the notice to each employee who was employed at the Yakima Firing Center jobsite or the fabrication shops, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 19, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent and mailed to the employees immediately upon receipt and maintained by Respondent for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Respondent's election objections are overruled and this matter is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 19 to open and count the ballots of John Sphuler, Kevin Rye, Donald Fox, Lloyd Parish Plumlee, Earl (Tom) Morgan, and Bobby Morgan and that a revised tally of ballots be prepared and served on the parties and the Regional Director shall issue the appropriate certification.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT interrogate employees regarding their own union activity and the union activity of other employees.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge employees because of their union activity.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that the Company will prolong negotiations and will never sign a contract with the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with a reduction in wages if they vote for the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten to contract out the work if the employees vote for the Union.

WE WILL NOT create the impression of surveillance of employees' union activity.

WE WILL NOT withhold pay increases because of the advent of the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten to close the fabrication shop if the Union is voted in.

WE WILL NOT impose more onerous working conditions on employees because the Union was voted in.

WE WILL NOT tell employees they will be blacklisted because of their union activity.

WE WILL NOT refuse to hire employees because of their union affiliation.

WE WILL NOT discharge and demote employees because of their union activity.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with arrest in retaliation for their union activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

To the extent we have not already done so, we will offer Parish Plumlee immediate and full reinstatement to his former job, or if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL offer Bob Morgan, Earl (Tom) Morgan, Jim Muse, Don Fox, Randy Gosseen, and Dean Herd immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, in the case of Dean Herd, the job he would have been hired for or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, or that they would have been entitled to, and make them, and also Parish Plumlee, whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharges and refusal to hire and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that these actions will not be used against them in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing regarding this matter was held before me in Yakima, Washington, between 27 January and 12 March 1987. The captioned unfair labor practice cases were filed between 9 July and 29 August 1986 by the various named individuals and by United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 598 (Union).

Pursuant to a representation petition filed by the Union on 1 May 1986 in Case 19–RC–11401, an election by secret ballot was conducted on 30 June 1986. The tally of ballots reflects that of the approximately 12 eligible employees, 5 cast ballots for the Union, 3 cast ballots against the Union, and 8 ballots were challenged. The challenged ballots are sufficient to affect the results of the election. Thereafter, the Respondent filed timely objections to the election. On 20 August 1986 the Acting Regional Director for Region 19 issued a Report on Objection and Challenged Ballots and recommended that a hearing be held to resolve the issues.

On 22 August 1986 the Acting Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated complaint and notice of consolidated hearing, which consolidated the unfair labor practice proceeding and the representation proceeding for the purpose of hearing, ruling, and decision by an administrative law judge. On 20 November 1986, the Board issued a Decision and Direction sustaining the Acting Regional Director's determination in the representation case.

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, examine, and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel, counsel for Respondent, and counsel for the Union.

On the entire record,[1] and based on my observation of the witnesses and considerations of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a State of California corporation with an office and place of business in Renton, Washington, is engaged in the construction business.

During the 12 months preceding the issuance of the complaint, in the course and conduct of its business operations, the Respondent purchased and caused to be transferred and delivered to its facilities within the State of Washington goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside the State.

It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is admitted that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The principal issues raised by the pleadings are whether the Respondent has committed various unfair labor practices during the course of a union organizational campaign, including the discharge of six individuals, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Further, challenged ballot and election objection issues in the consolidated representation proceeding are also resolved.

B. The Facts

The Respondent, a construction contractor, contracted with the Army Corps of Engineers (Corps of Engineers) to perform work at the Yakima Firing Center, an army installation near Yakima, Washington. The job involved the demolition and replacement of an outdated heating system that supplies heat and hot water to approximately 71 barracks and other buildings at the base.

[1] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct transcript is granted and is hereby made a part of the record. Also, the General Counsel's motion to correct R. Exh. 20 is granted, and the quality control reports submitted therewith, dated 12 November 1985 and 2 May 1986, are substituted in place of those two reports introduced at the hearing.

On 29 April 1986,[2] following an organizing meeting on 23 April, Union Business Manager Glenn Hickman sent the following letter to the Respondent's headquarters in Renton, Washington:

> A majority of the pipefitter/welders and pipefitter helpers on your project at the Yakima Firing Center have designated Local 598 as their representative for collective bargaining.
> I am writing to request recognition and begin bargaining.

Hank Plumlee, a journeyman pipefitter, worked for the Respondent on several Corps of Engineers projects and in various capacities since 1984. In January 1986 he was transferred from the Bonneville Dam project in Bonneville, Oregon, to the Yakima Firing Center (the base) where he remained until 1 July as pipefitter foreman.

Plumlee testified that on 1 May, Rick Lakey, project superintendent, asked Plumlee to go for a ride with him in Lakey's pickup. Lakey parked the truck in the construction area and told Plumlee that Richard Saum, Respondent's president and Lakey's uncle, had called from Seattle and said that the Company had received the aforementioned letter from the Union. Lakey asked Plumlee if he knew anything about it. Plumlee said no. Lakey said, "Well, you know how Saum feels about the union . . . he's going to come over here and . . . fire everybody . . . including you." Plumlee asked, "Well, are we fired or what?" Lakey replied, "No, he's going to come over tomorrow and do it himself." Lakey said he believed that Bob Morgan would favor the Union but that Tom Morgan[3] would not. Lakey asked whether Randy Gosseen was Union and Plumlee said "Yes, he is union." Lakey asked whether Plumlee's son, Parish Plumlee, might have called the Union, and Plumlee said he doubted it.[4]

Hank Plumlee testified that during the conversation Lakey engaged in further speculation regarding the union sympathies of certain other plumbing employees. Lakey doubted whether Roger Miller or Bruce Roybal would bring the Union in, but said that Don Fox[5] had been complaining a little bit to Bruce Roybal about not making journeyman's scale. Lakey asked if Plumlee would try to find out and let him know who had called the Union and signed cards, and said that Saum would be at the base the following day. Lakey then drove Plumlee back to where he had been working and dropped him off.

On the next day, 2 May, Lakey asked Plumlee if he had learned who called the Union. Plumlee said he had not heard anything. Lakey said he had talked to Saum. He again told Plumlee that Don Fox had been complaining to Roybal about not being paid journeyman's pay. He said that he believed Fox had to be the one causing all the trouble and that he was going to fire Fox that day.

Later that day Fox was laid off by his supervisor, Roger Miller, who told Fox that he was being temporarily laid off for about a week or so. The layoff slip he was furnished states: "Temporary layoff."[6]

Respondent maintains that Fox's layoff was caused by a temporary quarantine of certain barracks in which the plumbing crew, including Fox, had been working. The quarantine was imposed by the Corps of Engineers due to the discovery of asbestos particles in mattresses.

A Corps of Engineers' quality assurance report, dated 28 April—2 May, shows that whatever problem existed in this regard had been resolved. Thus the report expressly states that "Conditions are now we're to work in bldgs. as long as not in body contact with mattress. Regardless of signs, etc."

Roger Miller, plumbing crew foreman, testified that even though access to some of the buildings had been curtailed by the asbestos problem, nonetheless there was work to be performed in the building the crew was then working in at the time he laid off Fox, and there was access to one other building that the crew had not yet started.

Tom Morgan, a welder, was also discharged on 2 May.[7] Lakey advised Plumlee that Morgan was being laid off, and told Plumlee to sign Morgan's layoff slip, which had previously been prepared by Lakey. The slip Morgan was furnished states: "Temporary layoff."[8]

Morgan testified that on 2 May, Lakey told him he was to be laid off for "one week and one week only," and that he was to report to work in a week. Morgan reported for work a week later, as instructed, but was told to go home and to thereafter keep checking in by telephone. Three weeks later when he checked in he was told by Bob Harvey, Respondent's quality control inspector, that he was no longer needed.

Plumlee testified that at the time of Morgan's layoff Lakey said the layoff could be a week or even less. Plumlee further testified that during the months of May and June there was fabrication welding work to be done at the base sufficient to occupy the time of all three certified welders, namely, Bob Morgan, Tom Morgan, and Plumlee.

Lakey testified that Morgan had been hired only to assist in the prefab work and that this had been virtually completed on 2 May. Therefore, he told Plumlee the following:

> I just told him that we didn't have no access to any more buildings and that we was going to have to [2] All dates or time periods are within 1986 unless otherwise specified.

[3] Bob Morgan and Earl Tom Morgan (Tom Morgan), brothers, were welders on Plumlee's crew.

[4] Gosseen and Parish Plumlee were pipefitter helpers on Plumlee's crew.

[5] Bruce Roybal and Don Fox were plumbers on Roger Miller's crew.

[6] However, the layoff slip submitted by Respondent during the course of the investigation states: "Temporary layoff—ran out of work; may recall."

[7] Tom Morgan began working for the Respondent on 16 January. He was laid off for a week and a half in late January, and was also laid off on 24 February for about 4 weeks. His last period of work apparently began in late March and he worked steadily until his final layoff on 2 May.

[8] Plumlee had never been asked to sign any previous layoff slips. The slip submitted by Respondent during the course of the investigation states: "Temporary layoff; ran out of work."

> lay him off and Hank's comment at that time was that he was only planning on him [Plumlee] and Bob Morgan doing the condensate line and that since the prefab was done that he was planning on laying him [Tom Morgan] off permanent at that time.

Plumlee denies that this conversation occurred and testified that, in fact, he suggested to Lakey that Tom Morgan not be laid off because there was other work to do.

About 13 May, Saum said he wanted to talk to Plumlee. Saum said he had talked to his lawyer and it was perfectly legal to solicit Plumlee's vote. He asked if Plumlee knew any of the guys who had signed cards, or whether they had any union meetings. Plumlee answered no. Saum asked about Plumlee's son, Parish, and Plumlee said he was sure Parish had not signed a card. Saum said he knew the Morgan brothers were against him from the start and "were locked into the union tight as hell." He said that both Tom and Bob Morgan were "not worth a shit" and that he was going to start playing hardball and was going to send Bob Morgan into the shop on Rudkin Road[9] to keep an eye on him, and move Jim Muse from the shop to the jobsite to increase production. He said, according to Plumlee, "Morgan'll have a job but he'll have a hell of a time keeping it."

Saum told Plumlee that the Union would screw up the job and that "I'm going to fight like hell to keep it out of here"; that he was nonunion because he chose to be; that the matter could be negotiated for years and tied up in court; that it was not uncommon to go for a couple of years' negotiations and that the job would be long completed; that they could cut off his right arm before he would sign a contract; that if the employees went Union, they would take a cut in pay, and the wages would go down; that Plumlee would be sitting on the bench like the rest of the welders; and that there was a lot of work at the firing center and that he was going after the work, but the guys who were against him would not be part of it. Plumlee interrupted Saum and said, "Before you tell me much more, I have not really fully decided which way I'm going." Saum then walked away.

Jim Muse began working for Respondent at the end of January in the fabrication shop on Rudkin Road. He was hired by Al Lakey, fabrication shop foreman and Saum's brother-in-law and Rick Lakey's father. Muse primarily welded pipe supports and also mechanical stands but was not a certified welder.

About the first of May, Al Lakey told Muse that some of the guys at the base were wanting to go Union. About a week later Muse overheard a phone conversation between Saum and Al Lakey regarding whether Muse could certify as a welder at the base. Muse asked what was going on and Lakey said, according to Muse, that they were "having problems out at the base." Lakey asked if Muse wanted to try to pass a welding certification test. Muse said yes.

In mid-May, Lakey asked Muse "how big of an asshole [he] could be," and went on to explain that they wanted to get Bob Morgan down to the fabrication shop and wanted to know whether Muse "can piss him off enough to get him to quit." Lakey said, however, that this would not happen until Respondent's attorney okayed whether the Company could get away with it.[10]

Lakey asked Muse and another employee what they thought of the Union. Muse said he did not have any plans to fool around with the Union. Muse testified that Lakey, on more than one occasion, said if the Union did come in no one in the fabrication shop would have a job because the Company would subcontract the work.

Later, Muse asked Lakey what the lawyer said about the plan to get rid of Bob Morgan. Lakey said that the matter worked out well as the Corps of Engineers "shut us down on the line and so we just laid him off."

Bob Morgan and Parish Plumlee were laid off on 15 May by Bob Cole.[11] Hank Plumlee had been given no prior notification of their layoffs.[12] Respondent maintains that the suspensions were due to a 14 May phone call to Saum from Terry Childers, project engineer for the Corps of Engineers, instructing Saum to suspend all work on both the steam and condensate lines. Saum testified that Childers told him that the suspension was due to the fact that it had been discovered that the insulation requirements on both lines were not sufficient to protect the lines from freezing weather in the winter months, and that the intention was to insulate both the steam and condensate lines with thicker insulation than had been previously scheduled. Childers told him that a letter would be forthcoming in 2 weeks with further instructions. Saum testified that as a result of this instruction from Childers, all work on the steam and condensate lines, and the fabrication of poles in the fabrication shop, was suspended for 2 to 3 weeks, after which time the problem worked itself out and the work continued.

A confirmation letter of the foregoing phone call, denoted as Serial Letter No. 31, dated 16 May, was sent by the Corps of Engineers to the Respondent, as follows:

> In accordance with CC-7, SUSPENSION OF WORK of your contract, you are directed to suspend work associated with removal of insulation on the exterior steam line. All other work associated with the steam line may continue.

[9] The Respondent maintained a fabrication shop on Rudkin Road in Union Gap, Washington, some 8 miles from the base, where various items were fabricated, particularly the pipe supports or poles from which the condensate and steam lines were to be suspended. The steam lines bring steam into the buildings. The condensate lines return the water to the boilers. Respondent's contract provided for the replacement of some 1200 existing wooden poles with metal pipe supports, and also for the replacement of approximately 21,000 feet of condensate line. Also, the Respondent was to remove the existing insulation from 21,000 feet of steam line.

[10] The law firm currently representing Respondent was retained subsequent to the date of the alleged unfair labor practice.

[11] Cole had replaced Rick Lakey on 12 May as project superintendent at the base, and Rick Lakey became designated as general foreman. This change was at the direction of the Corps of Engineers because it was felt that Rick Lakey was spending too much time in the field with the employees and was not readily available in the Respondent's office trailer at the base. Therefore, Cole was brought on to apparently perform the administrative duties so that Lakey could remain in the field.

[12] Their layoff slips, signed by Cole, state: "RIF due to suspension of work."

> This suspension is necessary due to a re-evaluation of the insulation requirements on the exterior steam line. All other contract work may continue. You will be notified when the suspended work may continue.
> If you have any questions regarding this directive, please contact the Ft. Lewis Resident Office at (206) 967-6937.

Saum testified that as a result of this steam line suspension order it was not possible to continue with "all other contract work," even though the Corps of Engineers said the work could continue. Thus, Saum testified that it was necessary to know the dimensions of the insulation on the steam lines in order to be able to ascertain the proper dimensions and placement of the poles that support both the steam and condensate lines, and that welding on the condensate line could therefore not continue. Therefore, Bob Morgan, who welded on the condensate line, Parish Plumlee, who worked in the mechanical rooms, and two laborers, who worked on the crew installing the pipe supports, were laid off.

Hank Plumlee testified that he was never aware of any suspension of work by the Corps of Engineers, and that he continued welding on the condensate line until Jim Muse came out from the fabrication shop and began welding, infra. According to Plumlee, and contrary to Saum's testimony, there was no slowdown or suspension of any work on the condensate line during this period.

At the time of the layoff, Parish Plumlee was performing plumbing work in the mechanical rooms located in each barrack. This work was independent of the work being done on the outside lines. Plumlee was replaced, apparently the following day, by Kevin Rye. Rye testified that he thereafter worked steadily, without interruption, in the mechanical rooms. The record discloses that two laborers were laid off on the same day, Thursday, 15 May, ostensibly because of the shutdown. However, on Monday, 19 May, and Wednesday, 22 May, two new laborers were hired. Richard Alvord, a laborer hired on 22 May, testified that he assisted in pouring the concrete bases for the poles. Brian Longmire, a laborer hired on 19 May, testified similarly. James Muse testified that his work in the fabrication shop, where he was primarily engaged in the fabrication of pipe supports, did not slow down.

Muse did not pass the first welding test, and his sample weld or "coupon" was rejected by the independent shop that performs tests on welds and certifies welders. Prior to making another coupon, Al Lakey told him that Lakey would guarantee that he would pass the test because if he had any more problems Saum, who was a certified welder, would come up and take the test for him. Gosseen passed the welder's certification test on the second attempt about the end of May. Shortly thereafter, he was told by Saum that Saum had to work Muse into the base slowly so that the Union would not "get on his case about just sticking a brand new guy up there after they'd laid Bob Morgan off." He said by the first of June, Muse should be working there full time and would be receiving full journeyman's scale. Muse was curious about his test results and Saum said, "Who gives a damn, you passed." Later that day Muse received a phone call from Rick Lakey who said he was not going to bring Muse out to the base that week because he (Lakey) would not be there and he did not want Muse and Plumlee together by themselves.

Muse was permanently transferred to the base about 1 June as a welder. On that day, Lakey told him not to ask Plumlee any questions and to stay away from him. He further told Muse that if Muse needed help or anything he was to call Lakey on a radio that Lakey would provide for him and Lakey would come down and help him. Half an hour later Muse, who had never done this type of work, was looking at some welds and asked Lakey, "Well, what do I do?" Lakey said, "You're the welder. You tell me. That's your job." He then told Muse to do whatever Plumlee told him to do.

Muse told Plumlee he wanted to watch him weld. Then Muse asked Plumlee if he would watch Muse weld. Plumlee gave Muse, who was having some problems, pointers. During the first few days Lakey came by and inspected Muse's welds. Lakey said he was not very impressed and said they would have to get better.

During a subsequent conversation on a later date, Lakey again told Muse to stay away from Plumlee.

About 19 June the Company held a meeting of the unit employees.[13] Muse testified that Saum said he knew there had been a union meeting the night before "because his spies had let him know."[14] He said all he had to do was negotiate in good faith and "he could stall it for two years, and by that time the job would be over and everybody would be gone." He said that the employees could go somewhere else if they did not like working for him, but he did not want the Union to have anything to do with the Company. He said there were three or four people who deserved raises but he could not grant them raises because it would look like he was trying to buy their votes. Apparently during a side conversation Saum asked Muse, "Well, I heard you were going to vote for the union." Muse said no, he just went to the meeting to hear both sides.

Hank Plumlee gave the following account of Saum's remarks at the meeting: Saum said that he heard the Union had a meeting the night before, and that he heard there had been a lot of carrots dangled in front of guys' noses. He said that if the Union won the election it would only give the Union the opportunity to sit at the bargaining table with the Company, and that it would not change the job a bit. He said the matter could be tied up in court for a couple of years, and that the employees would definitely take cuts in pay. Saum had a sheet of paper that compared union scale with the wages the employees were then making, and said there were some employees who had been under consideration for raises, but because of the union deal the Company could not give out raises then because it would look like the Company was trying to buy their votes. He said the Company was looking into an insurance program for the employees. Saum said the Union would not do anything but screw the job up and that he knew there were problems, but that they were working on them. He said there was a lot of work out there at the firing center that the Company was going to bid.

[13] On 11 June, the Regional Director approved a stipulation for certification upon consent election defining the appropriate unit as follows:

> All pipefitters, pipefitter welders, and pipefitters helpers working for the Employer within the jurisdiction of United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry Local 589, excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[14] Those attending the union meeting were Hank Plumlee, Parish Plumlee, Don Fox, Randy Gosseen, Jim Muse, Randy Anderson, and Kevin Rye.

Plumlee testified that Al Lakey, who also spoke at the meeting, pointed at some of the employees and said, "I know a couple of you guys in there at the shop . . . they were dangling carrots in front of your noses and you better take a real hard look at this because . . . that shop could be closed down if this thing goes."

The election was held on 30 June. Immediately before the election, which was held at the jobsite on the base, Gosseen observed three employees from the Rudkin Road fabrication shop drive up. When they got out of the car they were approached by Al Lakey. Gosseen heard Lakey tell them, "Now, remember, if you vote for this union you're going to be out of a job." Gosseen then told Lakey that this was not the place to be politicking.

Immediately after the election, in which the Union prevailed, Rick Lakey told Gosseen and Kevin Rye that he wanted to have a meeting with them. Gosseen testified that Lakey was shaking and acted nervous or upset and said, "This is the way it's going to be . . . from now on you're going to be working at 6:30, you're not going to pick up your tools until 3:00 . . . no more coffee and soda pop on the job except at lunchtime. No more radios on the jobsite . . . and production will increase." He told the two employees that they were no longer working for Hank Plumlee but rather were working for Roger Miller, and that if they were caught out of their work area, they would be terminated.

Gosseen testified that the practice prior to that day was that the employees would get into the trucks near the Respondent's construction office and begin driving to the actual worksite at 6:30 a.m., and they usually picked up their tools 10 minutes before the 3 p.m. quitting time. There had been nothing said prior to that time regarding coffee, soda pop, and radios, and employees were permitted to have soft drinks or coffee while they were working. Further, there had never been a rule about being outside their immediate work area, and the employees would periodically leave their work area to pick up materials needed on the job.

Lakey returned about 15 minutes after the aforementioned conversation and, according to Gosseen, told Rye that he would no longer be working with Gosseen, and took Rye inside the barracks. Then Plumbing Foreman Roger Miller came out with Randy Anderson and told Gosseen that he would thereafter be working with Anderson. Anderson knew nothing at all about the work in the mechanical rooms and did not even know how to run a pipe-threading machine, which was the primary tool. Miller said he had been instructed to tell Gosseen that Gosseen and Anderson were required to complete two mechanical rooms a week. Gosseen said he would be unable to do that with a new man who did not know the tools, and that he would have to train Anderson as he had trained Rye. Miller said he understood that but "that's the word I got from above."

On 30 June, prior to the election, Lakey told Muse about some changes in the work and helped Muse move some pipe. Lakey told Muse that he "better hope the union doesn't go through or you're going to be out of a job."

Immediately after the election Lakey told Muse that he could not leave his immediate work area to get parts, that he would be on location working at 6:30 a.m. rather than arriving on the jobsite at 6:30, and that he would not pick up his tools until 3 p.m. Prior to this time Muse had begun picking up his tools about 2:45 p.m. Also, at that time Lakey furnished Muse with a radio, as he had told Muse he would do about 1 June, so that Muse could contact Lakey if he needed any help.

Shortly thereafter Saum started berating Muse about not leaving a 1/16-inch gap on his socket welds. Later he told Muse, "You been going to the office complaining about being harassed . . . you haven't seen harassment yet."[15] He told Muse that he (Saum) would provide him with a ledger book to keep a record of his welds, and Muse would make 18 to 20 welds a day or he would be terminated. There had never been a welding quota before.

The next day, 1 July, Gosseen arrived at the jobsite at approximately 5:30 a.m., although work did not begin until about 6:30 a.m. Gosseen testified that he arrived early because he was nervous about the job as a result of the aforementioned quota he was expected to meet with Randy Anderson, an inexperienced person, and believed he was being set up to be dismissed for lack of production. He sat in his truck and waited awhile and then began looking through the nearby junk pile for valves and strainers, which were to be salvaged from the old piping and reused in the mechanical rooms.

Saum drove up and stopped. Gosseen said "Good morning." Saum asked what he was doing and Gosseen told him that he was looking for valves and strainers. Saum asked, "What have you been stealing?" Gosseen said he had not been stealing anything and opened the door of his pickup and told Saum to search it. Saum glanced inside the pickup and glanced into the bed of the truck and said, "Well, I don't see anything, but we've been having these poles come up missing and . . . I'm sick and tired of these thefts and I'm going to get the FBI and investigate these thefts."

Saum drove to the Military Police (MP) station and told the MPs he wanted to swear out a complaint. After doing so, Saum left and went back to the construction trailer. Gosseen, who had followed Saum to the MP station, told the MPs that there had been a union election the day before, which the Company lost, and that Saum was looking for a reason to discharge Gosseen. The MPs said they had no reason to detain him any further, and that he could go back to work. Gosseen told them that he did not want to go back until they searched his truck, which they did. Nothing was found. Before Gosseen got back to the construction trailer, he met Plumlee, who was driving down the road. Plumlee waved him over, and asked what happened. Plumlee told Gosseen that Saum had told him, "We caught your fucking buddy," that Gosseen had been caught stealing, that Saum was going to press charges, and that Gosseen was going to be fired.

[15] Muse had complained about his treatment by Lakey, who seemed to be unduly critical of Muse's work performance.

When Gosseen walked into the office, Saum told him to pick up his check. Bob Harvey gave him a separation notice that states that Gosseen was discharged for pilfering property belonging to the Government and to Respondent.

Plumlee testified that when he got to the construction trailer at 6:30 that morning, Saum said, "Well, Hank, I got your fucking union buddy out here pilfering around this morning . . . and I've got his ass down at the MP station and I'm pressing charges on him." Plumlee asked who he was talking about, and Saum said Randy Gosseen. Plumlee asked, "Well, what was he doing?" and Saum said, "He was pilfering through my stuff."

Plumlee proceeded to leave the construction trailer to go to work and Saum said, "Yeah, get out there and bust your ass and . . . if you don't think you can handle the heat of that . . . just hit the fucking road." Saum also said that if Plumlee could not take the heat, he should stay out of the kitchen. Plumlee told him not to "hardass" him, and said if Saum wanted to fire him, then fire him, but get off his back. Then Plumlee decided that he could not tolerate that harassment and laid the keys to the Respondent's pickup on the desk. Saum asked, "Are you quitting Hank . . . are you quitting?" Plumlee did not say anything, and as he started to walk back out the door, Saum told him to "leave the fucking hardhat." Then Saum directed Lakey to accompany Plumlee to Plumlee's pickup and look through the personal things he was taking. Plumlee then left the site.

On the morning of 1 July, Lakey asked Muse if he saw some undercut on some welds Muse had made. Muse said yes. Saum, who was present, said he was suspending Muse for failing visual examination of his welds. Muse asked why Saum did not do this 2 weeks ago when the line was hydrotested.[16] Saum said he was not worried about it then or did not have the time. Saum asked why he was using 5-P rod for all three passes, infra, and Muse said that Plumlee told him to, and he had been told by Lakey to do what Plumlee told him.

On the way back to the office Lakey told Muse that Gosseen had been caught stealing and that they threw him in jail. Muse asked where Plumlee was and Lakey said, "We got rid of him, too." Back at the office Saum told Muse he was being suspended for failing visual examination of his welds. Saum said that he could go back to the fabrication shop at his old rate of pay, and could recertify as a welder on his own time and expense, and if there was an opening at the base then they could talk about reinstating him. Muse said he knew that Saum was mad because Saum could not buy his vote and that his vote was not for sale. Saum started swearing at him and said, "You're goddamn right I'm mad . . . I'm not going to send you to school here and pay you 1100 bucks a week." Lakey repeatedly asked Muse whether he wanted to go to work at the shop and would accept the job, which was at considerably lower pay, and stated that he had to call his dad, Al Lakey, at the shop and let him know. Muse accepted the offer of the job at the shop.

Muse walked in the front door of the shop and Al Lakey said he heard Muse was looking for a job. Muse said, "You guys are going to play hardball, huh?" Lakey said, "You're goddamn right. You guys started this union bullshit." Muse said he did not start any of it. Lakey said, "Well, you're involved in it and now you're going to pay for it." Lakey said he had work for him at $11.30 an hour.

On the next day, 2 July, Lakey said he only had laborers' work for Muse at $8.77 an hour and asked if he wanted the job. Muse said yes. Muse finished a job at 11 a.m. that Tuesday and asked Lakey what else he wanted done. Lakey said there was no more work. He gave Muse his check and told Muse to call him in a week. Muse called the following Monday, and Lakey said he had no work for him. He also said that Muse would be getting a letter explaining why he would no longer be working for the Respondent.

On 2 July, Plumlee remembered that he had not turned in the keys to the storage trailer at the base and that he also had several acetylene and oxygen bottles at his home that he used when doing 1-day jobs for Respondent away from the base. Fearful of the threats Saum had made against Gosseen, Plumlee anticipated that Saum would also accuse him of stealing. He, therefore, took the items to the local police department with the intention of delivering them to the Company at a later date when he got a chance. Later that day he got a call from Saum, who apparently had been notified about the bottles by the police, pursuant to Plumlee's request. Plumlee explained that he had kept the bottles at his home because he needed to have the equipment available when he was assigned work at other jobsites. Saum said he would probably have the sheriff waiting for Plumlee when he came to deliver the bottles to the Respondent.[17]

Saum then asked, "Why'd you bring this union shit down on me?" Plumlee said, "I didn't; you brought it down on yourself by not taking care of the job." Saum said the Morgan brothers were professional organizers. He said, "I hope you and the union get what you want out of this thing . . . I've already talked to nonunion contractors . . . you won't work another nonunion job." He told Plumlee, "You're going to end up losing about $25,000 . . . over this," and he repeated that he'd cut his right arm off before he would sign a contract. He then told Plumlee that Plumlee would never work for him again.

[16] This particular line had previously been inspected and hydrotested and was found to be satisfactory.

[17] Respondent does not dispute Plumlee's testimony that he had been given permission to keep the bottles at his home as a convenience and that Respondent had been aware of this. Saum did not carry out his threat to have the sheriff waiting, and Respondent does not maintain that Plumlee had done anything improper.

Then Saum asked him why he changed the welding procedure, below. Plumlee replied that he did not have authority to change the welding procedure on the job and had not done so. Saum said, "Well, we found some welds out here . . . where you were using 5-P rod . . . in violation of the contract." Plumlee said he was doing what he was told to do by Rick Lakey.

On the following day, 3 July, Respondent sent letters to Plumlee, Muse, Bobby Morgan, and Tom Morgan regarding their welding on the job. The letter to Plumlee, signed by Bob Harvey, Respondent's quality control inspector, is as follows:

> Our employment records indicate on the morning of July 1, 1986, at 6:30 A.M. you voluntarily quit and left the project on your own volition.
> We also note on July 2, 1986, at 2:30 P.M. you returned all company tools and equipment per the enclosed inventory list. If this inventory is not correct, please let me know.
> Shortly before your departure, I was investigating the welds on the new schedule 80 condensate piping installed throughout the courtyards between 4th and 6th Avenues. It is apparent you and the other welders directly under your daily supervision changed the welding procedures for this work. Specifically, the pipe has been welded using the Lincoln 5-P electrode for the entire three-pass weld application.
> As of this date, all welds have been identified and accounted for. The welds were made by yourself, Jim Muse, Bob Morgan and Earl [Tom] Morgan.
> To complete my Quality Control Report to the Government, I need your explanation as to why you arbitrarily changed our welding procedure without permission from my office.
> Hank, this is a serious matter. Think it over carefully and give me a collect call soon to discuss this further. Adscon will correct the welds to satisfy our Contract requirements as I intend to fulfill my obligations to the Government as this Company's Quality Control Officer for this project.
> If you take exception to this letter in any form, you are welcome to come out to the project immediately and walk the condensate line with me. I will show you the welding work performed by yourself and your crew. You are also encouraged to bring your entire crew for definite identification of individual welds if you would like.
> I want reasons why this procedure was changed. You and your creware professionals, you know welding procedures and the ASME code—why did you do the work differently?

Plumlee sent the following reply:

> In response to your letter written 7–3–86 regarding me changing the welding procedure at the Yakima Firing Center, as I told you on the phone I had nothing to do with changing the procedure. As a working foreman I only followed orders from the job superintendent Rick Lakey. We were all told to use 5-P rod because it was faster and clean-up time on welds were quicker. I am qualified on both 5-P and 7018 rods and was not responsible for any procedure changes. Every welder on the job was told the same thing by Rick Lakey (Job Superintendent). There was never any comments made counterdicting [sic] this by Adscon Q.C or Corp of Engineers compliance officer until after my dismissal by Adscon Inc.

The letters to both Bob and Tom Morgan, signed by Saum are identical, as follows:

> Our records indicate on May 15, 1986[18] you were laid off on a temporary basis due to lack of work at the time.
> It is our intent to start recalling welders for this project in the near future.
> Please be advised we have found several welds that you have completed that are not in conformance with the welding procedures established for this project.
>
> Before your employment can be reinstated, we are investigating the reasons why you changed your welding procedure. For further details, you should contact Hank Plumlee.
> In the meantime, your re-employment with this company is under suspension.

Both Morgan brothers replied as follows:

> I have received your letter of July 3, 1986. The statement that some of my welds were not in conformance with procedure is untrue. All welds I did were in accordance with company policy and were approved, as stated by the Superintendent.
> I am ready, willing and able to resume working and have been ready, willing and able to resume working since my improper layoff.

The letter to Muse, signed by Saum, is as follows:

> Our records indicate on July 1, 1986, you were suspended from work for violating the welding procedure you were qualified for. In addition, you failed a visual examination for severe undercutting on several welds we inspected. As you recall, the welds in question are located in 4th Avenue between Poles 942 and 1002.
> Your reinstatement with Adscon as a journeyman certified welder is conditional dependent upon your requalification by test under the same established welding procedures, with your statement explaining why you changed your welding procedures on these welds.
> We will look forward to your immediate response. In the meantime, your employment with Adscon is suspended until further notice.

On 24 July, Muse responded as follows:

[18] The letter to Tom Morgan, who was laid off earlier, contains the date May 8, 1986.

Upon request of your letter, I have retested and passed. Enclosed is a copy of my test results.

In regards to the welding procedure in question, Rick Lakey did not explain or give me specs or procedures for the job. He stated, do it any way you want. Then he said do it like Hank, so I asked Hank and he said Rick told him to use 6010 on the filler and cap, because it was faster. I did what management told me to do and my foreman.

After two weeks I asked Rick Lakey if I could switch to 7018 Hi-Lo, because thats what I qualified with and I could do a better job, he said do it any way you want.

I will expect a reply on being reinstated as soon as possible.

Thank you.

About 28 July, Muse received a call from Saum. Saum asked why Muse changed the welding procedure. Muse said that Lakey told him to do it the way Plumlee did it, and that Plumlee told him to do what management told Plumlee, namely that 5-P was to be used for all three passes. Saum said that Lakey was not a welder and Muse should not have listened to him.

Saum went on to say that he was satisfied with Muse's explanation and if he would drop his charges with the NLRB he could have his job back. During the conversation Muse asked why Lakey had been giving him (Muse) such a hard time on the job. Saum said that Lakey was retaliating because he thought Muse was going to vote for the Union, and that Lakey had seen Plumlee and Muse associating with each other, riding home together, and that was the only way Lakey knew to get even. Saum said, "You're probably the only clean welder out there because you didn't know any better . . . you were used by Hank [Plumlee] and the union and the Morgan boys." Muse said he would think about Saum's offer to withdraw the NLRB charges.

One week later Muse phoned Saum and said he would accept the offer to return to work but would not drop his charges against Respondent with the Board. Saum said no. On 21 August, Muse wrote Saum a confirmation letter of this conversation, as follows:

> On or about the 28th of July 1986, you received a call from me concerning your earlier phone call with my wife. In this conversation we talked about several things, the one in question was concerning my re-employment with Adscon. You stated and I quote, "I'll give you your job back if you drop your charges against the Company." I stated let me think about it for a week and if I want the job I'll call back. One week later I called and stated I will come back to work, but I will not drop my charges. You stated and I quote, "If you don't drop your charges you can't come back to work." I stated I would not come back to work on those conditions.
> I await your response.

Respondent's attorney replied to Muse on 27 August as follows:

> The Company has forwarded your letter of August 21, 1986 regarding its settlement offer of re-employment. The National Labor Relations Board recognizes and, indeed, encourages the parties to any unfair labor practice proceeding to engage in informal efforts to settle a dispute. You have alleged that you were improperly laid off; the Company offered to reinstate you to settle that unfair labor practice charge. In your letter of August 21, 1986, you have declined that offer. As a result, the offer of reinstatement is no longer available.

Fox was called back to work by Rick Lakey on 8 July. Fox began working on Roger Miller's crew with five other employees. Fox testified that Miller made him work by himself on the other side of the barracks for about a week and a half, and that none of the other employees would speak to him. Miller laid him off again on 24 July.

Dean Herd, a certified welder, went to the base looking for a job on 7 July. Bob Harvey gave him a job application. Bob Cole, project superintendent, came into the office and said it was possible that they would be needing some welders. Herd returned his completed application the next day and Harvey said he had received verbal word of some work being awarded. Harvey asked Herd if he was Union. Herd said yes, and stated that he had worked on some union jobs. Cole asked if his union dues were paid up. Herd said yes. Harvey said the Company was nonunion but paid union scale. Herd said okay. Cole requested that Herd come back on 11 July to take a welding test.

Herd returned for the welding test on 11 July. During the test Saum introduced himself. After the test, Saum told Herd that his "coupon"[19] looked fine and that they would let him know if they needed him. Saum asked if he belonged to the union and Herd said yes. He asked the name of Herd's home local, and Herd advised him that it was Local 598 (the Union herein). Saum said he had been having some problems with the Union and that the Union wanted to organize the Company but he was not going to permit it. Saum said, "Your welding test looked good and . . . I'd like to have you but . . . I have a problem with hiring you because you belong to the union." Herd said he was just as hungry as the next man down the road, union or nonunion. Saum said he just did not want any more problems with the Union. He said they would look over his application and keep it in mind. A copy was made of a prior certification Herd had received after testing on the same procedure that covered the Respondent's job. Thereafter Respondent hired several other welders who, at the time of Herd's test, had not yet submitted an application for employment with Respondent.

The contract between Respondent and the Corps of Engineers requires that the welding be performed in accordance with a particular welding procedure. Each complete weld is to be made with two types of welding rod, or electrode, as follows: The initial, or root, pass or weld is to be made with 5-P rod (also called 6010 rod), having a tensile strength of 60,000 pounds per square inch; the second, or middle, pass is to be made with 7018 rod, having a tensile strength of 72,000 pounds a square inch; the third, final or cap, pass is also to be made with 7018 rod.[20]

The Respondent maintains that the welders were discharged because they did not conform their welds to this procedure, but rather used 5-P rod on all three passes. Moreover, according to Respondent, they made welds that were otherwise defective for various reasons.

Tom Morgan testified that:

> Q. (By Mr. Fain, Respondent's attorney) Now, Rick Lakey never told you to use anything other than the procedure required by the Corps, did he?
>
> A. Mr. Lakey let it be known to every person on the job that they could weld any way they desired with any rod they desired in order to facilitate the speed of the job. Numerous times the welders had complained on that job to him about the 7018 electrode being unstable.
> Q. Who did you hear complain like that about that to Rick Lakey?
>
> A. Mr. Plumlee, myself and my brother and anybody else that had anything to do with welding.
> Q. Well, is there anyone else you can think of that you heard talk to Rick Lakey about that?
>
> A. No, there's not, because we were the only ones out there that knew anything about welding.[21]
> Q. All right, so it would just have been Mr. Plumlee, Mr.—the other Mr. Morgan, Bob Morgan,—
> A. Uh-huh.
> Q. —and yourself?
> A. Yes, sir, to my knowledge.
> Q. And Mr. Lakey never directed you to use a 5-P rod for all three passes, did he?
>
> A. Would you repeat that again?
> Q. Mr. Lakey never directed you to use a 5-P rod for all three passes; did he?
>
> A. Mr. Lakey directed us to weld any way that we desired in order to facilitate the job for speed.
> . . .
> Q. Tell us what happened during that discussion with [Mr. Harvey]?
> A. Well, simply stated, I made the comment to Mr. Harvey that we needed an electrode-stabilizing oven for the 7018 electrode.
> Q. And what did Mr. Harvey say?
> A. He mumbled something and went back in the trailer; what it was I don't know.
> Q. Were you requesting an oven?
> A. Yes, sir, some means of stabilizing the 7018 electrode.
> Q. And did you then get an oven?
> A. No, sir.

Plumlee, Bob Morgan, and Tom Morgan testified that they knew the contract specifications provided for 5-P rod on the root pass and 7018 rod on the two subsequent passes. However, they were experiencing "porosity" problems when welding with the 7018 rod because they were provided no "rod heaters" or ovens[22] in the field to maintain the correct temperature for the 7018 rod prior to its use. Porosity results in defective welds that may have to be grounded out and redone, thereby slowing down the work, and is caused by the absorption of atmospheric moistures by the rod, a condition particularly noticeable on cold or windy days when welding is performed in open areas. They spoke to Rick Lakey about the matter on various occasions and were told to use whatever rod they wanted to use regardless of the procedure in the specifications. The employees, all highly qualified and experienced welders, with the exception of Muse, who had recently been certified, determined that 5-P rod on all three passes would often result in the best weld under the prevailing circumstances.

Plumlee testified that he refused to stamp his nonconforming welds with an identification stamp because he did not want to be falsely certifying that the welds were performed in accordance with the specifications. The record shows that any experienced inspector can readily tell whether the cap weld was made with 5-P or 7018 rod.

Wallace Giesler, the Corps of Engineers' compliance inspector on the project, testified as follows:

> Q. (By Judge Wacknov): Let me ask, Mr. Giesler, and we haven't been talking about this yet, my understanding of 5-P versus 7018 is that 7018 has more strength to it, the welding rod; is that correct?
> A. Well, in a general case it would probably be true.
> Q. In this particular situation of condensate pipes, what difference did it really make whether the second and third pass, cap pass, were 7018 or 5-P?
> A. Well,—
> Q. I mean, as a practical matter. I understand the specifications may provide for it, but as a practical matter for my own -- I'd just like to know; what difference would it make?
> A. Well, it was a—practically it probably wouldn't make a bit of difference under the system that was being installed there. However, it was a violation of the contract specifications. [Emphasis added.]

[20] The condensate pipe being welded together has a tensile strength of 60,000 pounds a square inch, which is the same as the 5-P rod, the purpose of the 7018 rod, however, according to Saum, which has a greater tensile strength, is to provide a margin of error against imperfection in the weld to insure that the weld will be as strong as the pipe itself. The water pressure within the condensate pipe, however, is only about 30 pounds a square inch.

[21] At the time of the discharge of the Morgan brothers, Muse had not yet been brought out to the base.

[22] A rod heater is a metal container with a heating source used to keep the welding rod at a particular temperature prior to its use. There was only one rod heater, a converted small refrigerator that Plumlee had brought from his home, and it was inadequate and sometimes not functioning. Moreover, it was located in the shop at the base and was not portable for field use.

C. The Status of Hank Plumlee

Respondent maintains that Plumlee, pipefitter foreman, is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Respondent included Plumlee on the eligibility list in the representation proceeding. On 13 May, Saum engaged Plumlee in a conversation regarding the forthcoming election and attempted to solicit his vote. Plumlee voted in the election without challenge.

Plumlee was the most experienced and qualified pipefitter working for Respondent. He had worked for the Respondent on several projects, and as a previous project was coming to a close, Plumlee was made superintendent on that project for a brief time and for a specific purpose. He was the first pipefitter hired for the instant project. As pipefitter foreman, he was paid $1 an hour more than the other certified welders until the pay period immediately preceding the election, when his wages were reduced by $1 an hour.

Regarding purchasing certain equipment for the project, Plumlee testified that at the beginning of the project he was told by Saum to call a certain local supplier and check out the prices on welding rod and a welding machine. Plumlee obtained the information and was told by Bob Harvey, who also occupied the position of purchasing agent, and apparently Saum, to order the merchandise from the local source because by the time the items were shipped from Seattle the cost would be about the same. Plumlee did so.

Bob Morgan and Tom Morgan were hired in January, shortly after the project began. Plumlee testified that he did not hire these individuals. Rather, he had been acquainted with the Morgan brothers, particularly Bob, and knew that both were experienced welders. They asked him if there was welding work available on the project. Plumlee gave them Respondent's phone number and told them to talk to Saum. Plumlee also mentioned to Saum that he knew the Morgan brothers, and said he thought they would be "real good hands."[23]

Bob Morgan talked to Saum on the phone about the job and thereafter transmitted some certification papers to Saum. Apparently Saum directed Plumlee to hire the Morgan brothers. About 6 January, Plumlee notified Bob Morgan that he was hired, and about 15 January he notified Tom Morgan that he, too, should report to work.

Parish Plumlee began working for the Respondent at the fabrication shop about February, under the supervision of Al Lakey. He had worked for the Respondent on two previous projects for short periods of time. He testified that his father told him that Saum had said to bring him to the fabrication shop, show him how to weld pipe supports, and get him started.[24] Thereafter, Parish worked at the fabrication shop and Hank Plumlee worked at the base until, sometime in March, Parish was brought to the base as a pipefitter helper and worked on the condensate lines with Bob Morgan. Then he was moved into the mechanical rooms and worked with Randy Gosseen plumbing the mechanical rooms.

Hank Plumlee testified that, apparently in February, Saum asked him whether he thought Parish would want to work at the project. Plumlee said he was sure Parish would, and Saum asked whether Parish could handle the job of welding pipe supports. Plumlee said yes. Saum then told him to go ahead and find out if Parish wanted to work at the fabrication shop and to bring him out. Saum's testimony regarding the hiring of Parish is similar, except that Saum maintains that Hank Plumlee approached Saum and asked if Parish could be hired.

Gosseen began working on 17 April. He was hired to work at the base as a pipefitter helper. He worked inside the mechanical rooms of the barracks, fabricating and installing the systems for the steam heat and hot water. Gosseen testified that he had initially spoken to Plumlee about employment. Then, on 17 April, Plumlee phoned him and asked if he would like to begin working as a pipefitter helper. Gosseen said yes and drove to the base to the location where Plumlee was working, and Plumlee accompanied him to the office trailer where he filled out the employment forms Harvey gave him. He then went with Plumlee back to the mechanical rooms where Plumlee had been working, and Plumlee told him what part of the system to work on. Plumlee told Gosseen that he could go to look at a completed mechanical room if he had questions about what needed to be done, and divided the work in half so they would stay out of each other's way.

Gosseen testified that he worked with Plumlee on mechanical rooms for several weeks, after which Plumlee began working in the field, and Gosseen remained in the mechanical rooms by himself. Several days later, Parish Plumlee was brought out to work with Gosseen, and then, after Parish was laid off, Kevin Rye took his place. Gosseen trained both Rye and Parish and told them what work to do. Gosseen was thereafter given instructions by Harvey, Rick Lakey, and Cole; and Roger Miller, plumbing foreman, tested some of the work that the employees had completed in the mechanical rooms. Gosseen asked Lakey for time off on 3 June. Hank Plumlee would only come by occasionally to eat lunch with Gosseen and Parish.

Rye testified that when he first began working with Gosseen in the mechanical rooms, Plumlee came in on five or six occasions "to check on the work to see how things was going, if we had any questions."

Regarding the hiring of Gosseen, Rick Lakey testified that Gosseen had come to the jobsite on several occasions and talked to Plumlee and both Morgan brothers. Later, Plumlee told Lakey that he needed somebody to work in the mechanical rooms. He said that Gosseen had experience as a pipefitter and he recommended that Gosseen be hired. Lakey told Plumlee to go ahead and hire him. Plumlee did not deny this testimony of Lakey.

Plumlee testified that he never recommended that any employees be laid off, disciplined, discharged, or recalled. Rather, all these decisions, as far as he knew, were made by Rick Lakey. Each morning the welders, who generally worked alone, would begin doing the work that they had been working on the day before, unless they were assigned different work by Lakey.

[23] Plumlee and other employees testified that in the construction industry it is customary for employees to obtain jobs through word of mouth.

[24] Al Lakey, shop manager, was not a welder and apparently was not qualified to train Parish Plumlee to do some of the necessary work.

Plumlee did not keep the time of the welders or pipefitter helpers, attend management meetings, or do any paperwork. If Lakey had not already spoken to the welders regarding their assignments, Plumlee would relay the instructions. Plumlee did not oversee or inspect the work of the other employees and performed the same work as they did virtually all the time.[25]

Plumlee testified that on one occasion, Plumlee asked Muse for some assistance. Muse asked Lakey if he could help Plumlee. Lakey said no, that Plumlee was a journeyman and could do it himself. As noted above, when Muse was brought out to the base from the fabrication shop, he was initially told by Lakey not to have anything to do with Plumlee, and on the day of the election Lakey gave Muse a radio so that he could call Lakey if he had any questions about the work.

Saum testified that prior to the beginning of the project he told Plumlee there would be a supervisory job as welding foreman open for him and that he was going to leave the responsibility of hiring welders to Plumlee. Plumlee said he knew a couple of welders and Saum said, "Well, I'll leave that responsibility to you. When the job requires it let's bring the guys in. Plumlee denies this conversation.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The status of Hank Plumlee

Respondent maintains that Hank Plumlee is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. It is clear that whether Plumlee possessed or exercised any supervisory authority prior to the advent of the Union, he neither possessed nor exercised any such authority after about mid-May.

By 15 May three of the four employees Plumlee had called to work, pursuant to the instructions of Saum or Rick Lakey, had been laid off or discharged,[26] and only Gosseen remained. Plumlee had received no prior notice that these members of his crew were to be discharged, nor had he been consulted regarding their replacements. Rye replaced Parish Plumlee in the mechanical rooms, and was trained by Gosseen. I find that Plumlee did not direct the work of Gosseen or Rye and had very little daily contact with them.[27] When Muse was transferred from the fabrication shop to the base he was told by Rick Lakey to stay away from Plumlee and thereafter Lakey, who spent more time in the field after 12 May when Cole was hired as superintendent, inspected Muse's work until he apparently felt that Muse was capable of working on his own. Muse and Plumlee worked separately and Plumlee did not inspect his work.

Thus, the record is devoid of any evidence of supervisory authority exercised by Plumlee. Instead, Plumlee did not even have the authority to direct Muse to assist him, as Lakey denied Plumlee's request in this regard; and Muse went to Lakey, not Plumlee, for time off. Further, Saum solicited Plumlee's vote in the forthcoming election; Plumlee's foreman's pay of $1 an hour was taken away from him prior to the election; and he voted without challenge.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that whatever Plumlee's prior status, he was clearly not a supervisor on and following 13 May, the date Saum solicited him to vote against the Union.

2. The discharges

On 2 May, Superintendent Lakey told Hank Plumlee that Lakey was going to discharge Don Fox that day because of his suspected union activity. Fox was, in fact, laid off that day and was told by his foreman, Roger Miller, that it would only be for a week or so. However, Fox was not recalled until 8 July, some 2 months later. I credit the testimony of Plumlee and Fox.

Respondent maintains that Fox's layoff resulted from a quarantine of certain barracks in which Fox was working. However, a Corps of Engineers' quality assurance report shows that on 2 May the asbestos problem was no longer precluding work in the barracks. Moreover, Roger Miller testified that the building in which Fox had been working on 2 May, and still another building yet to be started, was not affected by the quarantine.

I therefore find that the evidence does not support Respondent's alleged reasons for the layoff of Fox, and that Fox was laid off for the reason that Lakey stated to Plumlee, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

After being recalled on 8 July to Roger Miller's plumbing crew, Fox was again discharged on 24 July. Respondent maintains in its brief that Fox was discharged because of "performance problems."

Rick Lakey testified that Fox was discharged because:

> It was another complaint, no hardhats, no shoes, Mr. Fox was constantly out of his area, no hardhat, completely two buildings away from his area. I finally had enough of it, I went up and told Roger to fire him.

Superintendent Cole testified that Roger Miller told him that Fox was not performing and should not have been called back and, therefore, Cole told Miller to discharge him. Cole, however, made out the layoff slip, which indicates that Fox was being let go because of lack of work.

Miller testified that there were only about four or five more buildings that needed plumbing and Cole told him that he should cut back on his crew. Therefore, Fox was laid off. When asked whether there was any problem with Fox's work, Miller testified, "No, not really." He then testified that when he was discussing layoffs with Cole, something was mentioned about a productivity problem with Fox "but there was nothing—no big to-do about it."

The reasons for the second layoff of Fox given by various managers and supervisors are contradictory. On the one hand Lakey and Cole maintain that Fox was discharged because of problems with his work. Miller, Fox's immediate supervisor, however, not only does not

---

[25] I credit Plumlee's testimony and also the testimony of Bob Morgan and Tom Morgan, who corroborated the foregoing testimony of Plumlee.

[26] Tom Morgan, Bob Morgan, and Parish Plumlee.

[27] Although Rye testified that Plumlee came to check on work in the mechanical rooms shortly after 16 May, this was apparently of short duration. Moreover, this is not determinative of supervisory authority. Gerber Co., 270 NLRB 1235, 1237–1238 (1984).

corroborate this, but maintains that Fox was laid off because, even though there was more work to be done, the Respondent was nearing the end of that phase of the project.

The General Counsel maintains that the conflicting reasons for Fox's second layoff, coupled with the foregoing finding that Fox's earlier layoff was unlawfully motivated, mandates the conclusion that Fox's second layoff was also violative of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. I agree and so find.

Tom Morgan was discharged on the same day as Fox, 2 May. Morgan was told by Lakey that his temporary layoff would last for "one week and one week only." Plumlee testified similarly. I credit Morgan and Plumlee.

Respondent maintains that Morgan, who had been laid off on two prior occasions, had been hired only to perform prefab work and when this work had been completed Morgan was permanently laid off. Indeed, Lakey maintains that Plumlee acknowledged that Plumlee was planning on permanently laying off Morgan for that very reason. Plumlee denied this and testified that there was abundant welding work to be done on and subsequent to the day Morgan was discharged. I credit Plumlee.

Although Lakey told Plumlee on 1 May that he did not believe that Tom Morgan would favor the Union, Saum told Plumlee, on 13 May, that he knew the Morgan brothers were against him from the start and "were locked into the union tight as hell." That remark of Saum's, coupled with the Respondent's discredited rationale for discharging Morgan on the very day that, it has been found, Respondent discharged Fox because of his suspected union activity, mandates the conclusion that Morgan's discharge was similarly motivated. I so find.

On 13 May, as noted, Saum advised Plumlee of Saum's disregard for the Morgan brothers and also said he was going to start playing hardball and was going to send Bob Morgan to the fabrication shop on Rudkin Road. Meanwhile, at the shop, Al Lakey had told Muse, whom I credit, that they wanted to bring Bob Morgan to the shop so that Muse could "piss him off enough to get him to quit."

This plan, however, did not materialize and Bob Morgan was laid off on 15 May allegedly because, as Saum testified, work on the project had been halted by the Corps of Engineers. Also, on the same date, Parish Plumlee, a pipefitter helper, was laid off, as were two laborers.

The credible evidence establishes, contrary to Saum's testimony, that the work Bob Morgan and Plumlee had been performing had not been suspended. In fact, the contemporaneous letter from the Corps of Engineers states that the suspension involved only the "removal of insulation on the exterior steam line," which work constituted only a relatively minor part of the overall project, and that "[A]ll other contract work may continue." Moreover, Plumlee credibly testified, contrary to Saum, that the work on the condensate line was not suspended and that it continued thereafter; and Muse credibly testified that the fabrication of pipe supports continued throughout the time of this alleged 2-week shutdown. Further, the two laborers discharged on 15 May were replaced within a week by two new hires who continued working in the field on the installation of pipe supports.[28]

Parish Plumlee was working in the mechanical rooms of the barracks with Gosseen at the time of his layoff. It is clear that this work was independent of any outside work on the steam or condensate line, and continued after Parish's discharge, as Parish was replaced by a plumbing employee, Kevin Rye.

Clearly, the Respondent seized on the Corps of Engineers' steam line suspension order to fabricate a rationale for the dismissal of these employees, and the credible record evidence shows that the suspension of the steam line work had no impact on the work that Bob Morgan and Parish Plumlee were performing.

Respondent maintains that there is no record evidence that Respondent knew or suspected that Parish was in favor of the Union. Although Saum had explicitly expressed his animus toward Bob Morgan and had even concocted a scenario for getting him to quit, it is clear that the Respondent had been attempting to identify all the union sympathizers and Saum stated that he had spies at one union meeting. Parish had attended a union meeting and signed a union authorization card prior to his discharge. Moreover, there was no valid reason given for his discharge, and he was not offered either of the laborer jobs that were available the following week even though on 8 July, when Parish was recalled, he was put to work as a laborer on the laborers' crew, thus showing that Respondent had no reservations about recalling Parish as a laborer rather than as a pipefitter helper.[29]

For the foregoing reasons I conclude that the 15 May layoffs of Bob Morgan and Parish Plumlee were discriminatorily motivated in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Gosseen was discharged on 1 July, the day following the election, purportedly for pilfering property. The property that Gosseen was accused of allegedly stealing was scrap iron that had been removed from the mechanical rooms during the demolition stage. Respondent was selling this scrap for 2 cents a pound to a local salvage dealer.

I credit Gosseen and find that he had arrived at the jobsite early because he was apprehensive about his continued employment because of the events the day before, and that he was attempting to locate valves and strainers that were to be reused in the mechanical rooms.[30]

Even though Gosseen's truck was searched by Saum and the military police and nothing was found, Saum nevertheless allegedly determined that Gosseen had indeed intended to pilfer something, and therefore dismissed him. I do not credit Saum and find that he discharged Gosseen in retaliation for Gosseen's suspected [28] I agree with the General Counsel's position that the layoff of the two laborers on 15 May was contrived "camouflage" to mask the true reason for the layoff of Bob Morgan and Parish Plumlee.

[29] Parish was thereafter discharged again for excessive absenteeism, apparently due to injury he sustained on the job, and there is no complaint allegation that this final discharge is violative of the Act.

[30] Various employees testified that these items, which were to be reused, had sometimes been discarded with the rest of the scrap and had to be obtained from the salvage pile.

union activity. Saum's virtually contemporaneous remark to Plumlee, whom I credit, that Gosseen was Plumlee's "fucking union buddy" and was going to be fired, provides clear evidence of Saum's true motivation. Therefore, I conclude that Gosseen was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, as alleged.

As noted, Saum told Plumlee that his "fucking union buddy" had been caught stealing and that Saum had Gosseen at the MP station and was going to press charges against him. Immediately following this, as Plumlee was about to begin work, Saum told him "Yeah, get out there and bust your ass and . . . if you don't think you can handle the heat of that . . . just hit the fucking road." Plumlee told Saum not to "hard ass" him and to fire him or get off his back. He then indicated that he was quitting by laying the keys to Respondent's pickup on the desk which, as evidenced by Saum's repeated questioning of whether Plumlee was quitting, was just what Saum had intended. Shortly thereafter, Lakey told Muse that Gosseen had been caught stealing and had been thrown in jail and that "We got rid of [Plumlee], too."

Respondent maintains that this confrontation did not constitute a constructive discharge, citing K & S Circuits, 255 NLRB 1270, 1295 (1981). Contrary to Respondent's assertions, it is clear that the case that Respondent cites constitutes clear precedent for the determination, which I make, that the new, albeit unspecified, working conditions imposed on Plumlee were intended to be so difficult or unpleasant as to cause him to resign, and that such conditions were imposed because of Plumlee's union activity. I therefore find that Plumlee was constructively discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Muse was suspended by Lakey on 1 July, allegedly for making unacceptable welds, and was permitted to take a cut in pay and return to work at the fabrication shop. When Muse arrived at the shop, he made the rhetorical statement to Al Lakey that the Respondent "was going to play hardball." Al Lakey agreed, stating "You're goddamn right. You guys started this union bullshit." Muse denied that he started it and Lakey said, "Well, you're involved in it and now you're going to pay for it." I credit Muse's testimony. Further, I do not credit the testimony of Al Lakey regarding Muse's alleged insubordinate conduct at the fabrication shop. Thereafter, on the following day, Muse was laid off allegedly for lack of work.

I find that Muse was, in effect, discharged by Rick Lakey on 1 July at the base because of his suspected union activity. The welds pointed out to Muse on 1 July, which allegedly resulted in his demotion to the fabrication shop, were welds that he had made some 2 weeks earlier. Moreover, Muse had been welding steadily for a month prior to his discharge and Rick Lakey, who had inspected his work, had not found it unacceptable. Finally, when Muse arrived at the fabrication shop, he was told in no uncertain terms by Al Lakey, who had spoken to Rick Lakey shortly before, that Muse's demotion to the shop was motivated by his union activity.

I find that the 1 July removal of Muse as a welder was discriminatorily motivated in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Moreover, I find that the 2 July layoff was similarly unlawful, as credible record evidence does not show that there was no further work for Muse at the fabrication shop.

I credit the testimony of Dean Herd, an applicant for employment, and find that on 11 July, after taking a welding test, he acknowledged to Saum that he was a member of the Union. Thereupon, Saum told Herd that his welding was good and he would like to hire Herd, but he just did not want any more problems with the Union. Herd was not hired. Thereafter, the Respondent hired other welders who, at the time of Herd's conversation with Saum, had not yet applied for employment. Therefore, I find that Respondent's failure to hire Herd was discriminatorily motivated in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Young Hinkle Corp., 244 NLRB 264 (1979).

3. The noncode welding

Respondent maintains that even if the four certified welders, Bob Morgan, Tom Morgan, Jim Muse, and Hank Plumlee were unlawfully discharged, nevertheless they would have been discharged for a legitimate reason because of their admitted failure to follow the proper welding procedure and because of various defective welds that were subsequently discovered. I find this defense to be without merit. Hank Plumlee and the Morgan brothers credibly testified that they had been told by Lakey that it was permissible to use 5-P rod in place of 7018 rod if they desired, and this instruction was relayed to Muse by Plumlee.[31] Moreover, I credit the employees' testimony that the primary reason for using 5-P rod in place of 7018 rod was because, after advising Lakey and Harvey of the porosity problem with 7018 rod, the Respondent failed to provide them with rod ovens in the field. I discredit Lakey's and Harvey's denials of these conversations, and find that indeed there were no rod ovens provided to the employees in the field until after they were discharged and new replacement welders were hired.

I do not credit the assertions of Saum, Bob Harvey, or Rick Lakey that the welding of Plumlee and the Morgan brothers was initially so exceptional that Respondent never thereafter inspected the work until immediately prior to the election.[32] The welding work was readily observable and, indeed, it was Bob Harvey's admitted primary responsibility as Respondent's quality control representative, who was on the job at all times, to insure to the Corps of Engineers that the work was in conformity with the contract. Harvey and Lakey testified that, although the noncode welding was discovered several days prior to the election and was a serious violation of the contract specifications, the matter was not reported to the Corps of Engineers because Saum did not want anything to affect the 30 June election. This contention, regarding which the Respondent did not elaborate by way of supportive explanation, is nonsensical and preposterous, particularly in light of the fact that Respondent, prior to the election, threatened the employees with discharge should they vote for the Union.

[31] It is quite reasonable that Lakey would have so instructed the employees, as Giesler, the Corps of Engineers' representative, testified that the use of one rod or the other "probably wouldn't make a bit of difference."

[32] Bob Harvey, quality control representative, testified that "I was so impressed with these men's welds that I didn't watch it all that close. I never seen better welding in my life." Rick Lakey said that "all three was damn good welders." Regarding Plumlee's welding, Saum testified that the work was "as good as I've seen. The guy was an artist," and when asked how the noncode welds could have gone undetected, Saum said, "I don't know. I don't know. I'd still like an answer to that . . . it's a mystery."

I credit the testimony of the employees, detailed above, and find that they endeavored to make the best possible welds under the prevailing field conditions and at all times were following the instructions of Lakey.

Based on the foregoing, I find the Respondent's argument that the employees are not entitled to reinstatement to be without merit. The Respondent has adduced no credible evidence that the employees did something improper by following Lakey's instruction, or otherwise performed defective welding that would justify their discharge.[33]

4. The 8(a)(1) violations

As discussed above, I concluded that it was unnecessary to determine whether Hank Plumlee was a supervisor prior to 13 May, on which date Saum solicited Plumlee's vote. On 13 May and thereafter, however, I found that Plumlee was not a supervisor within the meaning of the Act.

I credit Plumlee and find that on 13 May, Saum interrogated him about the union activity of other employees. Saum told him, in effect, that he was going to retaliate against Bob Morgan because of his involvement with the Union; that Saum would prolong negotiations and would not sign a contract; that if the Union got in, wages would go down; and that the employees would be discharged.

I credit Muse and find that in mid-May, Al Lakey interrogated Muse and another employee regarding their union activity, stated that if the Union came in, the fabrication shop employees would not have a job because the work would be contracted out, and advised Muse of plans to get rid of Bob Morgan because of his union activity. Also, on 1 June and thereafter, Rick Lakey told Muse to stay away from Plumlee, clearly because of Plumlee's involvement with the Union, as Saum later explained to Muse.

I credit Muse's testimony regarding the 19 June employee meeting and find that Saum told the employees that he knew of the union meeting the night before "because his spies had let him know," thus creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activity. I find that Saum also said he could stall negotiations for 2 years, that he was withholding raises because of the upcoming election, and that he heard Muse was going to vote for the Union.

Also at the aforementioned meeting, I find that Al Lakey told the employees that the fabrication shop would be closed if the Union won the election. Moreover, I find that immediately prior to the election Al Lakey told the employees that if they voted for the Union they would be out of a job. Contrary to Respondent's contentions, I find that these statements of Lakey constituted direct threats rather than lawful predictions based solely on economic considerations.

Immediately following the election, I find that Rick Lakey imposed more onerous working conditions on Gosseen and Rye by changing their actual working hours, disallowing coffee and soda pop on the job, requiring them to remain in their work area, and requiring them to increase production.Similarly, new and more onerous working conditions were imposed on Muse by Rick Lakey at the same time.[34]

I find that on 1 July, Saum threatened Gosseen with arrest in retaliation for his union activity and, for the same reason, Al Lakey threatened Muse with more onerous working conditions.

I find that on 2 July, Saum, for a discriminatory reason, threatened to have Plumlee arrested when he returned certain items to Respondent, interrogated Plumlee about his union activity, told Plumlee he would never work another nonunion job, and that the Respondent would never sign a contract.

I credit Herd's testimony and find that on 11 July, Saum told Herd that he was not hiring Herd, a union member, because he did not want any more problems with the Union.

On 28 July, Saum told Muse that Rick Lakey had retaliated against Muse because Lakey thought Muse was going to vote for the Union as he had been observed associating with Hank Plumlee.

The foregoing findings of 8(a)(1) and (3) violations are based on the credited testimony of the named employees. I do not credit the testimony of Saum, Rick Lakey, and Al Lakey to the extent that their testimony differs with that of Hank Plumlee, Gosseen, Muse, and Herd, who impressed me as forthright and reliable witnesses with accurate recollections of the various events and conversations.

E. The Representation Proceeding

The Union challenged the ballots of John Sphuler, Larry Barnhart, Kevin Rye, and Al Lakey. The Board agent challenged the ballots of Donald Fox, Lloyd Parrish Plumlee, Earl (Tom) Morgan, and Bobby Morgan.

At the hearing it was agreed that the challenge to Al Lakey's ballot should be sustained as he is a supervisor. I shall also sustain the challenge to the ballot of Larry Barnhart, laborer foreman, as laborers are not included within the approximate unit and there is no evidence that [33] Respondent's extensive evidence concerning the identification and alleged repairs of some 42 welds from 13 August to 6 November is contradicted by record testimony. Thus, for example, Fritz Flowers, called by the General Counsel, who was assigned to repair only one weld, credibly testified that he repaired that single weld on 18 November, and the repair took less than an hour. Respondent's repair log shows, however, that Flowers spent 13 hours that day repairing four welds. I do not credit any of Respondent's evidence regarding the alleged repair of any of the welds. It is significant that none of the other welders who allegedly made the other 41 repairs were called as witnesses by Respondent.

[34] Such new working conditions also constitute violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Respondent performed any unit work. The challenges to the ballots of John Sphuler and Kevin Rye are overruled, as the Union presented no evidence that these two employees were not eligible unit employees.

The challenge to the ballots of Donald Fox, Lloyd Parish Plumlee, Earl (Tom) Morgan, and Bobby Morgan are overruled, as the record shows that they are eligible unit employees who were unlawfully discharged prior to the election.

Respondent offered evidence in support of only one of its election objections. The objection is as follows:

> 2. The Union, by and through its agents, officials, representatives, employees and/or supporters, unlawfully promised to waive or reduce substantially initiation fees for employees who joined the union prior to the election.

It was stipulated that the testimony of Union Business Agent Waldbauer, who was present in the hearing room, would be as follows: that at one, or possibly two union meetings Waldbauer told the employees that the Union had a special organizing initiation fee, and that members of the bargaining unit could join the Union for $200 as long as they join the Union within 8 days of when a contract was signed between the Union and Adscon; and further, that Waldbauer said nothing else about organizing fees.

Several employees testified on this matter. I credit the testimony of Hank Plumlee and Don Fox, who specifically recalled that Business Agent Waldbauer stated that the offer for reduced initiation fees extended beyond the election. Parish Plumlee could not recall Waldbauer establishing a time limit for reduced initiation fees, and apparently thought the offer was for an indefinite time. Tom Morgan's testimony on this matter indicates that he had only a vague recollection of Waldbauer's actual statements.

On the basis of the foregoing I find that the Respondent has not sustained its burden of proof and recommend that this election objection,[35] as well as the other election objections, on which no evidence was offered, should be overruled.

It is also recommended that this matter be remanded by the Board to the Regional Director for Region 19, directing that the ballots of John Sphuler, Kevin Rye, Donald Fox, Lloyd Parish Plumlee, Earl (Tom) Morgan, and Bobby Morgan be opened and counted, and that a revised tally of ballots be prepared and served on the parties. If the revised tally reveals that the Petitioner has received a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall issue a certification of representative. If the revised tally shows that the Petitioner has not received a majority of the valid ballots cast, the Regional Director shall set aside the election results, dismiss the petition, and vacate the proceedings.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. The unfair labor practices described above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Because I have found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in such unfair labor practices and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including the posting of an appropriate notice attached as "Appendix," and the mailing of the notices to all employees.

I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to offer Hank Plumlee, Bob Morgan, Earl (Tom) Morgan, Jim Muse, Don Fox, and Randy Gosseen immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if such jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment, without the loss of their seniority or any other rights and privileges. I shall further recommend that Respondent hire Dean Herd to the position for which he would have been hired, with seniority and other benefits beginning on the date he would have been hired.

I shall further recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to make whole the aforementioned employees, and also Parish Plumlee, for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the discrimination against them. Backpay is to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest on such backpay to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[36] In accordance with the Board's decision in Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982), I shall recommend to the Board that an expunction remedy be included in the Order.

The General Counsel has requested that a visitatorial clause be included in the Order in this case. This request should appropriately be addressed to the Board.

[Recommended Order omitted from publication.]

[36] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

W. S. Smith Electric, Inc. and Local Union No. 692, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO. Case 7–CA–27671

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by Local Union No. 692, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) on January 21, 1988, and amended on February 24, 1988, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint February 25, 1988, against W. S. Smith Electric, Inc. (the Respondent) alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charges and complaint, the Respondent has failed to file an answer.

On April 11, 1988, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On April 13, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the Complaint shall be deemed to be admitted true and may be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that the Acting Regional Attorney, by letter dated March 11, 1988, notified the Respondent that unless an answer was received by March 25, 1988, a Motion for Default Judgment would be filed.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment insofar as the complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, by failing to make the fringe benefit fund contributions required under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and by failing to remit dues it had deducted from its employees' wages to the Union as required under the dues-checkoff provisions of this collective-bargaining agreement, during the period from August 3 to September 3, 1987.

The complaint additionally alleges, in paragraphs 16 and 18, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by continuing to deduct dues from its employees' wages after the collective-bargaining agreement was no longer in effect and by withholding this money from its employees. We find this complaint allegation to be so ambiguous that we are unable to determine whether it states a cause of action, because the complaint does not allege sufficient facts to allow the Board to decide how the Respondent violated the Act by this conduct. For example, the complaint does not allege that the employees' dues-checkoff authorizations were revoked or otherwise expired when the contract was no longer in effect. Thus, it is unclear whether, under the theory of the complaint, it is alleged that the Respondent should have ceased deducting dues from its employees' wages or whether it should have deducted the dues but remitted the money to the Union. Accordingly, we deny the Motion for Summary Judgment insofar as it alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by continuing to deduct dues from its employees' wages after the collective-bargaining agreement was no longer in effect. We shall remand the case to the Region for further appropriate action, including, if necessary, a hearing before an administrative law judge on the issue whether the Respondent violated the Act by continuing to deduct dues from its employees' wages when the collective-bargaining agreement was no longer in effect and by retaining this money for itself.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Michigan corporation with its principal office and place of business in Clare, Michigan, is an electrical contractor in the building and construction industry. During the year ending December 31, 1987, the Respondent performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for B & B Contractors and Developers, Inc., a company engaged in the building and construction industry that annually performs services outside the State of Michigan valued in excess of $50,000. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Unit and the Union's Representative Status

The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees of the Respondent performing electrical work at the Big Wheel Department Store jobsite in Standish, Michigan; but excluding guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

On August 3, 1987, the Respondent executed a letter of assent to the terms of the current collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Bay City Division, Michigan Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, Inc., covering the employees in the unit. This letter of assent was effective by its terms for the period August 3, 1987, to September 3, 1987.

For the period August 3 to September 3, 1987, the Union, by virtue of Section 8(f) of the Act, was the exclusive representative of the unit employees for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

B. The Refusal to Bargain

For the period of August 3 to September 3, 1987, the Respondent failed to make any contributions to fringe benefit funds on behalf of the unit employees as required by the collective-bargaining agreement. The agreement provides that the Respondent shall make contributions to certain fringe benefit funds, including vacation, pension, health and welfare, and apprenticeship funds. For the period of August 3 to September 3, 1987, the Respondent deducted dues from the unit employees' wages, but failed to remit these dues to the Union as required by the collective-bargaining agreement.

The Respondent failed to make fringe benefit fund contributions and failed to remit checked off dues to the Union as required by the agreement without giving the Union notice or an opportunity to bargain about this conduct. We find that the Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees and has thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By failing and refusing to make fringe benefit fund contributions on behalf of its unit employees and by failing and refusing to remit checked off dues to the Union as required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall, inter alia, order the Respondent to make all the contributions to fringe benefit funds required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.[1] We shall also order the Respondent to reimburse its employees for any expenses ensuing from its unlawful failure to make contributions to the fringe benefit funds, as set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981). All payments to employees shall be made with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[2] We shall also order the Respondent to remit to the Union the dues it deducted from its employees' wages while the collective-bargaining agreement was in effect, with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, supra. We shall further order the Respondent to post an appropriate notice to employees. As noted above, we shall also remand this case for hearing on the limited issue whether the Respondent violated the Act by continuing to deduct dues from its employees' wages when the collective-bargaining agreement was no longer in effect and by retaining this money for itself.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, W. S. Smith Electric, Inc., Clare, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

---

[1] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for the addition of a fixed rate of interest on unlawfully withheld fund payments at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding. We leave to the compliance stage the question whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. Depending on the circumstances of each case, these additional amounts may be determined by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, when there are no governing provisions, by evidence of any losses directly attributable to the unlawful withholding, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[2] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

(a) Failing and refusing to make fringe benefit fund contributions as required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(b) Failing and refusing to remit checked off dues to the Union as required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make all the contributions to fringe benefit funds required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remit to the Union the dues it deducted from its employees' wages while the collective-bargaining agreement was in effect, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Make unit employees whole for any loss of benefits or other expenses suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to make the fringe benefit fund contributions required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its facility in Clare, Michigan, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that this proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for the purpose of taking further action in accord with this decision, including, if necessary, the holding of a hearing before an administrative law judge on the issue whether the Respondent violated the Act by continuing to deduct dues from its employees' wages when the collective-bargaining agreement was no longer in effect and by retaining this money for itself.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to make fringe benefit fund contributions as required by our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to remit checked off dues to the Union as required by our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make all the contributions to fringe benefit funds required by our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL remit to the Union the dues we deducted from our unit employees' wages while the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union was in effect.

WE WILL make our unit employees whole for any loss of benefits or other expenses suffered as a result of our failure to make the fringe benefit fund contributions required by our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN JOHANSEN AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 15, 1982, Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The Charging Party/Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota (AGC) filed exceptions and a supporting brief, Respondent Construction, Building Material, Ice and Coal Drivers, Helpers, and Inside Employees Union, Local No. 221, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America (the Union) filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Charging Party Independent Construction Truck Owners, Inc. (ICTO) filed exceptions and supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions,[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, and that Respondent Construction, Building Material, Ice and Coal Drivers, Helpers, and Inside Employees Union, Local No. 221, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. These cases came for hearing before me in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on a consolidated unfair labor practice complaint,[1] issued by the Regional Director for Region 18, [1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. The caption has been amended to reflect that change.

which alleges that Respondent Teamsters Local No. 221 violated Section 8(e), 8(b)(3), and 8(b)(4)(i), and (ii)(A) and (B) of the Act, and that Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota (AGC),[2] violated Section 8(e) of the Act. More particularly, the consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondents, as well as Park Construction Company, an individual signatory, entered into an unlawful "hot cargo" agreement, called the Memorandum of Understanding, in which they agreed to apply the union-security provision in an areawide multiemployer agreement to independent contractors, agreed to pay fringe benefits to a union-management trust fund for independent contractors, gave the Respondent Union the preferential right to refer independent contractors to members of the Respondent Employer Association, set wage rates for independent contractors employed by members of the Respondent Association, and applied to the Memorandum of Understanding a grievance procedure that unlawfully permitted self-help. The consolidated complaint also alleges that the Respondent Union entered into an illegal no-subcontracting agreement with Park in violation of Section 8(e) of the Act, and that it interpreted a provision in the expired master area agreement with Park and other members of the AGC in such a manner that the Union would be able to engage in a work stoppage to enforce provisions of the agreement that were or might otherwise be valid under the provisions of Section 8(e). The consolidated complaint also alleges that the Respondent Union, in fact, engaged in a work stoppage to enforce no-subcontracting restrictions in the Memorandum of Understanding. It further alleges that, in the course of collective-bargaining negotiations leading to a new contract, the Respondent Union illegally demanded a contractual restriction against subcontracting that would violate Section 8(e) of the Act and that it threatened to picket employer members of AGC to obtain such a contract clause. The consolidated complaint alleges that the Respondent Union engaged in an illegal secondary boycott by threatening a work stoppage at a Park jobsite and by picketing Park, and, in fact, struck Park during a contract term to obtain a modification of an existing collective-bargaining agreement. The Union maintains that the independent truck owners—whose status was drawn sharply into issue in this case—are, in fact, the employees of the various AGC members who employ them from time to time, and that it was lawful to bring pressure on AGC to bring independent truck owners (ITOs) under the union-security provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement with AGC members and otherwise to negotiate terms and conditions of employment with AGC concerning such individuals. Respondent also denies commission of any violations of Section 8(b)(4) and 8(b)(3) and asserts that the strike and picketing of Park was lawful primary activity aimed at enforcing the grievance and arbitration provisions of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, which agreement permitted strikes under certain limited circumstances during the contract term.[3] On these contentions—and particularly the contentions with respect to the status of independent truck owners—the issues here were drawn.[4]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

For many years the highway and heavy construction industry (highway and heavy) in the Twin Cities area and in all of central Minnesota has been dominated by the two Respondents in this case, the Associated General Contractors of Minnesota (and its employer member) and Teamsters Local 221. AGC has both bound and unbound members.[5] The former bargain collectively with the Teamsters and other labor organizations on a multiemployer basis, while the latter, who are also members in good standing of AGC, either refuse to participate in collective-bargaining negotiations at all or elect to sign, as individual signatories, one or more of various Employees Union, Local No. 221, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO (Teamsters or the Union), in Case 18-CE-44 on July 3, 1980; charge filed against Respondent Teamsters by AGC and Park Construction Company (Park), on April 3, 1981, in Case 18-CB-1134; charge filed against Respondent Teamsters by AGC and Park on April 3, 1981, in Case 18-CC-896; charge filed against Respondent Teamsters by AGC on April 22, 1981, in Case 18-CC-898; charge filed against Respondent Teamsters by Park in Case 18-CE-47 on April 22, 1981.

Consolidated complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 18 against Respondent AGC and Respondent Teamsters on April 30, 1981; Respondent Teamsters' answer filed on May 19, 1981; Respondent AGC's answer filed on May 29, 1981; case heard before me in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on December 1-4, 1981, and January 18-25, 1982; briefs filed with me on or before April 30, 1982.

[2] Respondents admit, and I find, that, during calendar year 1980, employer members of Respondent AGC performed services within the State of Minnesota valued in excess of $50,000 and purchased and received at their facilities in the State of Minnesota directly from points and places located outside the State of Minnesota goods and merchandise valued in excess of $50,000. At all times material, Park is and has been a Minnesota corporation that maintains its principal place of business in Minneapolis, Minnesota, where it is engaged in the highway and heavy construction business as a general contractor. During the course of 1980, Park purchased at its Minneapolis, Minnesota place of business directly from points and places located outside the State of Minnesota goods and merchandise valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, both AGC and Park are, respectively, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent Teamsters is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[4] Several posttrial motions were made to me and are resolved as follows:

1. Counsel for Respondent Teamsters have moved that certain data relating to the business of Jacobs Trucking Company with Rauenhorst Construction Co., which was obtained following the close of the trial in this case as a result of a subpoena enforcement proceeding, be admitted into evidence in this case. Specifically, they request that the data set forth in par. 5 of their motion, dated April 30, 1982, be admitted into evidence. The motion is granted.

2. Counsel for Respondent Teamsters have also moved to strike the rebuttal testimony of witness Keith Kramer on the ground that such testimony was improper rebuttal. The motion is denied. However, I discredit all the testimony of witness Kramer, both on direct and rebuttal, unless the testimony was corroborated, because of admittedly untruthful testimony given by Kramer at the hearing (Tr. 2264, 2294-2295).

[5] The 1978-1981 agreement between AGC and the Teamsters involved 74 bound AGC members and 64 other members who signed the master agreement individually. The 1981-1984 agreement covered 33 bound AGC members and 15 others who signed individually. Park, a charging party in this case, is an influential member of AGC but, in recent years, has elected to sign the area agreement with the Teamsters on an individual basis. Teamsters Local 221 has in excess of 2000 members, of whom 650-700 are employed in the highway and heavy industry. Of this number, about 200-250 are unionized ITOs.

areawide agreements that are worked out by the AGC Labor Relations Committee and the various unions it recognizes. Drivers who are engaged in the highway and heavy industry may be conventional employees who operate company equipment. They may also be multiple truck owners (MTOs) who drive their own equipment, who employ one or more individuals to drive equipment owned by the MTOs. The status of ITOs and MTOs lies at the heart of this dispute.

For a number of years, MTOs and ITOs were covered by the terms of the 3-year agreements, which were negotiated by the AGC and the Teamsters. The more recent agreements, including the 1978–1981 agreement that was in effect when the events in this case arose, make only a few references to ITOs. Specifically, they provided that an employer could hire employees who own their own equipment or who operate equipment belonging to someone other than the general contractor and that such "employees" would be covered by all the terms and conditions of the master agreement, except seniority. The master agreement also provided that the rate of rental for ITO or MTO equipment was outside its scope. It also provided that general contractors were obliged to pay overload fines imposed on ITOs for exceeding the legal load limits on public highways and, if a contractor failed to pay fringe benefits called for by the agreement, he could be required to pay the ITOs with two checks, one for wages and the other for truck rental.

Over the years many general contractors, both those covered by AGC-Teamsters agreements as well as those who operated strictly on a nonunion or open shop basis, began to hire ITOs through the use of truck brokers.[6] The names of Jacobs Trucking Company, and its owner, Sy Jacobs, Buesing Brothers Trucking, Inc., and Rucki Trucking Company, figure most prominently in these proceedings as brokers, although there are other brokers who perform the same function on a smaller scale in the Twin Cities area. These brokers also subcontract trucking jobs, using their own vehicles and their own employees. ITOs are employed strictly on a day-to-day basis and are referred from job to job each day during the construction season.[7] As more fully described later in this decision, it is the function of the broker to match a contractor's daily requirements with truckers drawn from the ranks of ITOs who have requested referrals. For this service, the broker normally charges a commission amounting to 10 percent of the hourly rate paid by the contractor to the trucker.

While at one time almost all ITOs referred to construction jobs in the Twin Cities area were Local 221 members, the Union began to notice that the number of unionized truckers in the highway and heavy industry was in decline, as was the number of conventional company drivers, while the number of nonunion drivers utilizing the services of truck brokers began to increase. It cites several reasons for a decline in the employment of union members generally in this industry. Among them are the winding down of the Federal highway construction program and poor overall economic conditions, as well as a growing practice on the part of some contractors to hire ITOs rather than to employ company drivers on company seniority lists to drive company equipment. There is some evidence in the record suggesting a belief on the part of some general contractors that it cheaper in the long run to employ ITOs than to operate company-owned trucks with company drivers. The specter of union members getting a smaller piece of a shrinking pie prompted the Respondent Union to take the actions that gave rise to this case.

On August 1, 1979, Holzschuh Truck Leasing Company filed an 8(b)(4)(A) and (B) charge against Local 221 in Case 18–CC–804. In this charge, Holzschuh alleged that the Union was unlawfully pressuring certain general contractors, such as McCrossan, Johnson, and Bel-View, to apply the terms of the master AGC-Teamsters agreement to owner-operators (ITOs). Specifically, Holzschuh objected to the demands by the Union that ITOs, who are hired on a daily basis to supplement an employer's regular cadre of company drivers, be brought under the provisions of the same union-security clause that applies to company drivers. This case (referred to here as the Holzschuh case), was referred by the Regional Office to the Division of Advice (Advice) in the Office of the General Counsel in Washington, D.C., for a determination whether to issue an unfair labor practice complaint.

On or about November 29, 1979, Advice notified the Regional Office that this charge (and others which had been filed alleging essentially the same thing) should be dismissed because, in the view of Advice, ITOs were employees, not independent contractors, so the activity about which Holzschuh complained was simply lawful primary activity aimed at organizing the unorganized or at enforcing the provisions of the union-security clause. The dismissal of the charge in the Holzschuh case was appealed by Holzschuh to the Office of the General Counsel and was reviewed a second time, on this occasion by the Office of Appeals (Appeals). By memo dated March 26, 1980, Appeals took the same position as did Advice and directed the Regional Director to dismiss the pending charge. Thus, for the second time in a period of 6 months, the General Counsel of the Board determined that the owner-operators, whose status is in question in this case, were employees concerning whom certain pressures might lawfully be exerted by the Union because the pressures were primary in character.

Armed with this official determination concerning the status of ITOs, Respondent Teamsters began to take certain actions about which the General Counsel now complains. It wrote letters to several leading contractors who had been employing nonunion ITOs referred by brokers. It objected to the fact that these contractors had been employing individuals who were not members of the Union in violation of the union-security clause in the master agreement and further objected to the fact that these contractors had not been making payments to the health and welfare and retirement funds for the nonunion ITOs they had been employing. The Union threatened

[6] In this decision, the term ITOs will henceforth be normally used to include MTOs as well since, with rare exception, the same facts and circumstances pertaining to one affect the other.

[7] In Minnesota, the construction season begins in mid-May and usually lasts until sometime in November. It normally has about 100 working days.

arbitration to collect from the contractors union dues that were owed to the Union by the nonunion "employees" they had been using, and to collect fringe benefit payments that were due under the master agreement for all trucking employees. Although the potential liability of the several contractors involved in these claims was never actually determined, AGC admits that this potential liability, taken together with an official determination that ITOs were employees within the meaning of the Act (and presumably within the meaning of the master agreement), were sufficient incentives to prompt several leading contractors to enter into negotiations with the Teamsters, under the watchful eye of the AGC, respecting the terms and conditions of employment of ITOs during the 1980 construction season.

These negotiations ultimately led to the execution of a Memorandum of Understanding on April 25, 1980.[8] Several unbound members, including Park, signed the memorandum at later dates. The agreement expressly recited that it was being entered into to resolve a dispute that had arisen because of the determination by Advice that independent truck operators and multitruck operators were employees. It extended to ITOs and drivers for MTOs (who, in many instances, were also the truck owners themselves) the provisions of the union-security clause in the master agreement. It set forth a further provision that ostensibly gave the Union "equal opportunity" to refer trucks to general contractors but which, in fact, gave the Union preference in referring trucks. It obligated contractors to call the Union first with a request for trucks. Only thereafter might a contractor call other sources when the Union was unable to provide the number and type of trucks that were requested.

The memorandum obligated all contractors to pay fringe benefits for all ITO and MTO drivers they might employ, regardless of source, and to pay no less than the prevailing rental rates for trucks and drivers for the type of trucks employed.[9] It also released contracting employers from liability for union dues and fringe fund payments that the Union had claimed were due and owing by virtue of the previous failure of these employers to apply the union-security provisions of the master agreement and make fringe fund contributions for truckers whom they had hired because of the assumption that such individuals were independent contractors.

After making preliminary inquiries among its members whether they wished the Union to establish a hiring hall, the Union instituted the operation of a referral system for ITOs beginning in the spring of 1980. This referral system operated actively during the 1980 season and, at the height of the season, referred 30 or more drivers in a workday. The net effect of the operation of the union referral system was to reduce the business of brokers such as Jacobs, Buesing, and Rucki. It also had an adverse economic impact on nonunion independent truckers, all of whom were theoretically eligible to be referred through the union hall (and in accordance with the rate established by Bailey's May 9 memorandum) but most of whom sought daily employment with general contractors either through brokers or through direct solicitation. It should be noted that the rates normally paid to truckers referred by brokers differed slightly from the rate established by the Union. In 1980, the owner of a brokered tandem dump truck normally charged $30 per hour, of which 10 percent was retained by the broker. However, no fringe benefits (amounting to $1.30 an hour during 1980) were paid by the broker, whereas the union rate was $29 plus fringes. Moreover, having referred a driver through its hall, the Union was then in a position to police the provision of the union-security clause in the master agreement, which required membership after the eighth day of employment at a jobsite. Brokers referred both union members and nonmembers alike without concern for membership status. When this system came into full operation in the summer of 1980, nonunion truckers formed the ICTO, an organization having approximately 150 members, and filed some of the charges that resulted in the consolidated complaint in this case.[10]

On February 11, 1981, the Union and AGC met in the first of several negotiating sessions that led up to the execution of the 1981–1984 master agreement. At this time, the ICTO charges against the Union were pending in Advice to which they had been referred by the Regional Office, and the parties to the negotiations were operating under an assumption, if not a total agreement, that ITO and MTO drivers were employees within the meaning of the Act. The Memorandum of Understanding was still in effect and would expire of its own terms on April 30, the same day that the 1978–1981 agreement was shceduled to expire.

The opening session of negotiations in this industry were described by one participant as a "ha ha" session, during which the parties exchanged proposals, examined the demands of the other party in cursory fashion, and in general express to opposing negotiators the thought that there is no way that their demands will be accepted. The purpose of the first few sessions is simply to "sniff out" the other party and determine what it really wants and what items among its proposals it may be willing to abandon. Serious negotiating sessions come later as the expiration date of the old contract draws near and a new construction season approaches.

There is little doubt that union representatives adamantly insisted at the first negotiating meeting on the inclusion in the forthcoming agreement of language satisfactory to itself respecting ITOs and the subcontracting of work. At the second session, held on March 3, 1981,

[8] William Gary, the executive director of the AGC and the principal negotiator of its labor agreements, studiously avoided any official connections with the discussions that took place during the winter of 1979–1980 leading up to the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding. He ultimately signed the memorandum at the insistence of two prominent members of the AGC, who were told by the Teamsters that the Union would not sign the document unless Gary signed, thereby lending to it the official approval of the AGC.

[9] Union President Paul Bailey sent a memo to union contractors notifying them that the Union had set up a hiring hall for independents and stating further that the rental rate for the 1980 season would be $29 per hour, plus fringe benefits. His memo indicated also that the ITOs referred by the Union would bill the contractors directly and that a minimum of 4 hours work would be required of any contractor who hired a truck through the union hiring hall.

[10] During the summer of 1980, the Union did an aggressive job of checking construction sites and of insisting to contractors and truckers alike that ITOs employed on those sites carry union cards.

Union Secretary-Treasurer Chris Van Lith offered management a proposal that stated that "for the preservation of work, there shall be no subcontracting of any work covered under the classifications of this agreement." The actual agreement, concluded before the expiration date of the old contract and formally executed in May 1981, contains no provision forbidding the subcontracting of work. The present contract does contain a "union standards" provision governing subcontracted work to be performed at the jobsite.[11] These provisions were included because, during the time that elapsed between the commencement of negotiations and the conclusion of the agreement, the Office of the General Counsel had reversed its earlier determination and had concluded that ITOs are, in fact, independent contractors and not employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act. Hence the Union chose to abandon Van Lith's proposal.

On March 23, 1981, Advice notified the Regional Office and presumably the parties that, based on a revised assessment of the status of ITOs, it was authorizing the issuance of an unfair labor practice complaint on the 8(b)(4) and 8(e) charges filed in 1980 by ICTO and others.[12] On receipt of this opinion, counsel for the Union immediately informed the Regional Office and the AGC that the Union would be willing to settle the temporary injunction aspect of the proposed 8(b)(4) and 8(e) complaint, but that it would not concede the merits of the new Advice determination or admit the commission of any unfair labor practices. Union counsel also informed the Regional Director that Local 221 would not thereafter attempt to enforce the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding, an agreement which at that point had slightly more than one month to run. Presumably, its bargaining posture in pending negotiations was similarly revised, as the results of the bargaining reflect an attempt to adhere to the theory that ITOs are independent contractors, not employees.

Union President Bailey testified that, during the winter and early spring of 1981, he received calls from several company drivers on the seniority list at Park inquiring about when they might be called back to work. Bailey could give them no definite reply. Park is one of the principal general contractors in the Twin Cities area and an individual signatory to both the master agreement and the Memorandum of Understanding. In recent years, Park had sold a substantial number of its trucks and, as a result, had permanently laid off a number of its regular company drivers. It also utilized ITOs who were referred to it by Jacobs Trucking Company.

On March 16, Bailey sent Business Agent Robert Bonhoff, who normally services the Park account, to speak with Richard Carlson, president of Park, concerning the manning of a forthcoming Interstate 94 (I-94) highway construction job on which Park had received a substantial dirt-moving contract. Bonhoff asked Carlson if he was going to man the job with company drivers and Carlson was noncommittal. Bonhoff reported back to Bailey that he felt that Park was going to subcontract all or part of that job.[13]

Bailey testified that, in March 1981, during the same period of time that he was receiving complaints from Park employees who had not been recalled, he also noticed that Park was utilizing ITOs for hauling at several jobsites, among them the Metropolitan Airport and two large construction sites in downtown Minneapolis at First Street and Marquette and at Fourth Street and Eleventh Avenue. In light of these complaints and observations made by Bailey, Van Lith, the secretary-treasurer, sent a telegram to Park claiming that Park was in violation of schedule E of the Memorandum of Understanding by utilizing subcontractors to circumvent the intention of the memorandum. Van Lith characterized his complaint to Park as a grievance, requested that Park contact him to resolve the grievance, and stated that he would submit the grievance to the State Joint Committee if it was not resolved immediately. Van Lith also asked Park in his telegram for a prejob conference concerning work that Park was scheduled to start on I-94 near downtown Minneapolis. When Park made no response to Van Lith's telegram, Bailey sent Park a second telegram, dated March 28, stating that he had learned that Park was subcontracting work on I-94 and other projects and that, pursuant to article 11 of the master agreement,[14] he was referring the matter to the prime contractor to resolve the dispute.

On March 30, Van Lith requested that a meeting be held to resolve the outstanding dispute with Park. A meeting was held the following day between Union and Park officials at the office of Park's counsel. At this meeting, union counsel asked Park to agree not to sub-

[11] In addition, the present contract does contain a provision relative to the involvement of primary contractors in the mediation of disputes arising between its subcontractors and the Union (art. 16) and a section concerning ITOs, referred to as individual truck owners (schedule 4). The latter section severely modified the provision in the former Memorandum of Understanding concerning referrals, stating only that the Union agreed to continue to refer ITOs when requested and leaving it to employers to utilize this service or not as they chose. Schedule 4 also provides that the Union reserved the right to request bargaining concerning ITOs if and when a court of final resort should determine that the Union might lawfully represent them.

[12] Despite the ponderous size of the record in this overtried case, the Advice memorandum of March 1981 was not included, so it is not possible to compare with precision the conflicting determinations from Washington that have given rise to so much mischief in this situation. Presumably the brief of the General Counsel follows the revised findings and rationale of the Division of Advice. The second decision by Advice is apparently not based on anything approaching newly discovered evidence or on a different factual setting than the one that gave rise to the original determination. The basis for its change of heart seems to be a revised assessment of the law and an abandonment of any reliance on the holding of the Board in Teamsters Local 982 (Barker Trucking), 181 NLRB 515 (1970), affg.. Teamsters Joint Council 42 v. NLRB, 450 F.2d 1322 (D.C. Cir. 1971), regarding the independent contractor issue.

[13] Carlson testified that they discussed subcontracting to Sy Jacobs and that Bonhoff told him that, if Jacobs went on the job, there would be trouble. Bonhoff denies any discussion relating to Jacobs and specifically denied this statement concerning Jacobs. I found Bonhoff to be a truthful witness and Carlson to be an unreliable one, so I credit Bonhoff's denial.

[14] Art. 11 of the 1978–1981 agreement, entitled "subcontractor," provided: "In the event a subcontractor is involved in a controversy, the Union shall be obligated to bring it to the attention of the prime contractor. The prime contractor shall have at least 48 hours to attempt a settlement of the controversy before a work stoppage is brought about. It shall not be a violation of this Agreement, including art. 17 (the no-strike, no-lockout provision), if a stoppage of work occurs due to the failure to arrive at an agreement." A similar provision may be found in the current contract as part of art. 16.

contract out any work during the remainder of its existing contract with the Union, which had 30 days left to run. Park declined and on the following day the Union posted pickets, or "banners," in front of Park's main facility and at several of its jobsites. As a result of this action, Park employees employed in several different trades stopped work. The picket lines were maintained until April 15.

On Friday, April 10, Carlson and Bailey had a dinner meeting at a restaurant known as Little Jack's to discuss the picketing that was still in progress. Bailey complained to Park that he was subcontracting work while 18 company drivers on the Park seniority list were not working. He also complained to Carlson that the latter had broken his word, assertedly given the previous year in settlement of a grievance, that ITOs would not be used for Saturday work.[15] Bailey mentioned to Carlson the place where Park was currently using subcontractors. He also suggested that, if Carlson had insufficient trucks for regular company drivers because of the sale of company trucks that had taken place, Park might lease trucks for company drivers to operate. He also told Carlson that he wanted an agreement only for the balance of the current contract. Carlson objected to Bailey's suggestions and said that he might have to discontinue subcontracting. Bailey then gave Carlson the names of some union ITOs who would be interested in working for Park as ITOs.

Carlson told Bailey that he was not going to begin to perform any work on the I-94 contract for a while until he resolved a dispute with some black truckers who were also picketing Park at the I-94 project. Bailey then asked Carlson to drop certain suits and unfair labor practice charges that Park had pending against the Union. Carlson refused the latter request, saying that the issue of whether ITOs were independent contractors had to be finally determined.

Nothing was resolved at this meeting. However, on the following day, Carlson, Van Lith, Bailey, and Duane Prairie, a Park official, met at the Sheraton Northeast Hotel. They briefly discussed the status of negotiations between AGC and the Union, which were then in progress, before engaging in renewed negotiations concerning the picketing of Park projects. The Union demanded that Park put Teamsters members to work and refrain from subcontracting work for the remainder of the 1978–1981 agreement. It also asked that all civil actions and NLRB charges filed by Park against the Union be dropped. Carlson agreed to use Teamsters members for construction jobs other than the I-94 job but refused to drop any unfair labor practice charges or civil suits. He mentioned that he actually had two dirt-moving contracts on I-94, one of which was a small job that was nearly completed, and he would like to finish the small job soon. This meeting concluded without an agreement. However, Carlson said that he would be in touch with the Union early the following week.

On April 14, Carlson phoned Van Lith and told him that he would agree to use company drivers on the three construction projects that were currently in progress and would also use company drivers on the small I-94 job, which was nearing completion, if the Union would withdraw its pickets. Van Lith agreed and pickets were withdrawn the following day.

[15] Company drivers employed under the terms and conditions of the master agreement must be paid time-and-a-half for Saturday work. However, ITOs are hired at a flat hourly rate, irrespective of the number of hours a day or days per week they may work. In 1980, during certain rush jobs, Park had used ITOs for Saturday work and the Union had grieved this practice.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Status of ITOs and MTOs as Employees or Independent Contractors

All parties have correctly focused on the central issue in this case, and some have gone so far as to say that the charges here were filed in order to obtain a final and binding determination of that issue. In my opinion, the ITOs and MTOs involved in this proceeding are not employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the National Labor Relations Act. They are independent contractors and they are clearly so. No other conclusion is possible either under the case law as it has developed to this time or under the ponderous amount of evidence on this point, which both sides have placed in the record in this proceeding.

A brief review of the law indicates that, at one time, the Board, on facts not very dissimilar from those found in this case, concluded that dumptruck operators who haul material to and from construction sites are employees of the contractors for whom they worked and that disputes arising between unions and general contractors involving such dump truck operators are primary in character. Teamsters Local 982 (Barker Trucking), supra. This determination was upheld in 1971 by the District of Columbia Circuit[16] and serves as the principal basis, if not the only basis, for the Union's contention that ITOs and MTOs are employees and that its disputes with AGC and Park are primary in character.

Following the Barker Trucking case, the Board rendered a similar decision regarding the status of dumptruck operators in Associated General Contractors of California, 201 NLRB 311 (1973). However, that decision was reversed by the Ninth Circuit, which concluded that dumptruck operators are in fact independent contractors.[17] The Board accepted the remand of that decision and acceded to the Ninth Circuit's determination, but only as the law of that particular case. Associated General Contractors of California, 239 NLRB 686 (1978).

However, in a subsequent decision, the Board went far beyond accepting the Ninth Circuit's ruling in the first California dumptruck case as the law of that particular case and adopted the Ninth Circuit's rationale as its own, thereby effectively abandoning the Barker Trucking holding mentioned above. In Teamsters Local 36 (California Dump Truck), 249 NLRB 386 (1980), another case arising in southern California, the Board concluded that dumptruck operators are in truth and fact independent contractors, not employees, and that pressures brought to bear by unions to bring them under the terms and conditions of collective-bargaining agreements are secondary in character. Apparently, the District of Columbia Circuit also abandoned its own Barker Trucking decision, inasmuch as that court upheld the Board's determination in Teamsters Local 36 and also concluded that dumptruck operators are independent contractors.[18]

The evidence in this case in no way differentiates ITOs and MTOs in the Twin Cities area from dumptruck operators in southern California. A great deal of effort was expended to distinguish ITOs and MTOs employed by AGC members from those employed by nonunion contractors but no significant distinctions emerged. The evidence submitted by all parties on the independent contractor issue was similar, if not identical, and differed, if at all, in matters of emphasis and detail rather than in dispositive substance. Respondent Union would have the Board concentrate almost exclusively on the jobsite activity of truckdrivers, where there is a marked similarity in the routine followed by drivers who are conventional employees, and ITOs and MTOs, who are not. However, the courts have repeatedly stated that "the total factual context" and "all the incidents of the relationship must be assessed and weighed, with no one factor being decisive." NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 258 (1968); Associated General Contractors of California v. NLRB, supra; Democratic Union Organizing Committee Local 777 v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862 (D.C. Cir. 1979); Teamsters Local 36, supra. If we avoid the temptation to engage in tunnel vision and look at the manner in which ITOs (and MTOs) engage in business throughout the entire course of their operations, their status as independent contractors becomes well defined.

Conventional company drivers are employed at a fixed hourly wage which, in the case of the employees of AGC contractors, is set forth by 3-year written contracts which establish not only basic wages (and stated yearly increases) but fringe benefit payments as well. Such drivers are entitled to time-and-a-half for Saturday work and for all work in excess of 8 hours in any one day. The trucks they drive are entitled to the companies they work for and the cost of operating and maintaining those trucks is borne entirely by their employers. In a normal day's work, company drivers report to their employer's principal place of business, are dispatched to a jobsite or jobsites, and return to the employer's shop or garage, regardless of how long it takes them to drive to the construction site, the quarry, or the batch plant from which, or to which, they are expected to haul materials. The only responsibility exercised by a company driver is to operate his employer's equipment in a safe and sensible manner, to engage in first-line maintenance such as checking the gas, the oil, and the tires, and possibly to hose down the vehicle when it becomes very dirty or caked with materials that have been hauled. A company driver bears no out-of-pocket cost for any aspect of the operation of the vehicle, except perhaps for a speeding ticket if he violates state law when driving on a public highway. As one ITO witness put it, a company driver has nothing invested in a job but his lunchbox.

ITOs own their own trucks and bear the entire entrepreneurial risk which is incident to such ownership. They select the year, model, and condition of the trucks they buy, finance the purchase of the trucks and any equipment used in connection with the operation of the trucks, and dispose of their trucks at their sole discretion, retaining any proceeds they might be able to derive from the sale. The entire cost of operation is borne by the ITOs, who purchase all gas, oil, lubricants, antifreeze, and similar items involved in routine operation. They pay the cost of all maintenance and repairs,[19] other than for damage to their vehicles that can be directly attributable to a general contractor in such a manner that the contractor would be civilly liable if he did not furnish repairs in kind. ITOs are paid only from the time they arrive at the jobsite and only until they leave the jobsite (or dumpsite), regardless of how far they may have to come in order to start work. The hourly fees earned by ITOs cover both their services in driving their trucks and the total cost of maintenance and operation of the trucks. It is a constant fee, regardless of the number of hours employed in any one day or in any week. Because this rate is the same regardless of the difficulty of a particular job, the net earnings of ITOs vary considerably from job to job even though the hourly rate does not change, because the hauling distance, the road grades encountered, the type of material being hauled, and other external conditions can greatly affect the cost per mile of operating a vehicle. No such entrepreneurial risk is borne by company drivers, whose compensation is the same regardless of how easy or how difficult a given haul may be.

The hourly rate paid to ITOs normally remains the same throughout a construction season and is generally set by the brokers who refer the ITOs on the basis of what they estimate the traffic will bear. It is never established by written contract. Indeed, the daily hauling arrangement between contractors and ITOs is generally an oral one which is concluded by the broker making the referral. As a result, the first inquiry which a prudent ITO makes when offered a referral is the rate to be paid and the nature of the items to be hauled. However, ITOs can and have gone directly to contractors to bid for work at less than the going rate and some have even tried to obtain work for more than the going rate. In a depressed market, the latter is difficult to do, although the former is not at all unusual. Hauling jobs undertaken by ITOs are not always quoted on an hourly basis, and it is not unusual for a contractor to hire ITOs on a ton-mile or load basis.

The relationship between a contractor and a conventional company driver is an ongoing one. Construction work is seasonal and many employees are laid off at the end of the year. However, the master agreements have clear and detailed provisions for individual company seniority rosters and for the recall of laid-off drivers at the beginning of a new season. One witness for the Respondent Union testified that he worked 35 years for the same contractor and is now retired from that firm. ITOs work strictly on a day-to-day basis, even on long-term jobs where prospects are good for employment lasting several weeks. They never accrue seniority and the master agreement is explicit on this point. Most contractors employ ITOs only as a supplement to their regular cadre of company drivers so, even if a particular job is long term in character, the nature of the contractors' other business may dictate that company drivers be assigned to that site each day in fluctuating numbers. ITOs get what work is left over. Accordingly, at or near the end of each day an ITO calls the broker who dispached him and asks for work the following day. The broker may refer him back to the same job, to another job for another contractor, or not at all. If an ITO should ask the contractor's job superintendent for work the following day, the superintendent will normally refer him to his broker, who dispatches ITOs to jobsites depending on the calls he has received from all of his customers. Conversely, if a contractor who normally does business with a broker desires ITOs the following day, he must make a daily request, stating the number and kind of trucks desired and the location to which they should be dispatched. Normally, an order of this kind is placed only as to quantity and quality of vehicles desired, without reference to the names of the owners or drivers of the vehicles. From these orders, dispatches are then made.[20]

[19] There is evidence in the record that, from time to time, a contractor or his employees may give an ITO on a job some gas or oil, or may lend him a tool for a quick repair job. This is simply a matter of a small accommodation based on friendship or "first aid" for a truck. Any significant repairs are handled by ITOs at their expense, and breakdowns of ITO trucks for any significant periods of time result in a deduction in the compensation ultimately paid.

For his part, if an ITO does not desire to work on a given day, he does not need to ask for time off. He simply refrains from calling a broker on the preceeding afternoon and is not dispatched. ITOs are free to work for one or more brokers during the same season and frequently do so. They are also free to solicit jobs directly from contractors. Some ITOs advertise, either in local papers, the yellow pages of the phone book, or over the radio, and obtain work in that manner from the general public. The terms of any such employment are necessarily set by the ITO and his customer at the time the engagement is agreed on.

Company drivers are paid periodically by checks which remit to each employee the amounts which remain after taxes and social security payments are deducted. Union dues are frequenty checked off in addition to deductions required by law. ITOs who are referred by brokers are not paid by the contractors at all but by the broker, who in turn bills the contractor. ITOs prepare periodic statements and bill their broker, attaching to their statements daily timecards signed by job superintendents as evidence of the fact that they have worked the time which is set forth in the billing. These cards are ultimately transmitted by the broker to the contractor with the broker's weekly or monthly invoice, which will normally contain billings for the services of several ITOs. The contractor then pays the broker who pays the ITO after deducting the brokerage commission, although such payments do not necessarily take place in this order. The broker is responsible for paying the ITO regardless of whether he is paid or when he is paid by the general contractor. In a depressed economy, contractors are frequently slow to pay, while others follow this policy regardless of general business conditions. One of the substantial benefits of referral by a broker, rather than employment through direct solicitation, is that the ITO is assured of payment with reasonable promptness. When referred by a broker, if the contractor never pays, it is the broker, not the ITO, who absorbs the loss. This feature of commercial life in the highway and heavy construction industry has been experienced from time to time by several of the brokers involved in this litigation, who have paid drivers while not being paid by the contractor to whom the driver was referred. In the first California dumptruck case discussed above, the respondent union therein claimed that owner operators were employees of the brokers who dispatched them, not employees of the contractors who were ultimately responsible for payment. In this case, the Respondent Union maintains that ITOs are employees of the contractors, not employees of the brokers. In light of the standard payment arrangements between and among these parties, there is even less basis for finding an employment relationship here than there was in the California case, since that most fundamental of all employment factors, namely, payment by employer to employee, is totally missing here, except when the job is directly solicited and the contractor is directly billed by the ITO. The latter arrangement occurs only in a minority of cases.

In any one summer, an ITO who is regularly employed will work for several contractors. Indeed, he may work for several contractors even in the course of a single week or during the course of a single day, if the first job to which he is referred finishes and the broker who refers him is able to find work with another contractor to complete the day. An ITO is free to reject a job when offered or to drive off the job after he arrives. Depending on the availability of other work and the size of his bank account, an ITO may leave a job abruptly in the middle of the day if the job involves hauling of material other than the kind which was represented to him when he agreed to the referral, or if a contractor's employee is abusing the ITOs equipment in the course of loading.[21] No such option is open to a company employee, who risks serious discipline for leaving a job without permission. On the other hand, a company employee would simply not be inclined to leave for the reasons which normally prompt an ITO to remove his equipment.

On rare occasions, a contractor may have reason to ask an ITO to leave a jobsite. Except in emergency situations, a contractor will normally vent his displeasure with an ITO directly to the broker who referred him rather than to the ITO and will ask the broker that the ITO not be referred again. The principal source of contractor displeasure with ITOs runs to the nature of the equipment furnished, not to the driving performance of the ITO. Likewise, an ITO referred by a broker will normally take up any disagreement with a contractor first with the broker and ask the broker to straighten out the problem with the contractor. When the construction season is in full swing, a busy broker or his associate will visit jobsites frequently, both to cement relations with general contractors and to iron out any disputes that may have arisen with ITOs. Few such disputes do arise since ITOs are rarely on the same jobsite for lengthy periods of time and experienced brokers know, prior to referral, which ITOs do not work well with which contractors.

[20] In the case of an MTO, the owner of the vehicle may be the person who is referred to the contractor but the vehicle may arrive at the jobsite driven by someone other than the owner who has been hired by the contractor to drive for that day. Such substitution of drivers is normally not a basis for rejecting the job referral by the general contractor.

[21] All witnesses seem to agree that heavy concrete chunks make the least desirable loads because they can easily damage the equipment, either during loading or hauling, and because the weight of concrete adds to gasoline consumption and general wear and tear on the vehicle.

At the jobsite and during the actual hauling operation, ITOs must follow the same regimen as a company driver, and it is because of this similarity of activity that the Respondent Union argues that both are employees of the same employer. However, these similarities are necessitated by the facts and circumstances of the job, not because of the relationship that has been established between the ITOs and the contractors. Both ITOs and company drivers normally arrive at the job at or about the same time, line up in the same line to be loaded or to dump materials obtained from another site, and drive over the same routes to the same dumpsite. In the course of performing these duties, both company drivers and ITOs are subject to the directions of the contractor's job superintendent, the company loader, the dumpsite foreman, or the grader, and both are subject to company safety regulations. At a jobsite involving a mixed assortment of company drivers and ITOs, it is difficult to see how the operation could proceed efficiently in any other manner. However, the fact that ITOs must take instructions from their customers should not serve to convert a relationship which began—and will end—at arm's length into something different than what it started out to be. Accordingly, in light of all the factors discussed above, I conclude that ITOs and MIOs are independent contractors.

B. The Memorandum of Understanding

The General Counsel asserts that the Memorandum of Understanding concluded by the Respondent AGC and the Respondent Union in 1980 violates Section 8(e) of the Act for several reasons enumerated in the consolidated complaint. For its part, the Respondent Union contends that at all times the actions it took, including the negotiation and execution of the Memorandum of Understanding, were geared to preserving job opportunities for its members who are employees of AGC contractors. Accordingly, the Union argues its efforts were protected by the work preservation exception to Section 8(b)(4) and 8(e) of the Act which was judicially created by the Supreme Court decision in Woodwork Mfrs. v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612 (1967). In Woodwork Mfrs., the Supreme Court, relying heavily on the legislative history rather than the language of Section 8(e) and 8(b)(4), held that a refusal by employees to handle the products of other employees—an act ostensibly outlawed by the literal language in the above-cited sections of the Act—is permissible when the refusal is prompted by a desire to preserve the traditional job opportunities of striking (or boycotting) employees, because such a refusal is primary in character and is directed principally at the relationship between these employees and their own employer. The frequently quoted language of the decision which seeks to differentiate a primary from a secondary boycott in a work-preservation situation is stated as follows in Woodwork Mfrs., supra at 644–645.

> The determination whether the "will not handle" sentence of Rule 17 (of the challenged work rules) and its enforcement violated § 8(e) and § 8(b)(4)(B) cannot be made without an inquiry into whether, under all the surrounding circumstances, the Union's objective was preservation of work for [the primary employer's] employees, or whether the agreements and boycott were tactically calculated to satisfy union objectives elsewhere. Were the latter the case . . . the boycotting employer would be a neutral bystander and the agreement or boycott would, within the intent of Congress, become secondary. There need not be an actual dispute with the boycotted employer . . . for the activity to fall within this category so long as the tactical object of the agreement and its maintenance is that employer, or benefits to other than the boycotting employees or other employees of the primary employer, thus making the agreement or boycott secondary in its aim. The touchstone is whether the agreement or its maintenance is addressed to the labor relations of the contracting employer vis-a-vis his own employees. This will not always be a simple test to apply. But "[h]owever difficult the drawing of lines more nice than obvious, the statute compels the task."

Despite restrictions on a literal reading of the statute enjoined by the Supreme Court, the statutory language in question has been used to define violations of the Act in certain stylized situations without any additional findings of motive, object, or surrounding circumstances, even in the face of a work preservation claim. A contract between a labor organization and an employer, which requires the latter to treat independent contractors as employees and apply to them the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement designed to be applicable only to statutory employees, is a violation of Section 8(e) of the Act, and work preservation is no defense to such tactics. Teamsters Local 36, supra; Teamsters Local 814 (Santini Bros.), 223 NLRB 752, enfd. 546 F.2d 989 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Retail Clerks Local 1288 v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 858 (D.C. Cir. 1968); Musicians Local 802 (Huntington Town House), 225 NLRB 559 (1976). The net effect of such agreements normally is to require independent contractors to abide by the union-security provisions of the primary agreement and to become union members within 30 days after employment (or within 8 days in the building and construction industry). The Memorandum of Understanding at issue in this case contained a conventional union-security clause tailored to the building and construction industry and required, by its terms, all independent contractors hired by AGC members to become union members after working on a job for 8 days. The clause in question violated Section 8(e) and the Union's effort to obtain that clause violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) and (B) of the Act.[22]

The Memorandum of Understanding required signatory employees to pay to the joint trustees who administer the pension and the health and welfare benefit funds the same hourly contribution that they are obligated to make for bargaining unit employees. There is no evidence that union membership is a requirement for eligibility to participate in these funds, and there is uncontradicted testimony that any trucker can draw benefits from the fund so long as he meets the uniform requirement of working a stated number of hours during a calendar quarter for contributing employers. It appears, therefore, that this provision in the Memorandum of Understanding defines a primary obligation between the Union and AGC members, to which independent contractors are third-party beneficiaries. Whether a union may lawfully insist to impasse that contributions be made to fringe benefit funds on behalf of individuals who are not members of the bargaining unit is not an issue before the Board in this case. What is at issue is whether the obligation that was undertaken between the parties to the memorandum in this respect was primary or secondary in character. I conclude that the obligation in question is primary in character and, therefore, the contract provision covering such payments does not offend Section 8(e) or 8(b)(4) of the Act. Accordingly, I would dismiss as much of the consolidated complaint that alleges a violation respcting this portion of the memorandum.

The General Counsel attacks the ITO referral provision in the memorandum as violative of the Act and cites as authority the Board decision in Teamsters Local 36 (California Dump Truck), supra.[23] In the contract, the parties agreed to an "equal opportunity" clause which did not live up to its billing because it required AGC members to give preferential status to the union hiring hall. When in need of ITOs, an AGC member was required first to call the union hall and then to seek ITOs from some other source if the Union was unable to fill its requirements. If the referral clause in question truly spelled out an "equal opportunity" procedure, placing the Union on the same footing as Jacobs, Rucki, Buesting, and other truck brokers, a convincing argument might be made that the provision complied with the law. However, this provision granted preferential status to the Union and had direct secondary consequences. It was not addressed to the labor relations of contracting employers and their own employees but was, to borrow a phrase, "tactically calculated to satisfy union objectives elsewhere." Woodwork Mfrs., supra at 644 fn. 23.

The Union was interested in securing work not only for its employee members but for a large number of unionized ITOs who sought and utilized the services of the union referral service. Despite the fact that this group of ITOs carried union cards, they were still independent contractors. Bailey championed the interest of this group of ITOs, whose number was estimated at between 200 and 250. He gave the names and addresses of several of these ITOs to contractors and specifically asked contractors to call them in preference to other ITOs. Many contractors, such as Ames Construction Company, Park, and Bolander and Sons Construction Company, had established relationships with brokers such as Rucki and Jacobs and normally called these brokers rather than the Union for ITOs when the need arose. The ITOs who were referred by these brokers might be union members, they might be part of a large category of nonunion truckers who now make up the ICTO, or they might be unaffiliated with any organization. The requirement to call the Union first necessarily disrupted the relationship with these brokers. During the summer of 1980, Bailey, Van Lith, and other union agents regularly visited jobsites of AGC members to police the terms of the memorandum. They insisted the ITOs found on these jobs join the Union and they insisted that the referral provision of the memorandum be observed by AGC members. In short, the referral provision drawn into question by the General Counsel was an instrumentality that was being utilized by the Union to see to it that its members received preferential hiring over ITOs referred by commercial brokers. As a necessary and foreseeable consequence, the job opportunities of other independent contractors, who might be employed by an AGC contractor only after the Union's referral list was exhausted, were clearly diminished. Moreover, contractors ceased doing business with commercial brokers to the degree and extent that they were formerly accustomed to doing business. It is clear that one of the objectives of this preference was to assist the Union in its effort to organize all independent contractors and bring them into the Union fold. Accordingly, the referral clause in question violates Section 8(e) and the Union effort to secure the clause violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) and (B).

The General Counsel attacks another provision of the memorandum, claiming that, by reference or tie-in linking the memorandum with certain provisions of the 1978–1981 master agreement between the Union and AGC, an otherwise neutral or valid undertaking became [22] The parties to this proceeding can take no benefit from the construction industry proviso to Sec. 8(e) of the Act, which sanctions union signatory provisions in a primary contract covering work done at a construction site. It has been consistently held that on-site work, qualifying for protection under the proviso, does not extend to bringing materials to or from a jobsite. Teamsters Joint Council 42 (California Dump Truck), 248 NLRB 808 (1980); Teamsters Local 89, 254 NLRB 783 (1981). I do not read the recent Supreme Court decision relating to the ambit of the construction industry proviso as affecting previous Board decisions excluding hauling to and from jobsites from the shelter of the proviso. Carpenters Local 944 (Woelke & Romero Framing), 239 NLRB 241 (1978); affd. in part sub nom. Woelke & Romero Framing v. NLRB, 456 U.S. 645 (1982).

[23] I do not regard the contract clause litigated in Teamsters Local 36 to be apposite to the provision at issue in this case. In the second California dumptruck case, the contract required owner-operators to undergo a clearance procedure at the union office after reporting to the jobsite. The Board found the clause to be bad but, unlike the administrative law judge, did not regard it as illegal per se but illegal only because surrounding circumstances in the case demonstrated that it was aimed at furthering general union objectives and regulating labor policies of employers other than those who were parties to the agreement. Teamsters Local 36, supra at fn. 1.

violative of Section 8(e) because it permitted self-help or economic action as a means of enforcement. His argument in this regard is somewhat murky. It is well settled that, although the union may employ coercive means to obtain a no-subcontracting agreement in the construction industry, it may not employ coercive means to enforce such an agreement. Any contractual provisions that authorize or approve self-help as a means of enforcing valid no-subcontracting agreements are illegal Painters Local 48 v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 534 (D.C. Cir. 1964); Teamsters Local 89 (McKee, Inc.), 254 NLRB 783 (1981), and cases cited in fns. 15 and 16.

It is equally well settled that if a clause in a contract is ambiguous, the Board will not presume unlawfulness. Teamsters Local 982 (Barker Trucking), supra. The mere fact that a union signatory has taken a position asserting an unlawful interpretation of a clause does not make the clause unlawful unless the employer who is a signatory to the agreement accedes to the Union's unlawful construction. Teamsters Local 89, supra. The General Counsel makes no contention that any unlawful interpretation placed on the memorandum by the Union is likewise the construction given to it by AGC. The record establishes no agreement by the Respondent AGC to any unlawful or arguably unlawful interpretations placed on the memorandum by the Respondent Union. The memorandum provides that:

> No other terms or provisions of the collective bargaining agreement shall apply to any ITO's or drivers for multi-truck owners, except that the grievance arbitration procedure as set forth in Article XII of the current Highway and Heavy collective bargaining agreement shall apply to any differences or disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the provisions of this memorandum of Understanding.

The memorandum does not key into its provisions in article XI (no-subcontracting) of the 1978–1981 agreement nor is there any reference in the memorandum to schedule H, subparagraph 6(g) of the agreement, which permits the Union, under certain circumstances, to strike an employer to collect unpaid fringe benefits or to require the production of records relating to liability for payment of fringe benefits.[24] The above-quoted provision of the memorandum makes reference only to a grievance-arbitration procedure which calls for ultimate arbitration before a three-member panel, which includes a neutral arbitrator and provides that the decision of this panel shall be final. The grievance-arbitration provision in question is backed up by the no-strike, no-lockout provision that is found in article XVII of the expired master agreement, thus eliminating self-help as a means of enforcing secondary obligations that are tied into the memorandum.

[24] Even if such self-help, as authorized by the master agreement, could somehow be dovetailed with the provisions of the Memorandum, a strike, authorized by schedule H, subpar. 6(g), would be a primary strike if undertaken to collect from an AGC member fringe benefit payments due and owing because of hours worked by an ITO.

If we interpret the memorandum in accordance with the plain language of its provisions and do not attempt to read into its language other provisions in other agreements that are nowhere mentioned, there is no basis for finding that the memorandum calls for self-help, as alleged. Therefore, the portion of the consolidated complaint attacking the reference in the memorandum of article XII of the expired agreement should be dismissed.

C. The Negotiations for the 1981–1984 Agreement

At the outset of the negotiations leading up to the execution of the master agreement that is currently in effect, ITOs and MTOs were presumed to be employees, not independent contractors, because of the rulings on this point that the parties had previously received from Advice and Appeals. As the Respondent Union points out in its brief, there were still in existence a large number of individuals in the bargaining unit covered by the negotiations who were employees of AGC contractors by any definition and, despite the pendency of the independent contractor issue in the Office of the General Counsel, it was for and about these employees that the negotiations in question were principally being conducted.

At the second bargaining session, Van Lith handed to AGC negotiators a written proposal which read: "For the preservation of work, there shall be no subcontracting of any work covered under the classifications of this agreement." As noted, there were no exceptions carved into this proposal, either for union signatories or for subcontractors observing union conditions. If adopted, AGC members would have been required to perform all hauling work during the ensuing 3 years with company trucks operated by company drivers, all of whom were and are employees within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act.

Throughout the history of the industry in central Minnesota, contractors utilized their own trucks and their own drivers for hauling work and looked to this source of labor first, hiring ITOs only to supplement their own work force. However, during busy months ITOs were traditionally retained in large numbers because the demand for immediate performance of contracts was so great and so concentrated that the contractor's regular work force could not handle the work. Plainly, if Van Lith's proposal had been adopted, it would have brought about monumental changes in the established practices in the highway and heavy construction industry. General contractors would have been forced to discontinue using all ITOs, either union or nonunion, and would have had to make do at the height of the season with company drivers operating company equipment. Presumably this is why the proposal in question was given such short shrift. However, the fact that a bargaining proposal is extraordinary or even radical in its scope and effect does not mean that it violates Section 8(b)(4) or 8(e) of the Act.

In industrial settings, flat and unqualified no-subcontracting clauses are commonplace features of collective-bargaining negotiations. Far from being illegal, no-subcontracting clauses are mandatory subjects of bargaining, and the Supreme Court has so ruled. Fibreboard Paper

Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964). There does not even seem to be a requirement that such a clause contain, as did Van Lith's proposal, a preface that it is designed "for the preservation of work." The rationale outlined in support of the Fibreboard decision presumed this motivation and set it forth as the major premise for the decision.[25]

Because the collective-bargaining representative for a large number of employees employed by the AGC members who were parties to the negotiations in question, the Union was within its rights, if not within the reasonable prospects, in offering a complete and unqualified no-subcontracting clause to management representatives, and therefore much of the consolidated complaint which is directed at this effort must be dismissed.

D. The Dispute with Park

Park is one of the largest AGC contractors and an individual signatory to the areawide highway and heavy construction agreements. At one time, Carlson from Park was a member of the AGC labor negotiating committee. Park formerly owned more than 30 trucks and employed conventional unionized employees to drive these vehicles. In the years immediately preceding this dispute, Park had sold many of its vehicles and its company seniority roster had shrunk proportionately as its use of ITOs had increased.

In the spring of 1981, Park received a large dirt-moving contract on the I-94 interstate highway project. Even before the main part of the construction season started, Park was busy on about three other projects. Meanwhile, laid-off employees were complaining that they had not been called back to work and union officials had observed trucks operating on Park projects which did not belong to Park. They determined to bring pressure on Park to change this situation. The pressure ultimately resulted in a strike and picketing, which it sought to justify on the basis of two different and mutually inconsistent premises.

Van Lith sent Park what might be termed a telegraphic grievance, which was followed up by a second telegraphic grievance sent by Bailey on March 28. Bailey's telegram invoked article XI of the master agreement, which read:

> In the event a subcontract is involved in a controversy, the Union shall be obligated to bring it to the attention of the prime contractor. The prime contractor shall have at least forty-eight (48) hours to attempt a settlement of the controversy before a work stoppage is brought about. It shall not be a violation to this Agreement, including Article XVII, if a stoppage of work occurs due to the failure to arrive at an agreement.

At a meeting on April 1 held to resolve this dispute, union counsel asked Park to agree to a no-subcontracting clause for the balance of the agreement. Park refused. In a later settlement discussion with Park officials, Van Lith and Bailey said they would pull their pickets if Park would agree not to subcontract any more trucking work and put their own employees on the jobs which were in progress. The testimony of Van Lith and Bailey is inconsistent as was their position vis-a-vis Park. Van Lith testified that the picketing, which began on April 2, took place as a direct result of the failure of the parties to reach an agreement during the meeting of April 1. He further testified that the meeting in question was held to resolve a dispute that had arisen under the existing contract between Park and the Union and had nothing to do with a new contract. He insisted that they were not trying to add any provisions to the existing contract with Park but were merely enforcing the terms of a contract already in effect.

On the other hand, Bailey stated that the nub of the Union's dispute with Park was that it did not want Park to subcontract its work. It wanted Park to agree to hire the employees on Park's seniority list. He noted that there were about 3-1/2 weeks left on the existing contract and testified that the Union was attempting to obtain a no-subcontracting clause with Park for the balance of this contract term.

Enforcing the provisions of an existing agreement, either by arbitration or by self-help, proceeds from the premise that the moving party is entitled to the relief it is seeking under rights conferred by existing contract provisions and that the defaulting party is remiss in failing to live up to obligations it has already agreed to. Seeking to obtain a no-subcontracting clause proceeds from the opposite premise, namely, that under existing contract obligations, the employer is free to subcontract work if he chooses but the Union, being unhappy with the freedom of action the employer currently enjoys, wishes to restrict that right by imposing on the employer additional contract obligations which do not currently exist. The inconsistent allegations in the consolidated complaint simply mirror the ambivalent stance that the Respondent Union took in its dealings with Park in March and April 1981.

As of April 1, 1981, Park was contractually free to subcontract without limitation, inasmuch as the Memorandum of Understanding had been formally discontinued and there was no provision in the master agreement, to which Park adhered, which limited subcontracting beyond certain minimal requirements applicable to ITOs. The Union's resort to article XI (subcontracting) in the master agreement to support its contention with Park was a sham and a pretext designed to provide the Union with a colorable excuse for striking Park in the face of a no-strike clause in its contract. When it threatened Park with strike action and then took the action it threatened, the Union was not enforcing any contractual grievance which it had against Park. It was attempting to force Park to agree to forgo what Park was contractually free to do on April 1, namely, subcontract work to ITOs on I-94 and the three other jobs which were in progress at that time.

The Respondent Union claims that its threats and its strike action were justified by virtue of the Woodwork Mfrs. rule because it was seeking only to preserve the jobs of its employee members who were on Park's seniority roll but who had not been recalled to work. This contention must fail because work preservation is not so broad an umbrella as the Union might wish it to be. Park's dispatching log, which was introduced into evidence, indicates that several ITOs had been dispatched during March and that 12 trucks belonging to Sy Jacobs had been dispatched on April 1. Taking Bailey at his word, several trucks not belonging to Park and necessarily belonging to independent truck owners were repeatedly observed by Bailey and other union members or agents during the month of March immediately preceding the threat that was made on March 28. In light of this evidence it is clear that one of the Union's principal objects in moving against Park was to force Park to get rid of these contractors, i.e., to cease doing business with them and to replace them with his own men. Indeed, an oral agreement to this effect, entered into between Carlson and Van Lith on or about April 14, ultimately brought about and end to the dispute and the picketing.

In Northeastern Indiana Building Trades Council (Centlivre Village Apartments), 148 NLRB 854, 857 (1964), the Board long ago said:

> . . . where, as here, the evidence indicates that an object of picketing, although assertedly directed at obtaining a subcontracting clause valid under the construction industry proviso to 8(e), is to cause a cessation of business between a neutral general contractor and an existing and identified non-union subcontractor, we shall continue to find a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(B).

In this case, the Union cannot even take solace from the contention that it was seeking an agreement authorized by the construction industry proviso because, as noted above, this proviso is inapplicable to hauling to and from construction sites and is limited in its scope to on-site activity. The efforts directed at Park were in furtherance of the Union's dispute with Jacobs and the other nonunion independent contractors who were doing Park's work during March and who might be hired thereafter. While these latter contractors were not identified in Bailey's testimony by name, they were sufficiently identified by class or description to fall within the rule announced in Centlivre. Accoringly, I conclude that the threats and the picketing engaged in by the Respondent Union here violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) and (B) of the Act and the oral agreement or understanding not to use independent truckers on certain jobs, concluded by Park and the Union on or about April 14 in settlement of the dispute, violated Section 8(e) of the Act.

The General Counsel also contends that the strike against Park constituted a violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act, a contention that would necessarily fail if the strike were considered to be merely an effort to enforce the provisions of an existing agreement between these parties. At the time the strike commenced, Park and the Union were parties to a contract that was not due to expire for another 30 days and contained grievance, arbitration, and no-strike provisions that were broad in their scope. As concluded above, one object of the strike was to force Park to enter into an additional understanding not to subcontract work during the remainder of the contract on the I-94 and other construction jobs that were then underway. No suggestion exists that the required 60-day notice for termination or modification of a contract was given by the Union in advance of taking this action. Accordingly, I conclude that, by striking Park during a contract term to force Park to agree to a modification or addition to this agreement the Respondent Union here violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

E. The Liability of Respondent AGC

Respondent AGC argues that it should be absolved from any responsibility and legal consequences for entering into the Memorandum of Agreement that it executed on April 25, 1980, because it was coerced into doing so. The contention is without merit. It is clear that AGC signed the Memorandum reluctantly, but its reluctance in no way mitigates its liability under the Act. AGC and its members were not coerced, in the sense of the common law, into signing the memorandum. They received a substantial quid pro quo for their undertaking, namely, a release from a large potential liability for payment of dues and fringe benefits that would become due and owing if ITOs were ultimately found to be employees governed by the master agreement. They also bought labor peace during the 1980 construction season. Accordingly, there is no reason that the Respondent AGC should not be found to be in parti delicto with the Respondent Union for entering into the Memorandum of Understanding in violation of Section 8(e) of the Act. I so find and conclude.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota and Park Construction Company are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent Construction, Building Material, Ice and Coal Drivers, Helpers, and Inside Employees Union, Local 22, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By entering into, maintaining, and giving effect to provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding which applied to independent truck operators and to multiple truck owners the provisions of article IV (union security) of the 1978–1981 Master Agreement between AGC and the Union and Park and the Union, and by agreeing to the "equal opportunity" clause of the Memorandum of Understanding relating to the referral of ITOs by the Union, Respondent Union violated Section 8(e) of the Act.

4. By entering into, maintaining, and giving effect to the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding which applied to independent truck operators and to multiple truck owners article IV (union security) of the 1978–1981 Master Agreement between AGC and the Union, and by agreeing to the "equal opportunity" clause of the Memorandum of Understanding relating to the referral of ITOs by the Union, Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota violated Section 8(e) of the Act.

5. By entering into, maintaining, and giving effect to an oral contract, understanding, or arrangement with Park Construction Company pursuant to which Park agreed not to subcontract to ITOs the work of hauling materials to or from certain construction sites during April 1981, Respondent Union violated Section 8(e) of the Act.

6. By coercing and restraining Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, Park Construction Company, and various employers engaged in commerce who are members of Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, for the purpose of requiring them to enter into contracts, agreements, or understandings, either express or implied, which violated the provisions of Section 8(e) of the Act, the Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

7. By threatening to strike Park Construction Company and by picketing Park Construction Company, with the object of forcing Park Construction Company to cease doing business with Jacobs Trucking Company, Inc., an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and other particular employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act who were employed on Park Construction Company jobsites in March and April 1981, and to force and require said employers to become members of the Respondent Union, the Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) and (B) of the Act.

8. All truckdrivers and truck maintenance employees employed by Park Construction Company in highway construction and heavy construction in the Metropolitan Twin Cities area and in central Minnesota, exclusive of plant clericals, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

9. At all times material, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees of Park Construction Company in the unit found appropriate in Conclusions of Law 8 for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

10. By striking to require Park Construction Company to enter into a revision and modification of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union during the term of said contract and without giving the requisite 60-day notice, the Union violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

11. The above-recited unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, and substantial effect on commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have committed certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that they be required to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative actions that are designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Charging Party ICTO requests that the Board order a make-whole remedy requiring the Respondent Union (but not Respondent AGC) to compensate any persons or business damaged by its unlawful activities. It requests a remedy that includes reimbursement of dues and fees paid to the Union, loss of profits from businesses stemming from the Respondent Union's unlawful activities, and consequential damages to any business injured by the Respondent Union's unlawful activities. The Board has recently refused to order such a remedy in an 8(e) case and its refusal has been judicially sustained. Teamsters Local 36, 249 NLRB 386 (1980), affd. 669 F.2d 759 (D.C. Cir. 1981). I am mindful that another circuit court of appeals has remanded a similar case to the Board for further consideration of a make-whole remedy in an 8(e) case[26] and that the Supreme Court has recently granted certiorari in the above-cited Teamsters Local 36 case in order to resolve the conflict between circuit courts on this point. See 50 U.S.L.W. 3908 (1982). My obligation in this decision is to follow the law as it has developed to this point in time and, in so doing, to apply Board rules unless and until they have been set aside by the U.S. Supreme Court. Acting in accordance with these requirements of law, I will not recommend to the Board the remedy requested by ICTO.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[27]

ORDER

A. Respondent Construction, Building Material, Ice and Coal Drivers, Helpers and Inside Employees Union, Local No. 221, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, and its officers, agents, and representatives shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Entering into, maintaining, or giving effect to the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding that applied to independent truck owners and to multiple truck owners the provisions of article IV (union security) of the 1978–1981 Master Agreement between the Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota and the Respondent Union and between Park Construction Company and the Respondent Union, and cease and desist from entering into, maintaining, or giving effect to the "equal opportunity" clause of said Memorandum of Understanding relating to the referral of ITOs and MTOs by the Respondent Union, to the extent found lawful.

(b) Entering into, maintaining, or giving effect to an oral contract, understanding, or arrangement with Park Construction Company pursuant to which Park agreed not to subcontract to ITOs the work of hauling materials to or from certain construction sites during April 1981 to the extent found unlawful.

[26] Teamsters Joint Council 42 v. NLRB, 671 F.2d 305 (9th Cir. 1981).

[27] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Coercing and restraining Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, employer members of Associated General Contractors of Minnesota who are engaged in commerce, or Park Construction Company for the purposes of requiring any of them to enter into contracts, agreements, or understandings, either expressed or implied, which violate Section 8(e) of the Act.

(d) Coercing or restraining Park Construction Company with the object of forcing or requiring Park Construction Company to cease doing business with Jacobs Trucking Company, Inc., an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, or other particular employers who are trucking companies engaged in highway and heavy construction industry in commerce within the meaning of the Act, who were employed on Park Construction Company jobsites in March and April 1981, or to force and require the employers to become members of the Respondent Union.

(e) Striking Park Construction Company for the purpose of compelling the employer to enter into a revision or modification of an existing collective-bargaining agreement with the Union during the term of the agreement or without giving Park the 60-day notice required by the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Minneapolis, Minnesota office and meeting hall copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[28] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondent Associated General Contractors of Minnesota and its officers, agents, successors, member organizations, and their officers, agents, successors, and assigns shall

1. Cease and desist from entering into, maintaining, or giving effect to the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding which applied to independent truck operators and to multiple truck owners the provisions of article IV (union security) of the 1978–1981 Master Agreement between Respondent AGC and Respondent Union, and cease and desist from entering into, maintaining, or giving effect to the "equal opportunity" clause of the Memorandum of Understanding relating to the referral of ITOs and MTOs by the Respondent Union, to the extent found unlawful.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its business office in St. Paul, Minnesota, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[29] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that insofar as the consolidated complaint alleges matters that have not been found to violate the Act, the said consolidated complaint is dismissed.

[28] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

Teamsters Local 221, is posting this notice to comply with an Order of the National Labor Relations Board, which was issued after a hearing before an administrative law judge in a case in which we were found to have violated certain provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT enter into, maintain, or give effect to provisions of a Memorandum of Understanding with Associated General Contractors of Minnesota or Park Construction Company which applied to independent truck operators and to multiple truck owners the provisions of article IV (union security) of the 1978–1981 Master Agreement between ourselves and those employers or employer organizations, and WE WILL NOT enter into, maintain, or give effect to the "equal opportunity" clause of the Memorandum of Understanding relating to the referral of ITOs and MTOs by this Union, to the extent that such clauses violate Section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT enter into, maintain, or give effect to an oral contract, understanding, or arangement with Park Construction Company pursuant to which Park agreed not to subcontract to ITOs the work of hauling materials to or from certain construction sites during April 1981 to the extent such agreement violated Section 8(e) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT coerce or restrain Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, employer members of Associated General Contractors of Minnesota, or Park Construction Company with the object of requiring any of them to enter into contracts, agreements, or understandings, either express or implied, which violate Section 8(e) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT coerce or restrain Park Construction Company with the object of forcing or requiring Park Construction Company to cease doing business with Jacobs Trucking Company, Inc., or any other particular employers who are trucking companies engaged in the highway and heavy construction industry in interstate commerce, and who were employed on Park jobsites in March and April 1981, or to force or require the employers to become members of this Union.

WE WILL NOT strike Park Construction Company for the purpose of compelling Park to enter into a revision or modification of an existing collective-bargaining agreement with this Union during the term of the agreement without giving Park the 60-day notice required by the Act.

ASSOCIATED GENERAL CONTRACTORS OF MINNESOTA

Local 257, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (DAT Construction Corporation) and Jay Buffington. Case 2–CB–12081

August 5, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 31, 1988, Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting and answering brief. The General Counsel filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's cross-exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Gwynne A. Wilcox Esq., for the General Counsel.
Ira A. Sturm, Esq. (Manning, Raab, Dealy & Sturm), of New York, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

D. BARRY MORRIS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in New York City on 6 and 7 January 1988. On a charge filed on 11 August 1987,[1] a complaint was issued on 28 October, alleging that Local 257, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (the Union or Respondent) violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practice.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by the Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

[1] All dates refer to 1987 unless otherwise specified.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

DAT Construction Corporation (the Employer or DAT), a New York corporation with an office and place of business in New York City, is a carpentry contractor in the building and construction industry, constructing commercial and office facilities. Respondent admits that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and I so find. In addition, the Union admits, and I so find, that it is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. The Issue

The issue in this proceeding is whether the Union, acting through its steward, caused the Employer not to hire the Charging Party, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

B. The Facts

Jay Buffington, who had been a carpenter for 20 years, was employed by Partitions Service Company, working at the Citicorp building in New York City. He resigned his position with Partitions on 13 March. On that day, he heard that positions may be available with DAT at the same jobsite. That afternoon he telephoned Richard D'Ambrosio, president of DAT, and asked for employment. Buffington testified that D'Ambrosio told him "go to work Monday with your tools."[2] When Buffington asked whether he could start employment a week later, on 23 March, D'Ambrosio responded that that was agreeable.

On 19 March, Buffington went to the jobsite and spoke with Eugene Garcia, DAT's foreman. He told Garcia that "D'Ambrosio had signed me up for work starting the following Monday and I wanted to check the job out." Garcia was unaware that Buffington had been hired, and told him to speak to John Hanley, the shop steward. Buffington showed Hanley his union card that indicated that Buffington was a member of a sister local, Local 296. Buffington told Hanley that he was "supposed to start work there on Monday." Buffington testified that Hanely told him that "they were not hiring anybody unless they were Local 257." Buffington then went to D'Ambrosio's office to discuss the matter but

[2] At the hearing, counsel for Respondent objected to Buffington's testimony about what D'Ambrosio told him on the ground of hearsay. I sustained the objection, and did not receive the testimony for the truth of the matter asserted. The General Counsel has requested that I reconsider my ruling. I grant the General Counsel's request and reverse my prior ruling. Buffington testified that D'Ambrosio told him "go to work Monday with your tools." In effect D'Ambrosio was offering Buffington a job. As the court said in Creaghe v. Iowa Home Mutual Casualty Co., 323 F.2d 981, 985 (10th Cir. 1963), "Oral agreements can only be established by testimony about the conversation that was had between the parties." When one of the parties testified as to such a conversation, it does not constitute hearsay. See also General Tire of Miami Beach v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 58, 60 (5th Cir. 1964) ("The verbal act, as any other act, may be proved by one who heard it, saw it, or felt it").

D'Ambrosio was unavailable. Buffington left his number and later that afternoon D'Ambrosio telephoned him. Buffington testified that D'Ambrosio told him "he was sorry, that he has to rescind the job offer."

Buffington also testified that hiring at the jobsite is done pursuant to a "50/50 rule," that means that half of the employees are the Employer's choices and half are hired through the hiring hall. In addition, Buffington testified that after his conversation with Hanley he did not report it to the Union, or otherwise contact the Union.

Hanley testified that during March, Buffington approached him and told him that "he was sent by Richie D'Ambrosio to go to work." Hanley further testified, "I told Mr. Buffington that I was unaware that Mr. D'Ambrosio had hired him. And I told him that if he was looking for work to go through the union." Under questioning by counsel for the General Counsel, Hanley conceded that he told Buffington to "go back to his own local to seek work." Hanley denied that he told Buffington that the Union was not hiring anyone except from Local 257.

Garcia, a member of Local 135, credibly testified that there were several individuals working at the jobsite during March who were not members of Local 257. He also testified that if additional carpenters are needed he contacts the shop steward, who then calls the hiring hall.

Robert Olsen, a union official, testified that the following are the duties of the shop steward:

> The shop steward is basically the business representative of the business agent on the job. He is the eyes and ears, he is there to see what transpires and to make sure that the members are paid up in their dues, to take the names and social security [numbers] of the members so that the union can make sure that everybody that is working for the particular contract on that job is being paid their benefits.

Olsen testified that the shop steward has no authority to refuse an individual work at the jobsite.

Discussion and Conclusions

Buffington testified that Hanley told him that the Union was not "hiring anybody unless they were Local 257." Hanley denied making such a statement but instead testified that he advised Buffington "to go back to his own local to seek work." The General Counsel presented no corroboration of Buffington's testimony in this regard. On the contrary, the record indicates that during March, employees who were not members of Local 257 were working at the jobsite. I find that the General Counsel has not shown by a preponderance of the evidence that Hanley made the statement that the Union would only permit members of Local 257 to work at the jobsite.

The complaint alleges that on 19 March, the Union acting through Hanley, refused to allow the Employer to hire Buffington. There is no evidence in the record to support that allegation. Buffington merely testified that he was called by D'Ambrosio on the afternoon of 19 March and told that the job offer was rescinded. D'Ambrosio was not called as a witness nor is there any evidence in the record that any union representative caused D'Ambrosio to withdraw the job offer. See Railway Clerks Local 1902 (Safety Cabs), 180 NLRB 126, 127 (1969). Accordingly, the allegation is dismissed.[3]

Conclusions of Law

1. DAT Construction Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practice alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[3] In view of my disposition of this case, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether Hanley was an "agent" of the Union. I note, however, that the record indicates that the steward had no authority in connection with the hiring of personnel. Under the 50/50 rule, either the individual was hired by the Employer or the employee was referred through the union hall. In either case, the steward was not involved in choosing or approving the employee.

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Proxy Communications of Manhattan, Inc. and United Telephone Answering and Communications Service Union, Local 780. Case 2–CA–21169

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a charge filed by the Union on July 22, 1985, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing on September 30, 1985, against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Thereafter, the Respondent filed an answer, later amended, admitting in part and denying in part the allegation in the complaint and raising certain affirmative defenses.

The determinative facts in this case are not in dispute. On or about June 25, 1985, the Respondent purchased the assets of Federated Answering Service, a Division of Sherwood Diversified Services, Inc. (Federated). Prior to June 25, 1985, Federated had been engaged in providing telephone answering services to businesses and the general public. Federated had recognized the Union in or about 1957 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its telephone operators employed at its facility located at 210 East 86th Street, New York, New York.[1] This recognition was embodied in collective-bargaining agreements to which the Union and Federated were parties, the most recent of which expired on May 31, 1983. About August 17, 1983, Federated's employees went on strike. At the time it purchased Federated, the Respondent was aware that Administrative Law Judge Joel Biblowitz, in a decision issued on July 9, 1984, in Case 2–CA–19496, had found, inter alia, that Federated had committed unfair labor practices aimed at disaffecting the employees from the Union, that Federated had unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union, that the unlawful refusal was the cause of the strike, that the striking employees, therefore, were entitled to reinstatement, and that Federated had a legal obligation to bargain with the Union.[2]

Since it purchased Federated, the Respondent has been engaged in providing the same services that Federated had provided at the same location to the same customers. Additionally, at the time the Respondent purchased Federated on June 25, 1985, it hired all the employees who had been working for Federated on June 24, 1985. These employees composed the Respondent's entire work force, which consisted of 39 replacements for Federated's unfair labor practice strikers and 7 employees who had never gone on strike or who had returned from the strike.

By letter of about June 28, 1985, the Union requested the Respondent to recognize and bargain with it as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees. In its response letter of about July 10, 1985, the Respondent refused to recognize and bargain with the Union.[3]

Notwithstanding its admission of all the facts set forth above, the Respondent denies that it violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union after purchasing Federated's assets.

On November 27, 1985, the Respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment with a supporting brief. On December 9, 1985, the Board issued an order transferring proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause. On December 23, 1985, the General Counsel filed a Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment with a brief in support of that motion and in opposition to the Respondent's summary judgment motion. On January 10, 1986, the Charging Party filed a brief supporting the General Counsel's motion and opposing the Respondent's motion. Also on January 10, 1986, the Respondent filed a brief opposing the Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment.

[1] The Respondent admits that the following employees constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

All telephone operators employed by the Respondent at its facility located at 210 East 86th Street, New York, New York, but excluding all office workers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[2] On February 10, 1986, the Board remanded Case 2–CA–19496 against Federated to the judge for further findings, conclusions, and credibility resolutions based on the existing record regarding whether Marilyn McGuire was Federated's agent. 278 NLRB 472 (1986). On March 6, 1986, Judge Biblowitz issued his supplemental decision finding that McGuire was Federated's agent. On March 31, 1988, the Board issued its decision in 288 NLRB 341 which, inter alia, affirmed the judge's decision in all relevant respects and found that, as a result of McGuire's agency status, Federated was responsible for additional unfair labor practices. It is the burden of the successor employer to establish that it lacks knowledge of unfair labor practices pending at the time of purchase. See Airport Bus Service, 273 NLRB 561, 597 (1984); Mansion House Center Management Corp., 208 NLRB 684, 686 (1974). Here, there is no contention that the Respondent lacked knowledge of all the allegations pending at the time it purchased Federated. In fact, the Respondent concedes that it was aware of the judge's decision in Federated Answering Service, above, and the Federated respondent's exceptions to that decision that were then before the Board. Accordingly, the Respondent has raised no material issue of fact regarding its capacity to sustain the burden of disproving knowledge at the time of purchase of all unfair labor practice allegations then pending in Federated, including those of which Judge Biblowitz had recommended dismissal but in which the Board ultimately found merit, and we shall order the Respondent to remedy those unfair labor practices as well.

[3] On July 12, 1985, the Respondent filed an RM petition (Case 2–RM–1959). By letter dated November 4, 1985, the Regional Director for Region 2 dismissed the petition. On October 14, 1986, the Board affirmed the Regional Director's dismissal of the petition.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motions for Summary Judgment

1. The parties' contentions

In support of its Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondent argues that it is not a Burns[4] successor to Federated, obligated to bargain with the Union. It predicates its argument that it has no bargaining obligation on a claim of objective good-faith doubt as to the Union's majority status based, inter alia, on the sentiments of the unfair labor practice striker replacement employees. Further, the Respondent asserts that because it is not a Burns, successor it cannot be a Golden State[5] successor and that, even if it is found to be a Burns successor, it is not obligated to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices under the balancing of interests required by Golden State.

In support of its Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment, the General Counsel asserts that the Respondent is both a Burns successor and a Golden State successor obligated to bargain with the Union and to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices by virtue of its purchase of Federated's assets because its work force after the purchase consisted entirely of employees who had been employed by Federated prior to the purchase and because, at the time it made the purchase, the Respondent was aware of Federated's unremedied unfair labor practices. We agree with the General Counsel and find that the Respondent is both a Burns successor and a Golden State successor.

2. The Respondent has a bargaining obligation under Burns

The Respondent admits that the employing enterprise was not materially altered after it purchased Federated's assets. Also, the strike replacements, nonstrikers, and returned strikers who had been employed by Federated the day before the purchase (June 24) were employed by the Respondent the day of the purchase (June 25). Thus, the same employees were employed at the same location, performing the same functions after the sale as before the sale. The purchase, then, involved a mere transfer of title, not a major restructuring of the enterprise. In these circumstances we find that there was substantial continuity in the identity of the employing enterprise and conclude that the Respondent is a Burns successor.[6] Furthermore, the Respondent admits that when it purchased Federated, it was aware of the unfair labor practice charges and the judge's decision finding that Federated had committed unfair labor practices aimed at disaffecting its employees from the Union, that Federated had unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union, that Federated's unlawful refusal was the cause of the employees' strike, that the striking employees were, therefore, unfair labor practice strikers entitled to reinstatement on their unconditional offer to return to work, and that Federated was legally obligated to bargain with the Union.[7]

It is well settled that there is a rebuttable presumption in favor of a union's majority status following the certification year.[8] This presumption also applies where the union has been accorded voluntary recognition as in the instant case.[9] Further, this presumption applies in the successorship context.[10] In order to rebut this presumption, the employer must show that on the date recognition was denied the union did not represent a majority of the unit employees, or it must present evidence establishing an objective good-faith doubt of the union's majority status.[11]

It is also settled that an employer can not lawfully justify a refusal to bargain based wholly on doubt as to a union's majority status stemming from the antiunion sentiments of replacement employees hired to replace unfair labor practice strikers.[12] This is because the employer's unfair labor practices sought to cause disaffection from the union and caused its employees to strike. For without the employer's unlawful conduct, there would be no replacement employees, nonstrikers, or returned strikers.[13] Indeed, the interest of replace-

[5] See Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973). See also Fall River, above.

[6] This finding would be warranted regardless of which groups of former Federated employees the Respondent had chosen to hire. Whether the Respondent hired, as a group, the replacements, nonstrikers, and returned strikers (as it chose to here), or whether it had employed, as a group, the strikers or a combination of these two groups, the employee complement would have continued substantially the same.

[7] We emphasize that Federated's obligation to bargain was not founded on a Board-directed bargaining order resulting from its unfair labor practices, but rather on Federated's voluntary recognition of the Union.

[13] See Celanese Corp. of America, above at 673 (an employer can not question a union's majority status "in a context of illegal antiunion activities, or other conduct by the employer aimed at causing disaffection from the union"). Moreover, Federated's unfair labor practices had a tendency to affect all its employees because they were unremedied as of the time Federated sold its business to the Respondent. Thus, whichever category an employee came under—striker, nonstriker, returned striker, or replacement—Federated's unlawful conduct interfered with the employee's Sec. 7 rights and, consequently, tainted his or her free choice in selecting or rejecting a bargaining representative.

ments for unfair labor practice strikers in the unit is illusory or ephemeral at best: they must give way to strikers who choose to return.

In Frick, an economic strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike when the employer's unlawful conduct prolonged the strike. The court, in agreement with the trial examiner noted, at 134, that:

> The Company's unfair labor practices not only undercut the union but had a natural tendency to impede "a settlement of the strike. A corollary of this is that if the strike had been settled at an early date and not prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices . . . there may never have been 202 strikers who abandoned the strike and returned to work or 239 replacements for strikers."

The court concluded that the Board was correct in precluding the company from relying on the replacements as evidence rebutting the presumption of continuing majority status.

In the instant case, the Respondent, while contending that it had the right to hire whom it pleased, provided no discrimination was involved, admits that it has continued the employing enterprise without change. Yet the Respondent seeks to rely on the sentiments of the replacement employees and nonstrikers and returned strikers it hired as evidence of an objective good-faith doubt in the Union's majority status.

The Respondent is correct that as the purchaser of Federated's assets it was free to choose its employees, in the absence of unlawful motivation.[14] This right, however, does not allow the Respondent to avoid the consequences of the choices it made.

At the time of the purchase, the Respondent admits that it was aware of the judge's recommended disposition of unfair labor practice charges against Federated, including the judge's findings that Federated had committed unfair labor practices which caused the employees to strike and that the striking employees, therefore, were entitled to reinstatement. Given this knowledge, the Respondent, by retaining all of Federated's employees (and by refraining from making any other change in the employing enterprise), effectively stepped into Federated's shoes,[15] vis-a-vis the Union.[16] Because it knew of Federated's unremedied unfair labor practices, and as a result of its continuation of the employing enterprise without change, the Respondent succeeded to Federated's obligation to bargain with the Union.

As noted, the presumption of majority status also applies in the successorship context. As a consequence of having been found to have committed unfair labor practices aimed at causing disaffection from the Union, Federated, as found in Case 2-CA-19494, could not rely on the decertification petition signed in the context of those unfair labor practices as evidence of its good-faith doubt in the Union's majority status. For the same reason, had Federated remained the employer and relied on the sentiments of the replacement strikers as evidence of its good-faith doubt, that defense also would have failed. As the Respondent here has stepped into Federated's shoes in relation to the Union, it too is prevented from relying on the sentiments of the unfair labor practice striker replacements as evidence of its good-faith doubt as to the Union's majority status.

In this regard, the Respondent's knowledge that Federated's actions were the cause of the strike means that the Respondent was aware that absent Federated's conduct there would never have been 39 replacement employees or 7 nonstriking or returned strikers for it to hire. To allow the Respondent to rely on the replacements' sentiments as evidence of its objective good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status in these circumstances would be to allow the Respondent to benefit from Federated's unfair labor practices.[17] Thus, by stepping into Federated's shoes, the Respondent like Federated (had Federated remained the employer) is precluded from relying on the replacements' sentiments as evidence of its objective good-faith doubt in the Union's majority status.

As additional support for its assertion that it has an objective good-faith doubt about the Union's majority status, the Respondent relies on two other grounds: (1) the Union's misconduct as found in Telephone Answering Service Union Local 780 (Federated Communications)[18] and (2) the presence of [15] See Fall River Dyeing Corp. v. NLRB, 482 U.S. 27 (1987) (where the Supreme Court noted that "to a substantial extent the applicability of Burns rests in the hands of the successor").

[16] See Bay Diner, 279 NLRB 538 (1986) (employer continuing predecessor's business without change stands in shoes of predecessor vis-a-vis its relationship with the union).

[17] Because we find that the Respondent can not rely on the sentiments of the replacement employees, it is unnecessary for us to determine the union sentiments of those employees. We note, however, that the Board recently has declined to generalize about the union sentiments of striker replacements. In so doing the Board rejected both the presumption that the replacements support the union in the same ratio as the striking employees and any presumption that the replacements evidence repudiation of the union simply by crossing a picket line or because they were not contacted by the union. See Station KKHI, 284 NLRB 1339 (1987). See also Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 289 NLRB 360, 363 (1988).

seven employees who either never went on strike or abandoned the strike and returned to work.[19]

In Telephone Answering, one striking employee was found to have told one nonstriking employee who had crossed the picket line that the striking employee "would kick her [the nonstriking employee's] ass and her mother's ass."[20] This statement was made twice and was found to be a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[21] Neither this statement nor the other lawful statements found to have been made (e.g., strikers calling employees crossing the picket line scabs) indicate that the Union had lost its majority status[22] or that the Respondent had an objective good-faith doubt about that status.

Nor does the fact that 7 of the 46 employees hired by the Respondent had never gone on strike or had returned from the strike establish an objective good-faith doubt as to those employees' union sentiments. As stated previously, absent Federated's unfair labor practices, which the Respondent knew remained unremedied, there would never have been any nonstrikers or returned strikers. In any event, apart from considerations arising out of Federated's misconduct, the facts here do not show that these employees had antiunion sentiments.[23]

3. The Respondent has a Golden State obligation to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices

The Respondent also contends that, as required by Golden State, a balancing of the conflicting legitimate interests involved, i.e., the interests of the Respondent as an arm's-length purchaser of Federated's assets, the interests of the public, and the interests of the "affected" employees,[24] should absolve it of any obligation it might have to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices. We find no merit to this contention. Although the Respondent's liability for remedying Federated's unfair labor practices does require a balancing of interests, the Respondent's declared application of this balancing test unduly emphasizes its own interests as the purchaser of Federated's assets with a right to hire its employees and the interests of the employees it hired. Such an emphasis is misplaced.

Under the Golden State balancing test, emphasis is placed instead on the protection of the victimized employees.[25] The court in Golden State quoted with approval the following statement made by the Board in Perma Vinyl:[26]

> Especially in need of help, it seems to us, are the employee victims of unfair labor practices who, because of their unlawful discharge, are now without meaningful remedy when title to the employing business operation changes hands.

An emphasis on victimized employees is especially appropriate in this case where the victimized employees were on strike as a result of Federated's unfair labor practices—thus entitling the strikers to reinstatement on their unconditional offer to return to work. Further, the Respondent was aware of these facts and still decided to hire all of the striking employees' replacements. This shows that the Respondent essentially continued unaltered the job situations of Federated's strikers and, thereby, their legitimate expectations that Federated's unfair labor practices would be remedied.[27]

The choices the Respondent made in hiring all of Federated's employees in light of its knowledge of Federated's unremedied unfair labor practices has placed it in the position of being obligated to remedy those unfair labor practices. The Respondent can not now point to its freedom to make those choices for legitimate reasons and to the interests of the unfair labor practice striker replacements (who must be discharged, if necessary) that it retained, as outweighing the special protection given to the victimized employees.

The Respondent also claims that it is not required to reinstate the strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work because the strikers had not made an offer to return to work prior to the [19] The Respondent also offers the fact that the Union did not seek to bargain with Federated over the terms and conditions of employment of the unfair labor practice striker replacements as evidence that the replacement employees were not represented by the Union. Although this argument relies on the antiunion sentiments of the replacements, a reliance we have found to be misplaced, it also ignores Federated's earlier withdrawal of recognition from the Union, which made any subsequent attempt to bargain futile. The Respondent admits, however, that the Union sought to bargain with it within 3 days of the Respondent's purchase of Federated's assets.

[22] Nor is the 8(b)(1)(A) violation a sufficient basis on which to deny a bargaining order. Cf. Laura Modes Co., 144 NLRB 1592 (1963) (union denied affirmative bargaining order despite 8(a)(5) refusal-to-bargain finding when union agent physically beat the employer and "pushed around" an office employee).

[23] See Station KKHI, supra (failure to join strike may indicate employees' economic concerns); Frick, supra, 423 F.2d at 1333 (no presumption that an employee's return to work during a strike demonstrates a rejection of union).

[27] Sound policy reasons support requiring the Respondent to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices in these circumstances. See Golden State, supra at 184. To the extent the Respondent argues that "employees who have been retained" are the replacement employees, the Respondent misperceives the implications of its actions in purchasing Federated's assets with knowledge of its predecessor's unremedied unfair labor practices and without changing the employing enterprise in any way.

Respondent's purchase of Federated's assets.[28] The Respondent states that because there was no offer to return to work prior to the purchase, the sale extinguished the strikers' right to reinstatement. There are several flaws in this assertion. First, it ignores the fact that Federated's unlawful refusal to bargain, the cause of the strike, had not been remedied prior to the purchase. Second, it ignores the fact that the Respondent stepped into Federated's shoes, that at the time it did so it was aware the strike had been designated an unfair labor practice strike, and that, additionally, it was aware that Federated had unlawfully threatened to replace permanently the strikers and had been ordered to notify the strikers that they were entitled to reinstatement on their unconditional offer to return to work. Third, it ignores the fact that the Union promptly requested bargaining with the Respondent after the purchase but that the request was rejected, making any offer to return to work futile.

Of course the Respondent has the option of retaining the replacement employees while at the same time reinstating the striking employees on their unconditional offer to return to work.[29] Even if the Respondent chooses this option, however, we still need not analyze the union sentiments of the replacement employees (or any other former Federated employees) to determine if the presumption favoring the Union's majority status continues. See fn. 13 supra.

As a practical consideration, the Respondent argues that it can not be expected to run its business under the condition that it reinstate the strikers whenever they decide to make an unconditional offer to return to work. It is within the Respondent's power, however, to avoid such disruption by bargaining with the Union and offering reinstatement to the striking employees.

Nor is the conclusion that the Respondent is obligated to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices unduly burdensome. As the Court in Golden State, again quoting with approval from the Board's Perma Vinyl decision, stated:[30]

> Since the successor must have notice before liability can be imposed, "his potential liability for remedying the unfair labor practices is a matter which can be reflected in the price he pays for the business, or he may secure an indemnity clause in the sales contract which will indemnify him for liability arising from the seller's unfair labor practices."

Here, the Respondent at the time of its purchase of Federated's assets admittedly had knowledge of the unremedied unfair labor practices and could have protected itself from the burden of remedying those unlawful practices, which burden resulted from its choice to purchase and continue unaltered the employing enterprise.

In summary, we find that the Respondent is a successor employer that purchased Federated's assets with knowledge of Federated's unremedied unfair labor practices, that in the circumstances of this case the Respondent can not rely on the sentiments of the unfair labor practice striker replacements as evidence of its objective good-faith doubt in the Union's majority status, that none of the other evidence establishes that the Respondent has rebutted the presumption in favor of the Union's majority status, and that the Respondent is obligated to remedy Federated's unfair labor practices.

Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Cross-Motion for Summary Judgment.[31]

On the entire record the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, Proxy Communications of Manhattan, Inc., a Delaware corporation, has been engaged in providing telephone answering and related services to businesses and the general public at its facility in New York, New York, where it annually will derive gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually will purchase goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000, directly from firms located outside the State of New York. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. We also find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[28] We note that the strikers' right to reinstatement is derived from their status as unfair labor practice strikers. See Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 278 (1956). The order against Federated required it to notify the strikers that the threat of permanent replacement was withdrawn and that Federated would reinstate the strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work.

[29] With regard to the composition of the Respondent's work force, the Respondent wants us to infer, solely on the basis of the passage of time (i.e., since the start of the strike against Federated on August 17, 1983), that few, if any, of the strikers would be available for work and, therefore, that a majority of the Respondent's work force would not be composed of union supporters.

We cannot infer, based merely on the passage of time, however, that only a few of the strikers would return to work if the Respondent indicated its willingness to comply with its obligation to bargain with the Union and reinstate all the strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work. That the Respondent has received no answer from the Union or the Regional Director to its inquiry as to how many of the strikers desire to fill vacancies or be placed on preferential hiring lists in no way assists the Respondent in carrying its burden of establishing an objective good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status.

[30] Golden State, above, 414 U.S. at 185.

[31] The Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Recognition

Since about 1957 Federated had recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All telephone operators employed by Federated at is facility located at 210 East 86th Street, New York, New York, but excluding all office workers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Since about June 25, 1985, the Respondent has been the employer of the employees in the unit by virtue of having about June 25, 1985, become a successor to Federated at the New York facility. The Union continues to be the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since about June 28, 1985, the Union has requested the Respondent to bargain, and since about July 10, 1985, the Respondent has refused. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By refusing on and after July 10, 1985, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent is Federated's successor at the New York facility.

3. The Respondent is legally obliged to comply with the Board's Order against Federated in Case 2-CA-19496[32] with respect to those unfair labor practices of which it had knowledge at the time of its purchase of Federated.

[32] We are aware that this case is before us in a somewhat unusual procedural posture in that an alleged successor's status is normally litigated in the context of a compliance hearing. Instead, this case is before us on an 8(a)(5) complaint in which it is alleged, inter alia, that the Respondent is obligated to bargain with the Union as a result of its status as Federated's successor. Despite these somewhat unusual circumstances, however, the Respondent had a full opportunity after adequate notice to address the question of whether it is a successor responsible for remedying its predecessor's unfair labor practices. Jessie Beck's Riverside Hotel, 279 NLRB 405 (1986) (Board directed successor to comply with an order against predecessor that required the predecessor to bargain with the union).

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement.[33]

ORDER

The Respondent Proxy Communications of Manhattan, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with United Telephone Answering and Communications Service Union, Local 780 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All telephone operators employed by Respondent at its facility located at 210 East 86th Street, New York, New York, but excluding all office workers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Notify all its striking employees, by letter or telegram, that the threat of permanent replacement contained in Federated's August 17, 1983 telegram to them is withdrawn, and that on an unconditional offer to return to work, they will be offered reinstatement to their former positions, or substantially similar positions.

(c) Comply with the Board's Order in Federated Answering Service, 288 NLRB 341 (1988).

(d) Post at its facility in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[34] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[33] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause in the Order is denied because the circumstances of this case do not warrant such a provision. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[34] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with United Telephone Answering and Communications Service Union, Local 780 as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All telephone operators employed by us at our facility located at 210 East 86th Street, New York, New York, but excluding all office workers, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL, on an unconditional offer to return to work, offer to all those employees who participated in the strike which began on August 17, 1983, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if those positions are no longer available, to substantially equivalent employment without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL comply with the National Labor Relations Board's Order in Federated Answering Service, 288 NLRB 341 (1988).

Jensen Enterprises, Inc. d/b/a Jensen Pre-Cast and Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union 631, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, AFL-CIO,[1] Petitioner. Case 31-RC-5745

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered an objection to an election held September 28, 1984, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of the objection.[2] The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows six for and two against the Petitioner, with no challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations, and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

The issue in this case is whether the display of an altered Board sample election ballot, under the circumstances presented, warrants setting aside the election. The hearing officer found that the display did not constitute objectionable conduct. The Employer contends in its exceptions that the document likely gave voters the misleading impression that the Board favored the Union. We find no merit to the Employer's contentions and shall overrule the objection.

In SDC Investment, 274 NLRB 556 (1985), the Board found that the "crucial question" in resolving issues raising the alteration of a Board sample ballot is whether the ballot in issue "is likely to have given voters the misleading impression that the Board favored one of the parties to the election." 274 NLRB at 557. Under the circumstances of this case, we find insufficient evidence that voters reasonably would be misled.

The facts are not materially in dispute. On September 25, 1984, the Employer's president, Donald Jensen, observed Union Official Michael Straight speaking to unit employees immediately outside the Employer's premises. Jensen was located inside his office and, from a distance of 10 feet, observed Straight through an office window. Jensen observed Straight displaying to employees a reproduction of an official Board sample ballot that had been altered by the entry of an "X" in the "YES" box. The sample ballot was encased in clear plastic in a looseleaf three-ring binder. There is no evidence that the sample ballot displayed by Straight left his hands at any time or that it contained any other alterations or markings of any kind other than wording customarily found on a Board sample ballot.[3] Further, there is no evidence regarding what Straight may have said to employees while displaying the ballot.

As an initial matter, it may be instructive to emphasize that this case does not involve an altered sample ballot that has been distributed or circulated to employees. Absent any such distribution or circulation, the accompanying potential, or even likelihood, that the document will then be passed along to employees who may not have received it from the originating party is not present.[4]

The paramount factual element of the instant case is that Union Agent Straight did not distribute the altered ballot but merely displayed the document in a notebook, apparently as an instructional device. The document did not leave his hands. Further, there is no evidence what the union agent may have said regarding the display. In these circumstances, we agree with the hearing officer that employees looking at the three-ring binder containing the altered sample ballot, as described by Jensen, could reasonably have concluded that the party holding these materials was the source of the alteration and would not necessarily be given the misleading impression that the Board favored one of the parties to the election. As the objecting party, the Employer retained the evidentiary burden to show that the conduct of the union agent interfered with the election. Where, as here, the altered document did not leave the hands of the union agent, and the evidence shows only the display of the document, we will not presume that employees have been misled by the display of the document alone.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] On May 28, 1985, the Board adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations overruling the Employer's Objections 1, 3, and 4 and ordering a hearing on Objection 2, now before us in this proceeding.

[3] Jensen credibly testified that while he could not read certain "fine print" on the document, he could read bold type printed phrases including "Official Secret Ballot," "United States of America," "National Labor Relations Board," "Mark an 'X' in the square of your choice," and boxes designated "YES" and "NO." Jensen did not identify any wording on the document expressly indicating the voting group or type of election to be conducted and was unable to see whether the sample ballot was specifically that to be used in the instant case.

[4] Because this case does not involve the distribution of an altered ballot, we do not consider it useful, under the facts presented, to apply the two-prong analytical approach set forth in SDC. In cases involving distribution, we shall continue to apply the SDC methodology in determining whether the altered ballot in issue is likely to have misled employees.

SDC is bottomed on the realistic notion that employees are generally sophisticated enough to recognize that sample ballots containing designated choices often are part and parcel of election campaigns. The interaction between employees and Union - Agent Straight displaying a three-ring binder containing a sample ballot is precisely the type of encounter that, standing alone, is likely to be perceived as electioneering by a party to an election and not as an endorsement by the governmental authority overseeing the election. Accordingly, we shall overrule the objection.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union 631, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, AFL–CIO, and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following unit:

> All regular full-time and part-time drivers and maintenance and production employees employed by the Employer at its facility located at 3853 Losee Road, North Las Vegas, Nevada, but excluding all other employees, including office clerical employees, salesmen, confidential employees, administrative employees, managerial employees, professional employees, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, concurring.

This is an altered ballot case where a union agent did no more than show the ballot to unit employees. The sample did not leave the union agent's hands. That, coupled with the fact that it was encased in plastic in a looseleaf notebook, makes it clear that it was an instructional device and its source was evident. Unlike sample ballots that are distributed to voters, there was little danger here that the ballot's origin would be mistaken.

A rigid and unvarying requirement that the party responsible for preparation of an altered ballot must be indicated on the ballot, as demonstrated by this case, makes no sense. That is particularly so as the Board does not even require any indication that the ballot has, in fact, been altered.[1]

On the facts of this case, the source and the instructional purpose of the alteration were abundantly clear and there is little likelihood of employees being misled. I concur in affirming the hearing officer and certifying the Union as collective-bargaining representative.

Boston Edison Company and Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO. Case 1–CA–23666

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon an unfair labor practice charge filed on March 21, 1986, by the Union, Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on December 5, 1986, against the Respondent, Boston Edison Company, alleging that it violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Copies of the complaint and notice of hearing were served on the Respondent. The Respondent filed a timely answer denying the commission of any unfair labor practices and asserting certain affirmative defenses.

On July 27, 1987, the parties jointly moved the Board to transfer the proceeding to the Board without benefit of a hearing before an administrative law judge and they submitted a proposed record consisting of the formal papers and the parties' stipulation of facts with attached exhibits. On September 30, 1987, the Board issued an order granting the motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter the General Counsel, the Union, and the Respondent filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record in this case, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a corporation with its principal office and place of business in Boston, Massachusetts, and is a public utility engaged in the generation, transmission, distribution, and sale of electricity in the greater Boston area. The Respondent during the calendar year ending December 31, 1985, derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000 in the course and conduct of its business operations, and purchased and received products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties stipulated and we find that at all times material Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO (Local 369 or Union); Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO (the National Union); Local 386, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO (Local 386);[1] and Local 387, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO (Local 387) were labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Issue

The issue is whether the Respondent has, since on or about January 30, 1986, and continuing to date, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to negotiate and enter into an agreement separately with Local 369 with regard to a retirement/pension plan covering the employees represented for the purposes of collective bargaining by Local 369.

B. Facts

The Respondent is a public utility and is engaged in the generation, transmission, distribution, and sale of electricity in the greater Boston area. The parties stipulated that all production and maintenance employees employed by the Respondent including those employees in the classifications listed in the schedule effective June 13, 1986, of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent, Local 369, and the National Union, but excluding meter readers, foremen, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act. At all times material, Local 369 has represented the bargaining unit of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees.

On June 29, 1950, the Board certified the National Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the employees in the production and maintenance unit. In 1950, the National Union was also certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the employees in the office and clerical unit and the professional and technical unit respectively. Shortly after the three certifications were issued in 1950, Local 369, Local 387, and Local 386 were chartered to represent the employees in the production and maintenance unit, the office and clerical unit, and the professional and technical unit respectively. In 1971, the three collective-bargaining agreements for the three bargaining units were amended through the collective-bargaining process to reflect that the Respondent recognized both the National Union and the three respective local unions as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the employees in the three bargaining units. Specifically, since 1971 and continuing to date, the collective-bargaining agreements for the production and maintenance unit have contained the following language in the recognition clause:

[1] At all times material, Local 387 has represented a bargaining unit of Respondent's office and clerical employees. Until recently, Local 386 represented a bargaining unit of all professional and technical employees. This professional and technical unit still constitutes a separate bargaining unit but it is now represented by Local 387. Local 386 no longer exists as a separate local union. This change occurred on February 1, 1987, after the factual development relevant to the instant case.

> The Company recognizes the Union and the Local as the exclusive bargaining representative of all the employees of the Company in the Production and Maintenance Unit, as certified by the National Labor Relations Board in Case No. 1-RC-1368 on June 29, 1950.

At all times since 1950, Local 369 has participated in collective-bargaining negotiations with the Respondent and the National Union for collective-bargaining contracts covering the employees included in the unit of production and maintenance employees employed by the Respondent and has signed all collective-bargaining agreements since 1950 which covered the employees. Since 1951, there have been successive separately negotiated, separately administered collective-bargaining agreements for each of the three bargaining units. The three respective collective-bargaining agreements were initially negotiated between the Respondent, the National Union, and each local union in 1951, and the three agreements were each separately renegotiated in 1953, 1955, 1957, 1959, 1961, 1963, 1965, 1967, 1969, 1971, 1973, 1975, 1977, 1980, 1983, and 1986. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent, Local 369, and the National Union covering the employees included in the production and maintenance unit is effective by its terms from the period of June 13, 1986 to May 15, 1990. In each general negotiating process which led to the agreements, Local 369, Local 387, and Local 386 each submitted their own proposals and negotiated separately with the Respondent. The National Union has been signatory to all the collective-bargaining agreements.

The employees of the Respondent in all three bargaining units have always been covered by one unified pension/retirement plan (pension plan). The existence of a single pension plan for all three bargaining units predates the certification of the National Union in 1950.[2] Since 1950, when the National Union was certified and the three local unions were chartered, collective bargaining over changes in the pension plan has been conducted separately from the general collective bargaining described above for all other terms and conditions of employment. Unlike the general negotiations over the three collective-bargaining agreements, collective bargaining over the pension plan has always been conducted jointly among all three local unions, the National Union, and the Respondent. In practice, each local union submitted its own pension plan proposals, but the negotiation sessions were conducted jointly, and the resulting unified pension plan covered employees in all three bargaining units. When agreement was reached through collective bargaining on pension plan issues, the parties produced a unified Memorandum of Agreement that was signed by the Respondent, the National Union, and all three local unions. The membership of each local union conducted a ratification vote over the terms contained in the agreement. Pension plan bargaining, as described above, occurred in 1951, 1957, 1962, 1967, 1972, 1975, 1977, and 1980.

By letter dated January 6, 1972, the Respondent notified the National Union that Local 369, Local 387, and Local 386 had notified the Respondent of their intention to review the pension plan. By letter dated January 7, 1972, Local 369 notified the Respondent that it would not negotiate in joint session regarding the pension plan with the other local unions. The Respondent notified Local 369 by letter dated January 14, 1972, that a separate meeting date with Local 369 for pension plan negotiations was not acceptable to it. By letters dated February 29, 1972, the National Union notified Local 369, Local 387, and Local 386 that Local 369 would be given the opportunity to attempt to arrange for separate negotiations with the Respondent regarding a pension plan by March 6 and, if that could not be arranged, Local 369 was directed to negotiate jointly with Local 387 and Local 386.

When the Respondent continued to refuse to negotiate separately with Local 369 regarding a separate pension plan, Local 369 filed an unfair labor practice charge in Case 1-CA-8176. After investigation of this charge, it was dismissed by Region 1. Local 369 appealed this dismissal to the Office of Appeals and this appeal was denied.

[2] From approximately 1943 to 1950, the three bargaining units existed but were represented by the United Brotherhood of Edison Workers in separate units of production and maintenance employees, office and clerical employees, and technical employees. See Boston Edison Co., 51 NLRB 118 (1943).

By letter dated December 18, 1985, the Respondent notified the National Union and Local 369 of its desire to terminate the then-current collective-bargaining agreement and of the Respondent's intention to review and modify the pension plan. By letter dated January 9, 1986, Local 369 requested to negotiate with the Respondent separately over the terms of a pension plan covering only the employees included in the production and maintenance unit.

By letter dated January 30, 1986, the Respondent replied to the letter dated January 9, 1986, from Local 369. The Respondent's response was that the pension plan is with the National Union, the parties have historically bargained jointly, and that the Respondent intends to do so again this year.

By letter dated February 28, 1986, Local 369 advised Respondent, inter alia, of the names of the bargaining committee for Local 369, and by letter dated March 3, 1986, the National Union's president, James Joy Jr., advised the Respondent that Local 369 had permission to proceed separately for the 1986 negotiations to modify the current collective-bargaining agreement and the pension plan.

On March 7, 1986, the Respondent and Local 369 met in their first general negotiating session for the collective-bargaining agreement for the production and maintenance unit. Local 369 again requested that the Respondent meet individually with Local 369 to negotiate terms of a separate pension plan for the production and maintenance employees, but the Respondent did not agree.

On March 13, 1986, at the second general negotiating session over the collective-bargaining agreement for the production and maintenance unit, Local 369 first presented its proposals to modify the agreement. Included were proposals to modify the pension plan. The Respondent refused to accept or discuss the pension proposals that day, and told Local 369 that it intended to negotiate pension plan changes jointly with all three local unions and the National Union. By letter dated March 14, 1986, the Respondent notified the National Union of its position that pension plan negotiations would be conducted jointly, as in the past.

On April 3, 1986, representatives of the Respondent, the National Union, and the three local unions met for the first scheduled pension plan bargaining session. Local 369 announced that it would not participate in joint bargaining and then withdrew. The negotiation session continued without Local 369. Local 369 returned to the negotiation session to present its list of proposed changes in the pension plan and to hear the Respondent's proposals. Local 369 then left and bargaining continued between the National Union, the Respondent, Local 387, and Local 386.

On April 10, 1986, the parties convened for a second day of pension plan negotiations. Local 369 was not present until after lunch. During the morning session, the Respondent, the National Union, Local 387, and Local 386 bargained jointly. During the afternoon session, the Respondent and Local 369 bargained over Local 369's pension plan proposals. The National Union, Local 387, and Local 386 were present.

On April 24, 1986, the parties convened for a third day of pension plan negotiations. During the morning session, the Respondent, the National Union, Local 387, and Local 386 bargained jointly. Local 369 appeared only for an afternoon session and discussed only Local 369's proposals with the Respondent. For at least part of the afternoon session, the National Union, Local 387, and Local 386 were present. About 4 p.m., when the negotiation session ended, the Respondent asked Local 369 to participate in a full-day session with all the parties present on May 1, 1986. Local 369 did not respond.

On May 1, 1986, the parties convened for a fourth day of pension plan negotiations. Throughout the day, the Respondent negotiated individually with each local union over their respective sets of proposals, in the presence of the National Union and the other two locals. The parties convened for a fifth day of pension plan negotiations on May 8, 1986. The Respondent announced its position that the pension bargaining process for 1986 would result in only one pension plan, as in the past. After a recess, the National Union announced that Local 387 and Local 386 had withdrawn their separate proposals and that Local 369's proposals would be adopted by Locals 387 and 386. Bargaining ensued on that basis. At the close of the session, the Respondent presented the National Union and Locals 369, 387, and 386 with a written proposal on the pension plan that eventually became part of the Respondent's final offer to all three local unions as the contract expiration date on May 15, 1986, approached.

On May 16, 1986, all three local unions began a strike on issues unrelated to the instant charge. The strike was resolved prior to June 13, 1986, and new separate collective-bargaining agreements were entered into between the Respondent and each of the three local unions covering the bargaining units represented by each local union, and the National Union. With respect to the pension plan, a single Memorandum of Agreement was prepared reflecting changes agreed to by the Respondent, the National Union, and the three local unions.

At times during the 1986 pension and collective-bargaining negotiations, Local 369 stated to the Respondent that it wanted an answer to the question of its right to bargain with respect to a separate pension plan apart from Local 387 and Local 386; that it was reserving its position and rights on that issue; and that it would pursue the instant charge filed with the National Labor Relations Board in that regard. The Respondent stated that Local 369 could reserve whatever rights it believed it had, but that the Respondent did not agree that Local 369 had the right to bargain with respect to a pension plan individually. The Respondent further stated that it had always bargained with respect to the pension plan jointly and that it would continue to do so.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Respondent contends that it did not violate the Act by refusing to agree to Local 369's request that it alter the historic joint pension bargaining practice that had been in effect since 1950 and bargain with Local 369 separately on the subject of pensions. In support, the Respondent cites Paperworkers Local 1027 (Mead Corp.), 216 NLRB 486 (1975) (Mead), for the proposition that once a voluntary consensual unit has been established by the agreement of the parties, any party can then lawfully insist to impasse on continued bargaining along the lines of the established and historic unit. The Respondent also cites the case of Shell Oil Co., 194 NLRB 988 (1972), enfd. sub nom. Oil Workers v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 1266 (D.C. Cir. 1973), in defense of its action in refusing to bargain with the Union separately on the retirement/pension plan. Relying on Shell Oil, the Respondent argues that because for over 36 years pension bargaining has always been conducted on a companywide basis between Boston Edison, the National Union, and its three locals, the established unit for purposes of collective bargaining with respect to pension issues is the joint unit. Thus, the Respondent could lawfully insist on confining bargaining on pensions to the established joint unit.

The Respondent further argues that this conclusion is supported by the Regional Director's 1972 dismissal of an unfair labor practice charge filed by Local 369 charging that the Respondent's refusal to bargain over pension plan improvements was unlawful. In that proceeding the Office of Appeals, Office of the General Counsel, upheld the Regional Director's dismissal of the charge, on the grounds that the National Union is the certified representative, that pension bargaining historically has been on a multiunit basis, and that the National Union never requested separate pension bargaining on a single unit basis.

In the alternative, the Respondent also argues that even if Local 369 was privileged to withdraw from the multiunion bargaining arrangement, it did not lawfully do so because its attempted withdrawal was neither permanent nor unequivocal. The Respondent maintains that the National Union has not agreed permanently to halt the multiunion bargaining arrangement because it granted only one of the four different union entities permission to proceed separately for 1 year—1986. Further, citing Tampa Ship Repair & Dry Dock Co., 202 NLRB 368 (1973), the Respondent maintains that Local 369 did not unequivocally withdraw from multiunit bargaining, because it participated in the joint bargaining for the 1986 pension agreement and signed the single Memorandum of Agreement reflecting changes in the pension plan.

The General Counsel's position is that Local 369 timely and unequivocally withdrew from multiunit bargaining on the pension plan and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by its refusal to bargain separately with Local 369 concerning a pension plan. The General Counsel argues that while parties may voluntarily consent to the enlargement or alteration of an existing unit, to the merger of separate units, or to the combination of several units for the purpose of jointly negotiating issues of common concern, neither party may be forced to continue negotiations on the altered basis, citing Consolidated Papers, 220 NLRB 1281 (1975), and Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp & Paper Mfrs., 133 NLRB 690 (1961), enfd. 304 F.2d 760 (9th Cir. 1962).

The General Counsel also argues that the fact that Local 369 participated with Locals 387 and 386 in pension negotiations after the Respondent had rejected the request of Local 369 for separate negotiations does not render the request of Local 369 equivocal or moot. The General Counsel also requests a visitatorial clause in this case.

The Charging Party reiterates the arguments made by the General Counsel in this case, and argues that a bargaining unit has the right to withdraw regardless of a history of multiunit bargaining, where it has given the employer timely and unequivocal notice of its intent to withdraw. If parties are unable to withdraw from multiunit bargaining, they would be discouraged from experimenting with such bargaining. Further, the Charging Party maintains that its withdrawal was timely and unequivocal, and that the Local 369-represented unit is an "appropriate unit" since Local 369 has been negotiating independent collective-bargaining agreements since 1950 with the Respondent. It further argues that any inconvenience to the Company caused by negotiating pensions separately is outweighed by the importance of permitting the Union to negotiate separately.

The Charging Party maintains that since a union has a right to withdraw from multiunit bargaining, it is a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) for an employer to insist to impasse on multiunit bargaining, citing Shell Oil, supra, as support for its proposition that while parties may agree to consolidate units for purposes of collective bargaining, a party may not be forced to bargain on other than a unit basis. The Union also argues that the Mead case relied on by the Respondent is inapposite to the instant case. In Mead, the Union insisted to impasse on retaining multiunit bargaining, and the Board's decision to uphold its right to do so was consistent with employees' Section 7 rights to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. In the instant case, it is the employer who is insisting to impasse on retaining multiunit bargaining. In so doing, the Company is attempting to impose on the Union its opinion regarding who should be the collective-bargaining representative of its employees. This is inconsistent with employees' Section 7 rights to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

The Charging Party further contends that despite its decision to enter into a joint pension agreement with the Respondent, its withdrawal was unequivocal because the Company was notified at all times that the Union was nonetheless reserving its right to have this case resolved by the Board. In addition, Local 369 did not participate in any joint bargaining with the other locals, until the other locals withdrew their proposals and adopted Local 369's proposals. The Charging Party argues that for the Board to hold that Local 369 did not unequivocally withdraw from multiunit bargaining would give the Union two untenable choices—either to accept the Company's unwillingness to bargain separately, even if it is unlawful, or to exist without a pension agreement until all the Board's processes and court appeals have been exhausted.

The Charging Party also argues that Local 369 has maintained a separate identity from that of the other locals involved in multiunit bargaining, and that the bargaining unit represented by Local 369 was an appropriate one for purposes of collective bargaining. The Charging Party maintains that Local 369 was delegated authority by the National Union to negotiate a pension plan. Unlike the temporary authority granted in 1972, the grant of authority to Local 369 for the 1986 negotiations was clear and unequivocal. Further, the Respondent has never before questioned the authority of Local 369 to bind the National in contract negotiations for separate contracts with Local 369. Finally, the recognition clause of the collective-bargaining agreement for the production and maintenance workers has contained language that the Company recognizes both the National and Local 369 as exclusive representative of that unit.

D. Analysis and Conclusions

The major thrust of the Respondent's argument is that two separate bargaining units covering the same employees co-exist—one unit for pension bargaining and a second unit for bargaining on the remaining subject matters. The Respondent argues that because for over 36 years pension bargaining has always been conducted on a companywide basis between Boston Edison, the National Union, and its three locals, the established unit for purposes of collective bargaining with respect to pension issues is a companywide unit. At the same time it acknowledges that the three separate employee groups represented by the individual locals are the appropriate units for purposes of bargaining over the remaining subject matters.

Although it is well settled that the parties may voluntarily agree to bargain jointly on an other-than-unit basis for certain subject matters and to bargain on a unit basis for other matters, that agreement does not result in two separate units—a broader unit for some purposes and a narrower unit for others. Only one unit covering the same employees may exist at any given time, even if the parties agree to bargain on certain matters on a different basis.

Further, although parties may voluntarily consent to bargaining jointly on a basis other than the established appropriate unit, neither party may be forced to continue such negotiations. The scope of an established bargaining unit is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining that either party may propose changing so long as it does not insist on its proposal to impasse. Consolidated Papers, supra.[3] A party may not be forced to bargain on other than a unit basis. Shell Oil, supra.[4]

[3] The Board in Consolidated at fn. 6, found that Mead, relied on by the Respondent here, was not relevant to the issue posed in Consolidated. It appears that the Board, without specifically so stating, was declining to follow Mead. Mead has not been cited in any Board majority decision since Consolidated. In fact, between the time that Mead and Consolidated were decided, it was only cited in a dissent in Columbus Printing Pressmen Union 252, 219 NLRB 268 fn. 24 (1975), with a specific notation that the dissenting member was expressing no view concerning its validity or invalidity. Accordingly, we find that Mead was implicitly overruled by Consolidated. In any event, we overrule Mead to the extent it is inconsistent with our decision.

[4] Shell Oil Co., relied on by the Respondent, does not support its view. There the company had collective-bargaining agreements with various local unions of the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Union (OCAW)

Continued

In the instant case, the National Union was certified in 1950 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the Respondent's production and maintenance employees. Shortly after the certification was issued, Local 369 was chartered to represent the Respondent's employees in the production and maintenance unit. In 1951 Local 369 negotiated a separate collective-bargaining agreement for the employees it represents and thereafter it renegotiated agreements in 1953, 1955, 1957, 1959, 1961, 1963, 1965, 1967, 1969, 1971, 1973, 1975, 1977, 1980, 1983, and 1986. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent, Local 369, and the National Union covering the employees in the production and maintenance unit is effective from June 13, 1986 to May 1990. The recognition clause of the collective-bargaining agreement for the production and maintenance workers contained language that the Company recognizes both the National and Local 369 as the exclusive representative of that unit. Thus, the production and maintenance employees have continued throughout to constitute a separate appropriate bargaining unit represented by the National and Local 369.

With respect to the pension plans, historically each local union during joint negotiations submitted its own pension plan proposals; the agreements reached in pension plan negotiations were specifically subject to ratifications by the membership of the three locals which were individual parties to these agreements, and each local conducted separate ratification votes on the terms contained in the agreements.[5] This joint bargaining with separate ratification and separate agreements is consistent with the finding that the units continued to be represented as separate units.

Local 369 successfully met the threshold requirements for withdrawal from joint bargaining, as provided in Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388 (1958), and Evening News Assn., 154 NLRB 1494 (1965), enfd. 372 F.2d 569 (6th Cir. 1967), by giving a timely and unequivocal notice to the Respondent of its desire and intention to bargain with the Respondent concerning the pension plan separately from Locals 387 and 386. In the letter of January 9, 1986, to the Respondent, Local 369 specifically notified the Respondent of its intention to negotiate a pension plan separately from the negotiations for the units represented by Locals 387 and 386. This notice was unequivocal and was made in a timely fashion as it was given prior to the commencement of negotiations on the pension plan on April 3, 1986. Further, the Respondent was notified by the National Union that Local 369 had permission to proceed separately for the 1986 negotiations to modify the pension plan.

We also find that Local 369's withdrawal from joint bargaining was unequivocal despite the fact that it proceeded to bargain with the Respondent on a pension plan when the Respondent informed Local 369 that it was unwilling to bargain separately. The Respondent was notified at all times that the Union was reserving its right to have this case resolved by the Board.[6]

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to negotiate separately with Local 369 over a pension plan covering the employees in the production and maintenance unit it represents.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Boston Edison Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO; Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO; Local 387, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO; and Local 386, Utility Workers Union of America are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The appropriate collective-bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent including those employees in the classifications listed in the pay schedule effective 13 June 1986 of the collec-covering employees in 19 bargaining units. Negotiations between Shell and OCAW had always been conducted separately for contracts covering each of the 19 units and the parties never engaged in multiunit or joint bargaining. Representatives of OCAW's employees proposed that Shell bargain with them on a joint basis regarding the common fringe benefit plans' revisions. Shell refused. In dismissing the complaint that had been issued based on OCAW's charges, the Board stated that in the absence of an agreement, neither party may attempt to force on the other an enlargement, alteration, or merger of an established unit or units. Thus, an employer (or a union) may lawfully insist on confining bargaining within established unit borders. A union's (or employer's) attempt by coercive means, or by insistence in bargaining to the point of impasse, to require an alteration of a unit will be regarded as a unilateral attack on the integrity of the established bargaining unit.

[5] The fact that a similar charge filed in 1972 was dismissed by the Regional Director does not constitute precedent for our decision. Nevertheless, we find that the facts in the instant case are different than those present in the 1972 case in that here, unlike in 1972, the National specifically notified the Respondent that Local 369 had permission to proceed separately for the 1986 negotiations to modify the pension plan.

[6] We agree with the General Counsel that the fact that Local 369 executed a pension plan agreement with the Respondent subsequent to the filing of the unfair labor practice charge does not render this case moot. See, e.g., Massillon Publishing Co., 215 NLRB 380 (1974); Pacific Coast Assn. of Pulp & Paper Mfrs., 133 NLRB 690 fn. 1 (1961). Here Local 369 was coerced by the Respondent's unlawful refusal to bargain into either foregoing a pension plan covering the bargaining unit employees it represents or joining in the execution of the companywide plan. The fact that it chose one of these options does not render this case moot. This is particularly true in this case where Local 369 clearly informed the Respondent of its intention to preserve its argument that the Respondent's refusal to bargain separately was violative of Sec. 8(a)(5) and Local 369 pursued the instant unfair labor practice charge.

tive bargaining agreement between Respondent, Local 369 and the National Union but excluding meter readers, foremen, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times relevant the National Union and Local 369 have been and are now the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing and refusing to bargain separately with Local 369 on a retirement/pension plan for employees in the production and maintenance unit.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[7]

We have found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to bargain separately with Local 369 regarding a retirement/pension plan covering the employees in the production and maintenance unit. In order to remedy these unfair labor practices, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist and, on request, to rescind the pension agreement reached and to bargain separately with Local 369 on a pension plan covering the production and maintenance unit and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Boston Edison Company, Boston, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain separately with Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit on a retirement/pension plan covering unit employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On the request of Local 369, rescind any agreement covering a pension plan for unit employees.

(b) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent including those employees in the classifications listed in the pay schedule effective 13 June 1986 of the collective bargaining agreement between Respondent, Local 369 and the National Union but excluding meter readers, foremen, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

(c) Post at its facility in Boston, Massachusetts, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[7] As noted above the General Counsel requests that the Order include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain separately with Local 369, Utility Workers Union of America, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the production and maintenance bargaining unit on a retirement/pension plan.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, rescind any agreement covering a pension plan for unit employees and, on request, bargain with Local 369 and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on a retirement/-pension plan for our employees in the production and maintenance bargaining unit.

BOSTON EDISON COMPANY

Blankenship and Associates, Inc. and Rayford T. Blankenship and Sheboygan Graphic Communications Union Local 556, Subordinate to the Graphic Communication International Union and Diamond Printing Company Employee Committee. Case 30–CA–9265

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On August 13, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the Respondents filed exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.[1]

1. The judge concluded, inter alia, that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by counseling the Employer, Diamond Printing Company (not a respondent herein), to remove Walter Hake as personnel/labor relations director, in response to employee complaints about him and in order to influence the outcome of the upcoming election by discouraging support for the Union. We disagree with the judge.

The facts, as set forth more fully by the judge, are essentially as follows. On March 21, 1986,[2] the Union filed a petition with the Board to represent the Employer's full-time production and maintenance employees for purposes of collective bargaining. On April 4, the Employer contractually engaged the services of Respondent Blankenship and Associates, Inc., as the Employer's "representative in such NLRB case and any concurrent, subsequent or related cases, if any." The representation election was scheduled for May 16.

On April 7, the Respondents conducted a meeting with the employees. The employees complained about the allegedly harsh manner in which Walter Hake, the Employer's chief executive officer, conducted personnel and employee relations matters. Thereafter, Respondent Blankenship informed the Employer's president, Randall Hake (Walter Hake's son) that the employees did not want Walter Hake to continue to manage personnel and labor relations matters. Blankenship told Randall that he felt that "some changes should be made in that area." Randall asked Blankenship to put his recommendations in writing to Randall. Blankenship agreed to do so.

In the meantime, on April 15, four of the Employer's supervisors signed and gave to Randall, for his review, a letter addressed to Walter stating, inter alia, that:

> [W]e the supervisory personnel along with the recommendation of the Labor Consultant, feel that a change must be made in personnel handling for the benefit of the company and its employees.
> In our opinion, all personnel matters such as: pay raises, vacation time, disciplinary matters, etc. should be turned over to Randall Hake.

Two days later, on April 17, the Respondents sent Randall a letter containing recommendations regarding their April 7 meeting with the employees. The letter, signed by Respondent Blankenship, stated, in pertinent part:

> I strongly suggest you take your Dad out of the day-to-day labor relations management. . . . In fact, you should take your Dad's place if possible.
> I am very hesitant about suggesting such, but I feel that we can't win the union election without such.

Thereafter, Randall discussed with Walter the possibility that the former would replace the latter in managing the Employer's personnel and employee relations matters; Walter agreed to relinquish his responsibilities. On April 23, Randall posted a notice to all employees advising them that he had assumed authority and responsibility for all personnel matters.

The judge preliminarily found that in removing Walter Hake from his position as personnel/-employee relations manager in response to employee complaints about his performance, the Employer acted unlawfully by granting the employees a change in their working conditions. Thus, the judge found that employees could reasonably perceive Walter Hake's removal as a benefit or response to their expressed grievances or to their reasons for seeking unionization, given for the purpose of discouraging employee support for the Union. The judge then found that the Respondents violat-

[1] We agree with the judge's finding that the preparation of the answer to the complaint in this proceeding is not an unfair labor practice. We therefore find it unnecessary to the disposition of this case to determine whether the crime or fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege applies here. See, however, Patrick Cudahy, Inc., 288 NLRB 968 (1988), in which we rejected the position taken by the Board in NLRB v. Harvey, 349 F.2d 900 (4th Cir. 1965), that a violation of the NLRA constitutes a crime or fraud for purposes of the crime or fraud exception to the attorney-client privilege.

ed the Act by counseling the Employer to engage in this unlawful conduct.

In so finding, the judge relied on the Board's decision in Resistance Technology, 280 NLRB 1004 (1986), in which the Board found that an employer's instruction to a supervisor to commit an unfair labor practice is an unfair labor practice when the instruction is carried out or the employees otherwise become aware that the instruction was given.[3] Analogizing to Resistance Technology, the judge found that the Respondents' advice to the Employer to commit the unfair labor practice of removing Walter Hake as personnel/employee relations manager was an unfair labor practice because the Employer followed that advice and removed Walter Hake.[4] According to the judge:

> If an employer can be held accountable for its instructions or even suggestions to its supervisory personnel which result in the commission of unfair labor practices, than it would seem only proper that a professional counselor should be held responsible for its advice which has the same unlawful effect.

Contrary to the judge, we find Resistance Technology and Walker's to be inapposite. In those cases the principals (the employers) were held liable for the unlawful acts of their agents (the supervisors or the buyers). This is in keeping with fundamental precepts of the law of agency.[5] However, unlike in Resistance Technology and Walker's, the judge here found that the agents (the Respondents) violated the Act because the principal (the Employer) violated the Act on the agents' advice. In this regard, we find that the judge has improperly held the Respondents, as the Employer's agents, responsible for the unlawful act of the Employer, as principal—a notion that is clearly foreign to agency principles. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[6]

2. The judge also concluded that the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act by formulating, and counseling the Employer to implement, a plan to establish an employee committee to negotiate and develop with the Employer a new set of work rules. We do not agree with the judge in this regard. Initially we find that, as noted above, the Respondents as the Employer's agents cannot be held liable for the acts of the Employer even if it was found that the Respondents had formulated and then counseled the Employer to implement a plan to establish an employee committee. Thus, we find no violation on that basis. However, on review of the record, we note additionally that we do not agree with the judge's factual conclusions with regard to this allegation. Thus, contrary to the judge's express and implicit factual finding that the Respondents formulated and counseled the Employer to implement such a plan, the record establishes that it was the Employer's president, Randall Hake, who formulated and implemented this plan, without the advice or substantive foreknowledge of the Respondents.

The record establishes, and the judge found, that the Respondents advised Hake to update the Employer's work rules. Indeed, the Respondents provided Hake with four or five different proposed sets of new work rules. But according to Hake himself, he asked the Respondents in mid-May, "Can I go ahead and proceed with my plan to set up a committee that we could develop a new set of work rules." There is no evidence that Hake had ever before mentioned such an employee committee to the Respondents. Hake testified that he was told in reply by the Respondents "that I have to run the business." The next day, according to Hake, in response to his above conversation with the Respondents "and my own plan to revise the work rules and make changes in the work force," he held a meeting of all employees, at which he told them that he would like to proceed with formulating a committee and establishing a new set of work rules. Towards that end, Hake instructed the employees to elect two people to meet with Hake and the plant superintendent to revamp the existing work rules. Employees Kenneth Martin and Marjorie Grinnell were elected as the employee representatives.

Hake testified that his only consultation with the Respondents about this employee committee before he actually implemented this plan was to the extent that, on the day before he actually implemented this plan, "when I laid it out to [them, the Respondents told me] that I should go ahead and I should run the business the way I saw fit." Hake testified that when he asked the Respondents whether he could form such an employee committee to develop new work rules, the Respondents did not advise him to form, to assist in forming, or

[3] The Board majority in Resistance Technology also found that such an instruction to a supervisor is not an unfair labor practice when the instruction is not carried out and the employees do not otherwise become aware that the instruction was given. Chairman (then-Member) Stephens and Member Babson found it unnecessary to decide this issue because, in Resistance Technology, the instructions were executed and disclosed.

[4] In finding a violation of the Act in the instant circumstances, the judge also cited Walker's, 159 NLRB 1159, 1175, 1179 (1966), as a case in which the Board found the employer violated the Act by suggesting to buyer employees (nonsupervisory, unit personnel who were viewed by other employees as management) that they interrogate employees about their union sentiments.

[5] Restatement 2d, Agency, § 212 and comment a (1957).

[6] See St. Francis Hospital, 263 NLRB 834, 847–850 (1982), affd. 729 F.2d 844 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

to even meet with such a committee, but simply advised Hake to run his own business.

The testimony of employee committee member Marjorie Grinnell is consistent with the testimony of Randall Hake that it was he, and not the Respondents, who formulated and implemented the plan to form an employee committee to develop new work rules. Thus, according to Grinnell, when she herself earlier asked the Respondents in April if the employees could form a committee, the Respondents simply advised Grinnell to contact the National Labor Relations Board for guidance on that subject. In Grinnell's testimonial account of Hake's subsequent mid-May announcement of the formation of an employee committee, Hake made no mention of the Respondents, but instead simply told the assembled employees that (in Grinnell's words)

> [W]e had to get together and try to come up with a plan to keep the business going and therefore, he [i.e. Hake] thought it would be a good idea if we would elect . . . two representatives, employee representatives, to sit down with him and [the plant manager] and draw up a policy . . . that we would have work rules and vacation provisions in it, and such.

In light of the above facts and in the absence of any record evidence to the contrary, we find that the preponderance of the evidence establishes that the Employer's president, Randall Hake, acting on his own initiative and without the advice or substantive foreknowledge of the Respondents, formulated and implemented the plan to form an employee committee to develop new work rules. Thus, we find that the factual predicate for the judge's unfair labor practice finding in this context—that the Respondents formulated and advised Hake to implement such a plan—is not supported by, and indeed is contradicted by, the record. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation.[7]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[7] To the extent, if any, that the judge's unfair labor practice finding in this context may have been premised on the alleged failure of the Respondents affirmatively to instruct Hake not to proceed with his plan to form such an employee committee, we find that the judge based such a rationale on the same factual predicate that we have found not to be supported by the record, i.e., that the Respondents themselves had initially formulated and advised Hake to implement such a plan. (See the final par. of sec. III,E, of the judge's decision). As indicated, the record fails to establish that the Respondent's had anything more than the barest and briefest foreknowledge that Hake planned to form an employee committee to develop new work rules.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting in part.

I agree with the majority's dismissal of the complaint except as to the actions of Respondent Blankenship in counseling Diamond Printing to remove Walter Hake as personnel/labor relations director in order to discourage support of the Union; counseling that was heeded and acted on by Diamond. I agree with the judge for the reasons he gave that by counseling the Employer to commit unfair labor practices, Blankenship, as the Employer's labor consultant, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In doing so, I hold Blankenship accountable for his own action, not that of the Employer.[1]

Further, although I agree with the majority that Blankenship did not violate the Act by counseling the Employer to implement a plan to establish an employee committee to negotiate with the Employer, I do so because the facts do not support the finding of a violation, not because Blankenship was an agent of the Employer and thus could not violate the Act in his own right.

[1] The statute defines the term "employer" to include an "agent." Statutory prohibitions against "employer" conduct, thus, also run against the "agent" of an employer.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on 31 March and 1 and 2 April 1987. The charge was filed on 30 June 1986 by Sheboygan Graphic Communications Union Local 556, Subordinate to the Graphic Communication International Union (the Union).[1] the complaint, which issued on 3 December and was amended at the hearing, alleges that Blankenship and Associates, Inc. and Rayford T. Blankenship (Associates and Blankenship, respectively, and collectively Respondents), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act.[2] The gravamen of the complaint is that Respondent allegedly counseled Diamond Printing Co., Inc. (Diamond) in the commission of unfair labor practices that were subsequently settled informally by the Company, and allegedly engaged in unfair labor practices involving the Company's employees; specifically, soliciting grievances,

[1] All dates refer to 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] By letter dated 27 April 1987, the General Counsel indicated that it would not proceed on certain other allegations of the complaint (pars. 10(b) and (c)). The General Counsel's request in its brief (fn. 1) to withdraw pars. 12 and 15 of the complaint, which were based on pars. 10(b) and (c), is granted.

promising benefits, advising employees that they could obtain such benefits without a union, and suggesting that employees could negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement with the Company. Respondents, by their answer, denied commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs.[3] The General Counsel and Blankenship each filed briefs. On the entire record in this case,[4] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and having considered the briefs submitted by the parties, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENTS AND THE EMPLOYER INVOLVED

Diamond, a Wisconsin corporation, is engaged in the commercial printing of business forms and envelopes at its Sheboygan, Wisconsin plant. In the operation of its business, Diamond annually purchases goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside of Wisconsin, and annually ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside of Wisconsin. In their answer to the complaint, Respondents pleaded no knowledge about these matters. However, in the representation proceeding involved in this case, Blankenship on behalf of Diamond stipulated the commerce facts. I find that Diamond is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Associates, a corporation with its principal office and place of business in Greenwood, Indiana, is engaged in the business of labor consultants, principally representing management in labor relations matters. In the operation of its business, Associates has an annual gross revenue in excess of $250,000, and annually performs services valued in excess of $50,000 for employers located in States other than Indiana, many, if not all, of whom are in interstate commerce. It is undisputed that at all times material, Blankenship has been and is chief executive officer and the majority stockholder of Associates.

In their answer, Respondents assert that they "were employed as agents of [Diamond] for the limited purpose of assisting [Diamond] in Case No. 30–RC–4566" (the representation proceeding). The General Counsel also contends (Br. 9–10) that Respondents acted as the agents of Diamond. Because the present case involves an employer engaged in commerce (Diamond) it is immaterial whether Associates meets any standard for assertion of Board jurisdiction. See, e.g., St. Mary's Infant Home, 258 NLRB 1024, 1031 (1981), enfd. in pertinent part 690 F.2d 1062, 1070 (4th Cir. 1982); and Chalk Metal Co., 197 NLRB 1133 (1972), in which the Board asserted its jurisdiction over a labor relations consultant without making specific findings concerning the commerce of the consultant. This is not a case involving the labor relations of Associates vis-a-vis its own employees. In the absence of such situations, jurisdiction may be based on the commerce of any affected person or persons, e.g., in cases involving alleged union unfair labor practices, on the commerce of any affected or involved employer or employers. The General Counsel suggests (Br. 7), that jurisdiction may be asserted over labor relations consultants under the same standard applicable to law firms. In fact, the Board has asserted jurisdiction over a consulting firm, using the same standards generally applicable to nonretail business. St. Francis Hospital, 263 NLRB 834, 839 (1982), affd. 729 F.2d 844, 851 (D.C. Cir. 1984). In any event, regardless of which standard is used, this case meets both the statutory and the Board's self-imposed tests for jurisdiction. I find that Associates is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, that Blankenship is an agent of Associates within the meaning of Section 2(2) and (13) of the Act, that Associates and Blankenship were at times material, at least arguably agents of Diamond, and therefore that it would effectuate the policies of the Act for the Board to assert its jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

It is undisputed that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. I shall reserve to the merits of this case the question whether Diamond Printing Company Employee Committee (sometimes employee committee) was at times material a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

Diamond is a family-owned and operated business. As of March 1986, Walter Hake was chief executive officer, chairman of the board, and minority stockholder. His son, Randall Hake, was president and majority stockholder. Walter was responsible for personnel relations. The Company had about 17 plant employees. On 21 March the Union filed a petition for a Board-conducted election among the Company's production and maintenance employees (Case 30–RC–4566). The Hakes decided to retain a labor relations firm. They received a solicitation letter from Blankenship (who evidently kept himself informed of representation petitions filed with the Board), and on 4 April, Diamond retained Associates as its representative in the representation case and any related litigation. Associates requested and the Regional Director issued an order postponing the representation hearing from 8 to 10 April. On 11 April, Diamond, by Blankenship, and the Union executed a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election, which was subsequently approved by the Regional Director. The election was scheduled for 16 May.

In the meantime, on 7 April, Blankenship, accompanied by his associate James Pierce, met with the Hakes to discuss their strategy in opposing the Union. Blankenship asked for and received permission to meet with the [3] On 31 March 1987 the Board denied Blankenship's motion for special permission to appeal from the Regional Director's order denying Blankenship's motion for a further continuance and adjournment of the hearing (the Regional Director having granted Respondents' prior request for a continuance of 7 weeks). On 31 March 1987, I denied Blankenship's renewed motion for a further continuance.

[4] Transcript corrections are noted and corrected.

supervisory personnel and with the employees without the Hakes being present, in order to learn the situation and to determine the employees' attitudes and concerns. That afternoon Blankenship, accompanied by Pierce, conducted a meeting of the employees on company premises and time, to which the employees were summoned by their supervisors and for which they were paid. Pierce and employee Kenneth Martin, who were both presented as the General Counsel's witnesses, testified concerning the meeting.[5] Their testimony was mutually corroborative in part, but conflicted in certain important respects. Both testified in sum that most but not all the meeting was tape recorded.[6] They also testifed, in sum, that Blankenship presented an antiunion film entitled "Floyd." Martin testified in sum as follows: Blankenship identified himself as a labor consultant, and described how unions allegedly functioned. Employee Marjorie Grinnell asked Blankenship whether he was an attorney. Blankenship said that he was a lawyer rather than an attorney, and explained the difference (Blankenship evidently is a law school graduate, but not admitted to any bar). Employer Donald Wield, the principal union adherent, made some comment, whereupon Blankenship retorted that he had heard of Wield, and then proceeded to change the subject. He asked the employees what their problems were, and they proceeded to air their gripes. Most of the complaints related to the allegedly arbitrary manner in which Walter Hake handled personnel matters including harsh or unusual discipline, favoritism, and avoidance of responsibility for decisions. Some employees complained about the poor condition of the washrooms. Blankenship told the employees that they did not need a union, they could negotiate a contract directly with the Employer and they would have the same safeguards under the Act as they would with a union. Martin left about 15 minutes before the meeting ended. (Blankenship told him he had to remain because he was on worktime. Martin refused to remain, and walked out. No punitive action was taken against him.) Pierce testified in sum as follows: Employee Wield accused Blankenship of practicing law without a license. He made other accusations during the meeting. Blankenship discussed unions, using charts, and asserted in essence that unionization would deprive the employees of a voice in management, and that it was simple to get a union in but difficult to get it out. Blankenship asked the employees what their problems were. Wield said they did not get sufficient increases, were not treated properly, and that Walter Hake was a tyrant. Blankenship asked Wield if he confronted management. Wield answered that it did no good. Another employee complained about being deprived of holiday pay for being late. One female employee asked about whether they could start "an employee type union," whereupon Blankenship answered that "you people pay taxes and there is such a place as the Labor Board and you should bring your questions to their attention." He offered to get them the Board's telephone number. Pierce testified that, except as indicated above, Blankenship did not advise the employees about what they could do about their problems.

I credit Pierce's testimony concerning the 7 April meeting, and I credit Martin's testimony only insofar as it is consistent with that of Pierce. I specifically do not credit Martin's testimony to the effect that Blankenship sugggested or advised that the employees could negotiate a contract directly with Diamond. In so doing, I find significant the testimony of Marjorie Grinnell. On her direct testimony, the General Counsel did not question Grinnell about the 7 April meeting. However, on cross-examination by Blankenship, Grinnell testified that at a meeting of employees addressed by Blankenship, she asked whether they could form an employee committee, that Blankenship referred her to the Board, and that Pierce gave her the Board's telephone number. The testimony in this case indicates that there were captive audience meetings on 7 April and 2 and 12 May. Blankenship spoke only briefly at the 12 May meeting, without discussing any substantive matters, and the evidence fails to indicate any such exchange between Grinnell and Blankenship at the 2 May meeting. In light of Pierce's testimony, it is evident that Grinnell was referring to the 7 April meeting. I find it unlikely that Blankenship would suggest formation of an employee committee to deal directly with management, while at the same time telling an employee who made the same suggestion to ask the Board whether it was proper. Moreover, as will be discussed, Blankenship did not talk to Diamond about an employee committee until after the 7 April meeting. It is unlikely that Blankenship would have made such a suggestion to the employees without first consulting with the Hakes. I find that Grinnell, not Blankenship, first raised the matter of an employee committee.[7]

[5] Respondent did not present any witnesses. Blankenship, the key figure in this case, did not testify. No adverse inference is warranted from either the failure of Blankenship to testify on behalf of Respondents or the General Counsel's failure to call him as an adverse witness. O'Dovero Construction, 264 NLRB 751 fn. 1 (1982).

[6] At the hearing, Respondents objected to any testimony concerning the substance of the meeting because the tapes constituted "the best evidence of what was said." There are several problems with this argument. Neither the tapes nor any transcriptions were offered in evidence or authenticated, except for a page of the approximately 50-page transcript of the 7 April meeting, which was offered in evidence by the General Counsel. That page, insofar as pertinent to the issues of this case, reflected an employee complaint about Walter Hake, and a statement evidently made by Blankenship that: "The only thing that I can tell you is that I will honestly try to get some answers for you. I will tell you this, it would be illegal for me to stand here and tell you that we will adjust all your complaints. That would violate the law." The General Counsel took the position that the transcript of the 7 April meeting was generally unreliable, and both Pierce and Martin indicated in their testimony that the tapes were incomplete. The Board has received tapes or transcriptions in evidence and has sometimes found them to be the "best evidence" of a meeting or conversation. However, there is no rule of evidence that requires their acceptance to the exclusion of oral testimony, even when the parties have stipulated about their accuracy (which is not the situation here). The "best evidence" rule relied on by Respondents stands for the proposition that the terms of a document must be proved by production of the document. 4 Wigmore, Evidence ¶ 1174 (Chadbourn rev. 1972). Here, the witnesses did not testify about contents of the transcription, i.e., the "document." Rather, they testified about the meeting itself. Therefore, the rule is inapplicable.

[7] Ordinarily I might be inclined to give greater weight to the testimony of a current, disinterested employee than to that of an interested employer or union representative. However, the present case presents a somewhat different situation. At the time of the present hearing, Martin was a member of the Union's negotiating committee, and his employer,

After Blankenship and Pierce met with the employees (and also met separately with the supevisory personnel on 7 April), they met with Randall Hake to discuss their conclusions and recommendations. Blankenship advised Randall Hake that the employees could not work well with his father, and that Walter Hake should no longer handle personnel relations. Blankenship also advised that Diamond should update its work rules. Diamond had in effect a written five-page statement of "policies for full time plant employees," dated 6 July 1981. This document covered, among other matters, employee benefits, absenteeism, tardiness, and discipline. However, these policies were not uniformly followed by management, and in fact Walter Hake tended to handle such matters as discipline in an arbitrary manner. Blankenship offered to provide Diamond with sample work rules and a list of proposed work rules for Diamond. Randall Hake asked Blankenship to put his recommendations in letter form, and Blankenship agreed to do so. By letter dated 17 April, Blankenship told Randall Hake that, in light of the employees' comments at the 7 April meeting, "I strongly suggest that you take your Dad out of the day-to-day labor relations management regarding the employees in the plant," and that "You should take your Dad's place if possible." Blankenship opined that "I feel that we can't win the union election without such." He also enclosed "a copy of the contract that you should consider adopting after we rid you of the union problem." Blankenship added: "From looking at what you have and listening to your employees, it is imperative that what you have in the way of policies, rules, wages, and hours be modified and brought up-to-date as quickly as possible." The enclosed "contract" copy actually purported to be an employee policy pamphlet rather than a contract. Among a long list of offenses warranting disciplinary action, the pamphlet listed as "terminal offenses . . . advocating trouble between management and the employees" and "unauthorized entry on company property." Randall Hake testified that Blankenship advised him to distribute copies of the pamphlet to the supervisors, "and leave them available in the plant for scrutiny if anybody so wished." However, Hake admittedly understood that the pamphlet "was a general outline of policies that were intended to be implemented at [Diamond] once we had resolved the Union issue." Hake also testified that James Pierce gave him several samples of policies that he might use. Pierce testified that he prepared three copies of the policy pamphlet for Randall Hake and told him not to use them until there was a decision on the election. To evaluate the testimony of Pierce and Hake, which in some respects appears inconsistent, it is necessary to first consider subsequent developments.

By letter dated 15 April to Walter Hake, Diamond's supervisory personnel requested that he turn over responsibility for personnel relations to his son. Randall Hake also confronted his father with Blankenship's letter. At a family meeting, Walter Hake agreed to the transfer of authority. On 23 April Randall Hake posted a notice to the company personnel that effective as of that date he was assuming "authority and responsibility for all personnel matters." On 22 April Walter Hake made a last-ditch effort to reassert his former authority by firing Donald Wield. However, Randall Hake immediately countermanded this action, and there was no further challenge to his authority.[8]

As indicated, there was a captive-audience meeting on 2 May. Blankenship conducted the meeting, and a film was shown. Employee Martin testified that Blankenship showed the employees the policy pamphlet (which he had sent to Hake) as a prototype of a contract that could possibly be drafted between the employees and Diamond. Martin testified that Blankenship had two copies with him, that he gave one to Marjorie Grinnell, that the employees requested more copies, and that the next day he found a copy on his worktable. However, in his investigatory affidavit to the Board, Martin stated that Randall Hake (who was present at the 2 May meeting) showed the employees a copy of the policy pamphlet, said that it was patterned after something Blankenship gave him, that he would make additional copies to be circulated among the employees, and that they should make notes of proposed changes. Grinnell testified that copies of the policy pamphlet were distributed at the 12 May meeting. After some equivocation, Grinnell testified that she thought Blankenship distributed copies of the pamphlet. However, on cross-examination, she testified that Randall Hake distributed copies of the pamphlet. In her investigatory affidavit, Grinnel stated that Hake "had a copy of an 'employee policy pamphlet'" which he said Associates prepared as a guideline and that Hake would have copies made for everybody. I do not credit the testimony of Martin and Grinnell that Blankenship distributed copies of the policy pamphlet. For reasons that will be discussed, I find that Hake distributed copies at a meeting of employees on or shortly after 14 May, at which Blankenship was not present.

Randall Hake was not present at the 7 April and 2 May meetings. However, he was scheduled to address the employees at the 12 May meeting, and Pierce prepared a speech for his use. Pierce's draft was about 1-1/2 typewritten pages. I have found nothing unlawful in this draft, nor does the General Counsel contend that it contains any unlawful statements. The draft contains no express or implied threats of reprisal or promises of benefit. However, Hake, acting on his own and without consulting Blankenship or Pierce, decided to use Pierce's draft only as a starting point for his own speech. Hake struck out much of Pierce's draft, decided to paraphrase other portions, and added his own handwritten draft.[9] Hake

Diamond, is not a respondent in this proceeding. Therefore, Martin was not testifying against the interests of his employer. Subsequent to the event involved in this case, Blankenship fired Pierce, and by the time of this hearing Pierce was engaged in the labor relations consulting business in competition with Blankenship. Therefore, he had no evident reason to testify falsely to advance Blankenship's interests.

[8] From this point on, "Hake" refers to Randall Hake, unless the context indicates otherwise.

[9] Hake testified in detail concerning his revisions and the resulting speech, which he delivered, and his testimony was corroborated by Pierce. I do not credit employee Martin's uncorroborated testimony to the effect that Hake delivered both Pierce's draft and his own in their entirety. This appears to be another illustration of Martin's general unreliability as a witness.

did not show his draft to Blankenship or Pierce and they did not ask to see it, although Hake told them that he had altered Pierce's text. The resulting speech was considerably different from that drafted by Pierce. Blankenship, Pierce, and the Company's supervisory personnel were present at the 12 May meeting. Hake testified that he told Blankenship and Pierce that if he said anything "that was blatantly illegal," they should interrupt and stop him. Marjorie Grinnell testified that Hake told the employees that Blankenship was there to stop him if he said anything wrong (Hake's text did not contain any such comment). After restating Diamond's opposition to unionization and reminding the employees of their present benefits, Hake stated that as a result of "this situation . . . all people involved become aware that it was time for my Dad to surrender the reins as it pertains to labor relations," and that "things are not going to revert back once the union issue is resolved." Hake told the employees to "direct all concerns about wages, vacations, etc. to your supervisor and they in turn, if need be, will consult me." Hake then declared that: "As soon as this week's election has been conducted . . . hopefully as I see it for the best—no union—we will start to develop a contract and work rules that we can live by! This should be in place by July 1, 1986." At this point, Hake's text indicates "show sample." However, neither Hake nor Pierce testified that Hake distributed copies of the sample policy pamphlet at this meeting. Hake concluded by exhorting the employees to give him a chance, and specifically to give him 1 year "to make the changes without having to pay the costs of belonging to a union."

After Hake delivered his prepared remarks and called for questions, employee Wield challenged Blankenship's credibility. Hake explained that he retained Blankenship because he needed a labor relations consultant, and Blankenship admonished Wield not to slander him. Blankenship did not interrupt Hake during his speech. Hake testified that after the meeting Blankenship told him that the speech was fine, that "there were gray areas in there which could present some problems," but that "what is done is done." Pierce testified that after the meeting Blankenship asked him if he noticed "that Randy broke the law." Pierce answered he did not, whereupon Blankenship responded that Hake "in effect promised the people that he was going to make some improvements," adding that he hoped no one else caught it. Neither Blankenship nor Pierce told Hake that he said anything unlawful. However, Pierce stated in his investigatory affidavit that Blankenship previously advised Hake "not to make any outright promises to employees," and Hake admitted that Blankenship sent him written instructions to supervisors that indicated that they could not "make any promise of benefits in return for vote against a union."

On 14 May, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge (Case 30–CA–9216), alleging that Diamond was violating Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, among other things, by making promises of benefits at captive-audience speeches in late April and on 2 and 12 May. The following day, the Board's Regional Director issued an order postponing the election indefinitely, pending investigation of the charge. On learning that the election would be put off, Hake telephoned Associates and spoke to Pierce. Hake asked whether Diamond could proceed with the plan to set up a committee to develop a new set of work rules. Pierce said he would check with Blankenship. Shortly thereafter, Pierce called back, stating that he had checked with Blankenship, who said to tell Hake that Hake had to "run the business." Pierce told Hake to go ahead and run the business as he saw fit. On or shortly after 14 May, Hake summoned a meeting of the employees. He told them that the election was called off because the Union filed charges, but that he had to keep the business going, and wanted to proceed with forming a committee to prepare a new set of work rules. Hake instructed the employees to elect two representatives to meet with himself and Plant Superintendent Leon Ristenpadt. Hake then left the meeting. The employees selected Grinnell and Martin as their representatives, and Hake was informed of their decision. I find that at this meeting Hake circulated copies of the sample policy pamphlet given to him by Blankenship. As indicated, Hake referred to the sample at the 12 May meeting. The affidavits of Grinnell and Martin indicate that Hake did not circulate copies when he first showed the pamphlet, but promised to make copies for distribution. It is unlikely that Hake would have made such distribution before checking with Associates about whether he could proceed with the committee plan, as the distribution would have served no purpose except as a guide for negotiations. It is also unlikely that Hake would have singled out Grinnell and Martin to receive the pamphlets unless he learned that they would be the employee representatives.

The employer-employee committee first met on 27 May. Hake told Grinnell and Martin that he had to have a set of work rules in place by 1 July, which was Diamond's biannual wage review date. He told them that Diamond's 1981 policy statement would be the basis for discussion. The joint committee met again on 29 May and 3 June. The committee met on work time for which the employees were paid. Grinnell acted as secretary. She made minutes, typed them, including matters on which they agreed, and circulated copies to the other three representatives. By 3 June, the joint committe had agreed on and reduced to writing a document entitled "Policies for Full-Time Plant Employees," to be effective beginning 1 July 1986 for a period of 1 year. The document provided for annual meetings between management and employee representatives Grinnell and Martin for the purpose of reviewing wages and other conditions of employment for the forthcoming year. The document spelled out terms and conditions of employment concerning hospitalization plan, probationary employment, discipline, layoff and termination and grievance procedure (including meetings between management and employee representatives), absence and tardiness, wages (including a schedule of wage increases), service credit, overtime, and vacations. Many of these provisions reflected changes in wages and other working conditions. The joint committee was scheduled to meet again on 5 June. However, as a result of intervening developments, the meeting never took place.

After receiving the Union's initial unfair practice charge, Hake had second thoughts about retaining Associates. Hake expressed his concern to Pierce about the mounting cost of representation. Pierce offered an adjustment on rates, and suggested that Hake talk to Blankenship. However, following the 3 June employer-employee meeting, Grinnell and Martin told Hake that they questioned the propriety of this procedure and suggested that he retain an attorney. Hake's corporate law firm referred him to Attorney Alfred Heon of the law firm of White and Hirschboeck. On 5 June, Diamond retained Heon to replace Associates. That same day the Union filed an amended charge, alleging that Diamond was violating Section 8(a)(2) of Act by "assisting and/or dominating in the formation of a labor organization." Heon immediately advised Hake to discontinue the employee committee, which he did. On 30 June, the Union filed the present charge against Respondent. In mid-August, Diamond and the Union executed an informal Board settlement agreement in Case 30–CA–9216, which was approved by the Regional Director on 25 August. The settlement provided, among other things, that Diamond has disestablished the employee committee and ceased negotiating with it, and will not give effect to the negotiated terms, except for the agreed-on wage increase. The settlement further provided that Diamond has discontinued the service of Blankenship as its labor relations consultant, and "will not rely upon, implement nor follow any advice he previously gave us which is contrary to the pledge" contained in the settlement. The settlement agreement also provided that Diamond and the General Counsel "understand and agree" that the settlement resolves only the allegations against Diamond in Case 30–CA–9216, that the General Counsel is not precluded from proceeding on any other charge against any other person or entity, including the charge in Case 30–CA–9265, that evidence in Case 30–CA–9216 may be used in such other proceedings, and that no other relief would be sought against Diamond. On 31 October a Board election was conducted among Diamond's employees. The Union won, was certified, and at the time of the present hearing, Diamond and the Union were negotiating a contract.

B. The Attorney-Client Privilege Issue

Daniel McCarthy, who was presented as a General Counsel witness, is an attorney who is admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of Ohio and the United States Supreme Court. After leaving the United States Army, where he served as a JAGC officer, he was employed by Associates as a "labor consultant." Blankenship told McCarthy that Associates' staff, including Blankenship himself, practiced before the Board in that capacity and did not practice as attorneys. Associates did not itself conduct litigation before the courts in connection with Board proceedings, but referred such litigation to an outside law firm. However, Blankenship sometimes used the terms "attorney" and "lawyer" in referring to himself and his associates. Thus, on one occasion, Blankenship told a client that "we are all attorneys." As indicated Blankenship told Diamond's employees that he was a lawyer rather than an attorney. On several occasions, McCarthy prepared complaints in civil litigation. However, with one exception—a proceeding in a small claims court that was handled by McCarthy—these matters were referred to outside counsel for litigation.

McCarthy was not involved in the Diamond representation proceeding. However, in July, after the Union filed its charge against Respondents, Blankenship assigned McCarthy to handle the case. McCarthy prepared and submitted a position statement to the Board's Regional Office and unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate a settlement of the case. After the complaint issued, McCarthy drafted the substance of a proposed answer and discussed the answer with Blankenship. At the present hearing, the General Counsel sought to question McCarthy about Blankenship's statements concerning the allegations of the complaint in these discussions.[10] Respondents objected to the introduction of any testimony by McCarthy, invoking the attorney-client privilege, work product privilege, and trade secrets privilege. On consideraton of testimony by McCarthy and argument and citations presented by the parties, I indicated my view that the attorney-client privilege was applicable. However, in view of the importance of the question to the merits of the case, I permitted the Generl Counsel to proceed with his questioning, subject to my ultimate ruling in this decision. McCarthy testified in sum concerning his questions about each allegation of the complaint and Blankenship's responses. McCarthy asked these questions for the purpose of preparing the answer. Blankenship's responses varied in some respects both in substance and form from the answer filed by Respondents, which was prepared and signed by McCarthy. The answer did not consist simply of admissions, denials, and pleas of insufficient knowlege, but was qualified regarding the status of Associates and also contained an affirmative defense. McCarthy indicated in his investigatory affidavit that he and Blankenship discussed and agreed on language concerning the status of Associates. These facts indicate that McCarthy exercised professional discretion in preparing the answer. I indicated at the hearing that McCarthy's testimony tended to confirm my view that the attorney-client privilege was applicable. Having had further opportunity to consider and research the matter, I remain of that view.

The attorney-client privilege extends to the relationship between a business entity and its house counsel. Swan Sales Corp. v. Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 126 Wis. 2d 16 (1985). The privilege also extends to Board proceedings. NLRB v. E. Bruce Harvey, 349 F.2d 900, 904 (4th Cir. 1965). It is not necessary to look much beyond the Harvey decision to ascertain the principles applicable to the present case. In Harvey, the court relied on an "oft quoted definition of the privilege" in U.S. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 89 F.Supp. 357, 358 (D. Mass. 1950), in which Judge Wyzanski stated that

> The privilege applies only if (1) the assert holder of the privilege is or sought to become a client; (2) the person to whom the communication was made (a) is a member of the bar of a court, or his subordinate and (b) in connection with this communication is acting as a lawyer; (3) the communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed (a) by his client (b) without the presence of strangers (c) for the purpose of securing primarily either (i) an opinion on law or (ii) legal services or (iii) assistance in some legal proceeding, and not (d) for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and (4) the privilege has been (a) claimed and (b) not waived by the client.

[10] At the time of the present hearing, MCarthy was no longer employed by Associates. He has engaged in consulting work in competition with Blankenship. There was litigation between Blankenship and his former associates, including McCarthy, which was eventually settled.

The court in Harvey also cited Wigmore's statement of the essentials of the privilege, namely: (1) Where legal advice of any kind is sought (2) from a professional legal adviser in his capacity as such, (3) the communications relating to that purpose, (4) made in confidence (5) by the client, (6) are at his instance permanently protected (7) from disclosure by himself or by the legal adviser, (8) except the protection be waived. 8 Wigmore, Evidence §§2292 (McNaughton rev. 1961). However, the court made clear, as did Judge Wyzanski, that the privilege is not limited to the obtaining of "legal advice," in the strict sense of that term, but also to communications for the purpose of obtaining "legal services" or "assistance in some legal proceeding." The court further held that the "mere fact that a person who is not an attorney could have performed the same service is not a ground for requiring a lawyer to disclose communications with his client discovery proceedings." In Harvey, an attorney refused to comply with a Board subpoena that required him to disclose the identity of a client for whom he had retained a private detective. Plainly this was a service that could have been performed by a nonlawyer. Nevertheless, the court held that the privilege applied if the lawyer hired the detective as an incident to rendering a legal opinion, performing a legal service, or affording representation in legal proceedings, notwithstanding that the detective might have been retained to engage in unlawful surveillance of union organizational activity. On remand, following a hearing, the district court held in sum that the privilege applied because the lawyer retained the detective in furtherance of his client's request for advice "as to what steps he could take in opposition to his plant being organized." NLRB v. Harvey, 264 F.Supp. 770, 771 (W.D. Va. 1966).

The instant case presents all the requisite elements for application of the attorney-client privilege. McCarthy was and is an attorney. Respondents were his clients, in that he was acting as their house counsel. Blankenship answered McCarthy's questions in confidence, for the purpose of enabling McCarthy to prepare an answer to a Board complaint, which is a legal function. Respondents timely invoked the privilege and have not waived the privilege. Nevertheless, the General Counsel argues (Br. 35-36) that the privilege is not here applicable because (1) "McCarthy was not performing legal services, but rather was acting as a scrivener for Blankenship in preparing the Answer," and (2) even if McCarthy was performing attorney work, "it was in aid of the commission of continuing unfair labor practices." Neither argument has merit. The first argument disregards the fact that McCarthy was not simply directed to prepare an answer, but was assigned to handle the case. Pursuant to that assignment, McCarthy prepared a position statement and attempted to negotiate a settlement. If McCarthy had not left Associates he probably would have represented Respondents at the present hearing. Here, as in Harvey, the service performed must be viewed in its overall context. Moreover, the preparation of an answer to a complaint is a legal service. It is not unusual for an attorney to work under the supervision of another person who (as in the case of house counsel), may not even be a lawyer. It is also not unusual for attorneys to prepare "boiler plate" pleadings. In some legal specialties this is the usual procedure. It is also not unusual for an attorney to submit pleadings to his client for approval. In some situations the attorney might be derelict in his responsibilities if he failed to do so. In the present case, the complaint was not against one of Respondents' clients, but was directed against Respondents. Therefore, it is not surprising that Blankenship would want the final say about what went into the answer. However, the presence of any or all of these factors does not negate the fact that preparation of an answer is a legal service.[11] The General Counsel's second argument fails on two grounds. First, under Harvey, an unfair labor practice is neither a crime nor a tort for purposes of the attorney-client privilege (349 F.2d at 904). Second, the preparation of an answer in a Board proceeding is not an unfair labor practice or part of an unfair labor practice, even if the General Counsel thinks the answer is false. I would assume that in most cases in which the complaint alleges unfair labor practices and the allegations are denied, that the General Counsel thinks the answer is false. Therefore, for the reasons discussed, I have not considered McCarthy's testimony concerning his conversations with Blankenship in deciding the merits of this case.[12]

C. Respondents' Procedural Arguments

At the outset of this hearing, Respondents presented several motions for summary dismissal of the complaint. Although Respondents nominally offered various grounds for these motions, e.g., improper service, lack of [11] Underwater Storage v. U.S. Rubber Co., 314 F.Supp. 546 (D.C.D.C. 1970), cited by the General Counsel (Br. 35), is not in point. That case involved the preparation and processing of a patent application, which the court did not regard as a legal function.

[12] Regarding Respondents' remaining objections to McCarthy's testimony, the work product privilege rises or falls with the attorney or client privilege because "the coverage and purposes of the attorney-client privilege are completely subsumed into the work product privilege." Sealed Case, 676 F.2d 793, 812 (D.C. Cir. 1982). Therefore, as the attorney-client privilege is here applicable, the work product privilege is also applicable. If the attorney-client and work product privileges were not applicable, then the trade secrets privilege would also not be applicable because the information in question directly concerns the merits of this case, namely, whether Respondents engaged in or counseled unfair labor practices. Where, as here, the existence of the alleged offense can be proved only by investigating the methods of business of the person invoking the privilege, "it might amount practically to a legal sanction of the wrong if the court conceded to the alleged wrongdoer the privilege of keeping his doings secret from judicial investigation." In that situation "no privilege at all should there be conceded. 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2212 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

jurisdiction, failure to state a claim, mootness, and res judicata, these motions were all based on Respondents' underlying argument that the General Counsel acted improperly by approving a settlement between the Union and Diamond in Case 30–CA–9216 and proceeding separately against Respondents in the present case. Respondents' argument is without merit. The General Counsel has discretion to consolidate or sever proceedings on unfair labor practice charges, subject to review by the Board or courts of appeal, for abuse of that discretion or denial of due process. Packinghouse Workers (Wilson & Co.), 89 NLRB 310 (1950); Board's Rules and Regulations, Section 102.33; Royal Typewriter Co. v. NLRB, 533 F.2d 1030, 1043–1044 (8th Cir. 1976); Teamsters Local 728 (Overnite Transportation) v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 693, 696–697 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 913 (1964); NLRB v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees (Crown Cafeteria), 301 F.2d 149, 155–156 (9th Cir. 1962); Typographical Union (New York Printers), 87 NLRB 1418, 1424–1425 (1949); Webb Tractor & Equipment Co., 181 NLRB 230 fn. 2 (1970). In the present case, the General Counsel had valid reasons for proceeding separately against Respondents. The General Counsel, the Union, and Diamond were able to agree on the terms of a Board settlement, but the General Counsel and Respondents were not able to do so. The situation at Diamond involved a pending representation proceeding. As Respondents no longer represented Diamond, it was possible, through an informal settlement with Diamond, to proceed promptly with an election and thereby resolve the immediate problem and enable the employees to express their free choice, while reserving the General Counsel's claim for prospective relief against Respondents to separate litigation. The Diamond case involved substantially conventional issues, including (as Blankenship himself observed), clear violations of the Act, whereas the case against Respondents involved (as the General Counsel concedes) a substantial and unresolved question of law. Compare Crown Cafeteria, supra, 301 F.2d at 155; Overnite Transportation, 332 F.2d at 696. Respondents were not prejudiced by this procedure. The General Counsel presented Randall Hake and the two employee members of the joint committee as witnesses, and Respondents could have presented any of Diamond's witnesses, and Respondents could have presented any of Diamond's personnel as their own witnesses in this proceeding, but they declined to avail themselves of this opportunity. Respondents were afforded full opportunity to litigate the alleged unfair labor practices at Diamond. Therefore, Respondents have failed to demonstrate that they were prejudiced by the action of the General Counsel in proceeding separately against them. Compare Royal Typewriter, supra; New York Printers Assn., supra; Webb Tractor, supra, 181 NLRB at 235. A Board settlement does not preclude litigation of matters "specifically reserved from the settlement agreement by the mutual understanding of the parties," nor does it preclude presentation of evidence in further or other proceedings where such right is preserved in the terms of the settlement agreement. Cambridge Taxi Co., 260 NLRB 931 (1982); Park-Ohio Industries, 283 NLRB 583 (1987); Air Express International Corp., 245 NLRB 478, 483 (1979), enfd. in pertinent part 659 F.2d 610 (5th Cir. 1981). Here, the Diamond settlement expressly reserved both the right of the General Counsel to proceed separately against Respondents and the right to present evidence in the Diamond case in such separate proceeding. Moreover, Diamond is not an indispensible party in this proceeding. Respondents may be found to have committed unfair labor practices and an appropriate remedial order may issue, either on the basis of Associates' status as an employer under the Act, or on the basis of their status as agents of an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act. St. Francis Federation of Nurses v. NLRB, 729 F.2d 844, 857 (D.C. Cir. 1984); St. Mary's Infant Home, supra.[13] Therefore, Respondents' motions for dismissal, insofar as they were not denied at the hearing, are denied.

D. Alleged Direct Commission of Unfair Labor Practices by Respondents

The complaint alleges in essence that at the captive-audience meetings on 7 April and 2 and 12 May, Blankenship violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by (a) soliciting employee grievances, (b) promising benefits if the Union were unsuccessful in obtaining recognition as their representative, (c) advising the employees that they could accomplish the same improvements in wages, hours, and working conditions without a union, and (d) suggesting that the employees could negotiate a collective-bargaining agreement with Diamond with the full protection afforded by the Act.[14] For the reasons discussed in the "Facts" section of this decision, I find that the credible evidence fails to indicate that Blankenship engaged in any such conduct at the 2 and 12 May meetings, and that Blankenship did not engage in the conduct alleged in paragraphs 11(c) and (d) at the 7 April meeting. The credited evidence also fails to demonstrate that Blankenship made any express promises of benefits. The evidence does demonstrate that Blankenship solicited employee grievances. Indeed that was the principal purpose of the 7 April meeting. Therefore, under the applicable principles of law, the question presented is whether by soliciting employee grievances, Blankenship impliedly promised benefits or redress of grievances if the employees rejected union representation. The General Counsel argues (Br. 17), that: "Solicitation of grievances is a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act." This is not an accurate state-

[13] Blankenship's reliance on Loss v. Blankenship, 673 F.2d 942 (7th Cir. 1982), is misplaced. That case was a class action against Blankenship brought (insofar as pertinent) under Sec. 301(a) of the Act. The court held that Sec. 301(a) of the Act authorizes suits for violation of collective-bargaining contracts only against parties to the contract. As Blankenship functioned as a labor relations consultant to the signatory employer in that case (Mark Twain Marine Industries), he was not amenable to suit under Section 301(a). However, the Board's authority under the Act is not so limited. The courts are not in agreement on this narrow interpretation of Sec. 301(a). See Painting Contractors v. Painters & Decorators, 707 F.2d 1067, 1071 (9th Cir. 1983), cert. denied 460 U.S. 927 (1983).

[14] The complaint is technically defective in that it contains no conclusory allegations with respect to these allegations (contained in par. 11 of the complaint). Rather, the conclusory paragraphs are all addressed to other allegations that Respondents counseled Diamond in the commission of unfair labor practices. However, the matters pleaded in par. 11 were fully litigated, and it is evident that the General Counsel was contending that Respondents thereby violated the Act. I have considered the allegations accordingly.

ment of the law. In Uarco, Inc., 216 NLRB 1 (1974), the Board held as follows:

> the solicitation of grievances at preelection meetings carries with it an inference that an employer is implicitly promising to correct those inequities it discovers as a result of its inquiries. Thus, the Board has found unlawful interference with employee rights by an employer's solicitation of grievances during an organizational campaign although the employer merely stated it would look into or review the problem but did not commit itself to specific corrective action: the Board reasoned that employees would tend to anticipate improved conditions of employment which might make union representation unnecessary. However, it is not the solicitation of grievances itself that is coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1), but the promise to correct grievances or a concurrent interrogation or polling about union sympathies that is unlawful; the solicitation of grievances merely raises an inference that the employer is making such a promise, which inference is rebuttable by the employer.

See also Ace Hardware Corp., 271 NLRB 1174 (1984). It is of course unlawful for an employer to expressly or impliedly promise or grant benefits to its employees to discourage support for a union, regardless of whether such conduct occurs in the context of a solication of benefits. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409–410 (1964).

Applying the foregoing principles to the facts of the present case, I find that the credible evidence rebuts any inference of promises of benefits or redress of grievances. As the employees were well aware, Blankenship was an outside consultant who would have no authority to make promises without the approval of Diamond's management. In fact Blankenship had no such authority. Blankenship was authorized solely to ascertain the employees' attitudes and concerns, and then report back to Hake about what course of action should be taken. Blankenship never said or suggested to the employees that he had any greater authority and discouraged any such inference at several points during the 7 April meeting. The one page of transcript, which the General Counsel offered in evidence, indicates that Blankenship told the employees that it would be illegal for him to say that "we will adjust all your complaints." As the General Counsel points out, such statements do not operate to legalize the solicitation if other evidence indicates that the employer is expressly or impliedly promising benefits or redress of grievances. However, Blankenship's other remarks were consistent with this statement. When employee Wield said that it did no good to confront management with their problems, Blankenship did not express disagreement. When employees Grinnell asked whether they could form an employee committee, Blankenship referred her to the Board's Regional Office. Such responses are inconsistent with a promise of benefits. Blankenship never expressed sympathy with or concern about the employees' problems, and did not even promise to look into these problems. He did suggest that the employees confront management with their grievances. However, such statements, even when made to management directly, do not, standing alone, warrant an inference of or promise that any grievance would be remedied. Cherokee Culvert Co., 262 NLRB 917 fn. 2 (1982). See also Radio Broadcasting Co., 277 NLRB 1112 (1985), affd. sub nom Teamsters Local 115 v. NLRB, 802 F.2d 448 (T) (3d Cir. 1986), in which the Board held that a remark by the employer's president that a wage increase was a good idea but that he could not promise anything, coupled with an unusual grant of wage increases about 4 months later, was insufficient to warrant an inference of a promise to increase wages, and that the president's statements that he would "look into" increased health coverage, coupled with the grant of additional health benefits about 4 months later, was insufficient to warrant an inference of a promise of such benefits. Therefore, I find that Blankenship did not promise benefits if the employees rejected unionization, and I am recommending that the allegations of paragraph 11 of the complaint be dismissed.

E. Alleged Counseling of Unfair Labor Practices by Respondents

The complaint contains several allegations that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) by reason of unfair labor practices committed by Diamond that were "counseled" by Blankenship. I shall first address the allegation pertaining to the replacement of Walter Hake by Randall Hake, as this squarely presents a situation in which Blankenship expressly advised Diamond to engage in unlawful conduct. The compaint alleges in sum that at the 12 May captive-audience meeting, Randall Hake unlawfully stated that he was taking over Diamond's labor relations from his father, and that having counseled such statement Respondents, together with Diamond, were responsible for this unfair labor practice. In fact, Randall Hake announced by notice posted to the employees on 23 April that he was assuming authority and responsibility for all personnel matters, and thereafter confirmed and elaborated on this announcement in his 12 May speech. The evidence is uncontroverted that Blankenship learned at the 7 April meeting that Walter Hake's arbitrary and capricious handling of personnel matters was a principle source of employee discontent, that Blankenship advised Randall Hake to replace his father in order to improve the Company's chances of winning the pending election, and that Randall Hake, acting on Blankenship's advice, informed the employees that he was replacing his father in handling personnel matters. By announcing and implementing this decision, Randall Hake granted the employees a change in their working conditions that they could reasonably perceive as a benefit or response to their expressed grievances or their reasons for seeking unionization, for the purpose of discouraging employee support for the Union. Hake made this clear in his 12 May speech. Diamond thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Eagle Material Handling, 224 NLRB 1529, 1533 (1976), enfd. 558 F.2d 160 (3d Cir. 1977) (employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by discharging an unpopular supervisor in response to employee complaints); Ann Lee Sportswear, 220 NLRB 982, 993 (1975), enfd. 543 F.2d 739, 742–743

(10th Cir. 1976) (employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by forcing the resignation of a supervisor concerning whom the employees had expressed dissatisfaction, for the calulated purpose of influencing the outcome of election); Watkins Furniture Co., 160 NLRB 188, 192 (1966) (employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by promising employees that it would ameliorate their grievances by lessening their contact with a sales manager). Compare: Grove Valve & Regulator Co., 262 NLRB 285, 299 (1982) (employer lawfully replaced its industrial relations manager because evidence fails to establish a relationship between employees' expressed grievances and his replacement).

As the General Counsel correctly states (Br. 5), the Board has never decided whether an attorney or labor relations consultant violates the Act by advising a client employer or labor organization to commit unfair labor practices. St. Francis Hospital, supra, 263 NLRB at 850.[15] However, analogous lines of case authority tend to indicate that they should be held responsible under the Act for the consequences of such advice. First, an employer violates the Act by instructing its supervisors to engage in unfair labor practice conduct, where the instructions were carried out or disclosed to the employees. Resistance Technology, 280 NLRB 1004 (1986).[16] In Walker's, 159 NLRB 1159, 1175, 1179 (1966), the Board held that the employer violated Section 8(a)(1) by suggesting to its buyers (nonsupervisory personnel who were generally looked on as part of management) that they question employees about attitude toward unionization. In the present case, Respondents were not part of Diamond's managerial hierarchy. Blankenship had only limited authority over Diamond's employees, e.g., to exercise such authority as was necessary to conduct the captive audience meetings. However, Respondents, having been retained by Diamond for the express purpose of acting as Diamond's "representative" in the representation proceeding, was the agent of Diamond at least for the purpose of advising Diamond about its course of action in that proceeding, and Diamond relied on that advice when it unlawfully announced and carried out its decision to replace Walter Hake as the person in charge of personnel matters. If an employer can be held accountable for its instructions or even suggestions to its supervisory personnel that result in the commission of unfair labor practices, then it would seem only proper that a professional counselor should be held responsible for its advice that has the same unlawful effect. As indicated, labor relations consultants and attorneys have been held responsible for their commission of unfair labor practices, whether the Board found that they acted as agents of an employer or as employers within the meaning of the Act in their own right. See Chalk Metal Co., supra; West Coast Casket Co., 192 NLRB 624 (1971), enfd. in pertinent part 469 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1972); Guild Industries Mfg. Corp., 133 NLRB 1719 (1961), 135 NLRB 971 (1962), enfd. as modified 321 F.2d 108 (5th Cir. 1963); St Mary's Infant Home, supra. Labor relations consultants are not immune from the proscriptions of the Act. Similarly, employers have been held responsible under the Act for the activities of other outside persons or groups, such as local civic or development organizations, as well as the outside persons or groups themselves, where employees may reasonably conclude that "the business leaders inveighing against the Union were serving in effect as organs of communication from management," even though the employer might not be liable under the "strict rules of agency." Cagle's Inc. v. NLRB, 588 F.2d 943, 947–948 (5th Cir. 1979), and cases cited therein.[17] Therefore, Respondents shared responsibility for Diamond's announcement and implementation of its decision to replace Walter Hake and Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by such actions.

The next question concerns Respondents' alleged responsibility for Randall Hake's captive audience speech of 12 May. As Blankenship acknowledged to Pierce, the speech was plainly unlawful. Hake made express and implied promises of benefit and redress of grievances in order to discourage employee support for the Union. However, he did so on his own initiative, without consulting Respondents. James Pierce prepared a text for Hake which did not contain any unlawful statements, but Hake simply used the text as a starting point, and went on to make his own remarks. Hake did not ask Blankenship to review his proposed speech. Hake did ask Blankenship to stop him if he said anything "blatantly illegal." However, I do not believe that a labor relations consultant or an attorney can be held responsible for unfair labor practices by failing to demand that his client submit all campaign speeches and literature to him for prior approval, or by failing to publicly embarrass or humiliate his client by informing his employees that their employer has violated the law. St. Francis Hospital, supra, 263 NLRB at 849, plainly stands for the principle that a consultant, by undertaking to advise an employer in that capacity, does not thereby assume responsibility for unfair labor practices committed by the employer or its supervisors without or against the advice of the consultant. Analogous law in the field of malpractice also indicates that a consultant or attorney should not be held responsible in these circumstances. Compare: M & S Building Supplies v. Keiler, 738 F.2d 467 (D.C. Cir. 1984), in which the court held, in sum, that an attorney who improperly advised his client to set up an alter ego operation in order to avoid coverage of the employer's warehousemen under a multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement, was not liable for the employer's losses as the [15] Blankenship's brief (p. 21) contains a misleading quotation from St. Francis Hospital, which, taken out of context, falsely suggests that the Board held that a labor relations consultant cannot be held responsible for advising a client to violate the Act. Blankenship failed to quote the prefatory and key sentence, namely: "There is no evidence that [the consultant] advised its client to violate the Act." The Board went on to hold that "in these circumstances," the consultant should not be held responsible for unfair labor practices committed by the employer's supervisory personnel, over whom it had no control.

[16] Resistance Technology overruled Cannon Electric Co., 131 NLRB 1465, 1468 (1965), insofar as Cannon held that the instructions would be unlawful even if not carried out or disclosed to the employees. However, Resistance made clear that the instructions would be unlawful if either condition were present.

[17] Blankenship asserts (Br. 19) that the Act imposes a "clear state mandate to apply the ordinary law of agency to the question of employer and union responsibility." The assertion is erroneous. See Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

result of a subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding, where the losses were actually caused by the employer's unilateral decision to use the alter ego operation as a means of avoiding contract coverage for its truckdriver employees. Even if Blankenship had stood up and publicly stated that Hake was unlawfully making promises to the employees, such action would not have neutralized Hake's unlawful speech. See Faribo Turkeys, 140 NLRB 1397 (1963). Therefore, I find that Respondents did not unlawfully counsel Diamond regarding the 12 May speech.

The remaining allegations of the complaint (par. 10(g) through (j)) concern Diamond's course of conduct in forming and dealing with the employee committee, and Respondents' alleged role in counseling such conduct. Respondents' actions in this regard fall between the outright and unequivocal advice given that Randall Hake replace his father, and the alleged acquiescence by silence in connection with Hake's 12 May speech. As found, after Blankenship first met with the employees, he met with Hake and advised that Diamond update its work rules. At Hake's request, Blankenship put his recommendations in letter form. Blankenship also gave Hake a sample "contract." However, Hake understood that unlike Blankenship's recommendation that he replace his father, these changes would not be negotiated or implemented until the representation question was resolved. Blankenship stated in his 17 April letter that Hake should consider adopting the proposed "contract . . . after we rid you of the union problems." Pierce told Hake not to use the sample policies until there was a decision on the election. Hake anticipated that the election would take place on 16 May, and that if the Union were defeated, this would allow sufficient time for him to meet with an employee committee and negotiate a new set of work rules that would cover wages and other conditions of employment prior to 1 July, Diamond's annual wage review date. When Hake learned that the election would be postponed because of the pending unfair labor practice charges, he telephoned Associates for advice, specifically asking whether Diamond could proceed with the plan to set up a committee to develop a new set of work rules. Blankenship, through Pierce, told Hake to go ahead and run the business as he saw fit. At this time, Blankenship was still Diamond's labor relations consultant. Hake could reasonably interpret Blankenship's statement as indicating that Diamond could lawfully proceed with the plan, which Blankenship had initially formulated and counseled. Hake acted on Blankenship's advice by implementing the plan. Blankenship may well have felt that as a result of Hake's speech, the damage was already done. However, even Hake told the employees that the plan would be implemented after the election. Not only did Blankenship fail to advise Hake that he was embarking on an unlawful course of conduct, but he affirmatively indicated that Hake could lawfully proceed with their plan. Therefore, I find that Respondents counseled Diamond's course of conduct beginning with the meeting on or about 14 May, and thereby became responsible with Diamond for that conduct. The employee committee was a labor organization within the meaning of the Act. By establishing, dominating, assisting, and supporting the employee committee, including dealing with the committee concerning wages and other terms and conditions of employment, Diamond violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act. Jet Spray Corp., 271 NLRB 127, 129 (1984); Texas Bus Lines, 277 NLRB 626 (1985); Hunter Douglas, Inc., 277 NLRB 1179 (1985), enfd. 804 F.2d 808 (3d Cir. 1986); see also NLRB v. Cabot Carbon Co., 360 U.S. 203, 211 (1959); Lawson Co. v. NLRB, 735 F.2d 471 (6th Cir. 1985). Therefore, by counseling such conduct, Respondents became responsible for such conduct, and consequently violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Associates and Diamond are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Blankenship is an agent of Associates, and Associates and Blankenship were at times material agents of Diamond within the meaning of Section 2(2) and (13) of the Act.

3. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, and employee committee was at times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

4. By counseling Diamond to announce and implement benefits and redress of grievances to its employees in order to discourage support for the Union, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By counseling Diamond to establish, dominate, assist, and support employee committee, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act.

6. Respondents have not engaged in any other unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents have committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act, I shall recommend that they be required to cease and desist therefrom and from like or related conduct, to post appropriate notices, and to furnish and give appropriate notices to Diamond. Because Diamond is not a named Respondent in this proceeding, I cannot require Diamond to post such notices. The General Counsel requests that I recommend a broad remedial order that would require Respondents to cease and desist from engaging in any manner in unlawful conduct as an agent of Diamond or any other employer. I am sympathetic to the General Counsel's request, but Board policy precludes such an order. See West Coast Casket Co., supra at fn. 1; Chalk Metal Co., supra, 197 NLRB at 1133. In Chalk Metal, the Board restated its policy in unequivocal language, namely, "that a broad remedial order is appropriate whenever a proclivity to violate the Act is established, either by the facts within a particular case, or by prior Board decisions against the respondent at bar based upon similar unlawful conduct in the past." (Emphasis added.) Here, as with respect to Selvin in West Coast Casket, there have been decisions in which Blankenship, acting as consultant for a respondent employer, has been found to have committed unfair labor practices, but neither Associates nor Blankenship was named as a party respondent in any of the cases. Therefore, Blankenship's prior record cannot be used as the basis for a broad order. The facts of the present case also cannot be used as the basis for a broad order. As indicated, I have found that Respondents violated the Act by counseling, but not directly engaging in, unfair labor practices. The Board has never held that an attorney or labor relations consultant violates the Act by counseling unfair labor practices. Therefore, as the violations here found present a novel question of law, it cannot be said that Respondents, by such conduct, demonstrated a proclivity to violate the Act. In the present case, Diamond terminated Respondents' services, subsequently recognized the Union, and it is highly unlikely that Diamond will ever again retain Respondents. In this context, a narrow order can serve little practical purpose except as a warning to Respondents. However, the precedents indicate that the Board prefers to move cautiously in this area. Because I am recommending a narrow order, there are no special circumstances that would warrant a visitatorial clause.

Seattle-First National Bank and Financial Institution Employees of America, Local 1182, chartered by United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO. Case 19–CA–11364

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On November 30, 1970, the Firstbank Independent Employees Association (Firstbank) was certified by the Board as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees of Seattle-First National Bank (SeaFirst and/or the Respondent) in the appropriate unit.[1] Firstbank later voted to affiliate with the Retail Clerks International Union, AFL–CIO (RCIU) and changed its name to Financial Institution Employees of America, Local 1182 chartered by the Retail Clerks International Union (FIEA). FIEA petitioned the Board to amend its certification to reflect this change. The Board granted the petition and amended the certification.[2] SeaFirst refused to bargain with FIEA, alleging that because nonunion members of the bargaining unit were not allowed to vote, the affiliation election did not meet minimal due process standards thus rendering the affiliation invalid. FIEA filed unfair labor practice charges and the Board found that SeaFirst had violated Section 8(a)(5) and ordered SeaFirst to bargain with the FIEA.[3]

SeaFirst then petitioned the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit for review, but before it issued a decision the Board, sua sponte, moved that the case be remanded. The motion was granted and on reconsideration the Board held that because nonmembers were not permitted to participate in the affiliation election the election was invalid. The Board dismissed the unfair labor practice charges and vacated the amended certification.[4]

Thereafter, FIEA moved the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit for review of the Board's Decision and Order. The Ninth Circuit held that requiring that nonunion employees be allowed to vote on affiliation questions was inconsistent with the Act.[5] The Board petitioned the Supreme Court for review. The Court affirmed the Ninth Circuit's decision, holding that minimum due process standards were present in the affiliation election, and that dissatisfaction with the decisions' union members make may be tested by a Board-conducted representation as, for example, if it is unclear whether the reorganized union retains majority support.[6] The Supreme Court remanded the case to the Ninth Circuit, which in turn remanded it to the Board. Thereafter, the parties submitted statements of position. During the pendency of this case at the Board, the Board issued its decision in Western Commercial Transport,[7] in which the Board reviewed the impact of the Supreme Court's decision in Financial Institution Employees on the continuity of representative aspect of affiliation. The Board granted the parties' subsequent request to submit additional statements of position in light of that decision. The parties then filed additional statements of position and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States filed an amicus brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record, the statements of position and amicus brief and has decided to vacate its decision and order in Seattle-First National Bank, 265 NLRB 426 (1982), and to amend the certification and name the Financial Institution Employees of America, Local 1182, chartered by the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO as the employee's exclusive bargaining representative.

The Board has traditionally required that two conditions be satisfied before granting a petition for amendment of certification based on an affiliation: the first is that the affiliation election itself satisfy minimum due process standards; the second requires substantial continuity between the pre- and post-affiliation bargaining representative.[8] A determination of whether an affiliation has so substantially altered a union's identity that a new representation election is required rests on an examination of the changes wrought by the affiliation.[9] In each case continuity is determined by a factual comparison between the pre- and post-affiliation representative. In Western Commercial, the Board found that the affiliation of a small (136 employee unit), independent union with an entity representing 8500 employees and affiliated with an international union, did not result in continuity of representative. Relying on changes such as the wholesale replacement of union officers, the removal of day-to-day contract administration from local hands, and the loss of control over the assessment and expenditure of dues, the Board determined that membership rights and organizational autonomy were so diminished as to alter the "fundamental character of the representing organization." Western Commercial, supra at 218. The Board thus concluded that these changes were "sufficiently dramatic" to raise a question concerning representation and render inappropriate an amendment of certification. In the instant case, the Respondent contends that the affiliation has similarly resulted in changes, with respect to officers, limitation on membership rights, increased power of the executive council, and interference with the authority of the membership to call strikes, negotiate contracts, and settle grievances, that are sufficiently dramatic to alter its very character and, therefore, to raise a question concerning representation.[10] We disagree.

The record indicates that before affiliation FIEA operated statewide and was governed by an executive council which formulated policy and controlled the union's relationship with the Respondent. Negotiation of new contracts, processing grievances and regulation of internal union affairs were all handled by committees appointed by the FIEA president. Economic sanctions on the unit level could be undertaken only after being approved by the executive council and ratified by the members of the affected unit. The FIEA constitution allowed for union expansion to include other labor organizations or employees of other banks, and for affiliations.

A close examination of Local 1182 after affiliation persuades us that there was sufficient continuity in the representative to warrant an amendment of certification and a finding that the Respondent is obligated to bargain with Local 1182. The Respondent contends that Local 1182 now has different officers and that this is an indication of dramatic change resulting from the affiliation. The record, however, shows that after the affiliation, Local 1182's officers, and their responsibilities, remained the same as those who served for FIEA. In the year since affiliation, there has been a natural turnover of individuals occupying these offices. There is no evidence, however, that replacement of officers was a condition of the affiliation or a result of any action taken by the International. Compare Western Commercial Transport, supra at 215.

The Respondent next contends that the FIEA constitution specifically limited membership in the union to the Respondent's employees, while no such restriction exists under th RCIU constitution. As examination of the provisions in question indicates that while article III of the FIEA constitution, entitled "Membership," does limit eligibility to employees of the respondent, that limitation is subject to change upon approval of the executive council, to allow the inclusion of members of other labor organizations. Additionally, article VIII, entitled "Affiliation," and article IX, entitled "Expansion," specifically allow for the inclusion of other labor organizations or employees of other banks upon approval of the executive council and ratification of whatever amendments to the constitution are required. We thus find that these provisions of the FIEA constitution are entirely consistent with the expanded membership eligibility available under the RCIU constitution of Local 1182 and are not indicative of lack of continuity.

The Respondent also contends that the differences in eligibility requirements to hold union office further distinguish the pre- and post-affiliation entity. Under the RCIU constitution, a member must be in good standing for 1 year before being eligible to hold office, while the FIEA constitution required that a member must be in good standing for only 1 month. We note that the FIEA constitution additionally required a member, once nominated for office, to maintain good standing up to the election. The constitution did not specify the maximum length of time between the notice of the election and the election itself. In light of this, a member may be required to remain in good standing for a substantially longer period than the provision prescribes, thereby diminishing the practical differences between the two provisions. We also find it significant that the RCIU provision concerns only the election of new officers, and does not require that the old officers must be replaced upon affiliation because they lack the requisite period of [10] The Respondent has made no further argument relating to procedural due process in the affiliation election, so that question is not before us. The Respondent argues, however, that the Supreme Court's opinion is to be read as inviting the Board to include, as part of a due process component of the continuity inquiry, a general examination of "the extent of [employee] opposition to the affiliation." We do not read the Supreme Court's opinion as inviting such an inquiry, which would be tantamount to the Board's conducting an informal poll concerning the affiliation among those to whom, the Court held, no opportunity to vote in the affiliation election need be extended. Of course, if we find, on the basis of objective factors, that the changes in a bargaining representative are sufficiently dramatic to alter its identity, we will find under Western Commercial, that a question concerning representation is raised and a Board election would be called for if the union were to continue to seek representative status. Also, a question may still be raised in the traditional manner, by a timely employee-filed decertification petition or by proof of objection considerations for good-faith doubt. The Respondent's proposal for directly investigating employee sentiment in virtually any affiliation case has no support either in the statute, Board precedent, or in the Supreme Court's opinion in this case.

union membership. Thus, as noted above, the officers the FIEA retain their positions upon affiliation with RCIU.

The Respondent further contends that under the RCIU constitution, the local's executive council can accept or reject an employer's final contract offer without membership approval, whereas under the FIEA constitution all contracts were subject to the ratification of the membership. The evidence shows that under the RCIU constitution the executive council does have authority to accept or reject an employer's final contract offer, but can do so only after the failure of the membership of the affected local to approve a strike or other economic action. We find that under these circumstances the membership does have the opportunity to voice its approval or disapproval of a final offer and the executive council cannot bypass the membership as alleged by the Respondent.

Finally, the Respondent alleges that the RCIU constitution severely restricts the local's ability to call strikes, negotiate binding collective-bargaining agreements, and effectively to resolve grievances. Upon our examination of the comparable sections of the respective constitutions, we find no merit to this contention. Under the FIEA constitution the local unit could employ economic sanctions, including engaging in strikes, but only after an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the executive council and ratification of the strike by 60 percent of the members of the affected unit. If the unit should strike without the approval of the executive council, the striking members of the unit would be subject to expulsion, suspension, or fines as a result of intentionally violating FIEA policy and rules. By comparison, under the RCIU constitution, strike action must be approved by the executive council and a two-thirds majority of the affected local's voting members. The strike must also have the approval of the International president. The RCIU constitution indicates that the president's approval ensures compliance with the constitution and exhaustion of all amicable means of adjustment prior to engaging in economic sanctions in an effort to protect membership interests. If a local engages in a strike without approval, however, the penalty is only the denial of strike benefits.[11] The International also cannot force a local to participate in a strike.

With respect to local control of contract negotiations, the record indicates that under the RCIU constitution the terms of proposed collective-bargaining contracts must be submitted to the International president for approval upon request (emphasis added) prior to membership action. Donald Hofer, International vice president and director of the northwest division of the RCIU, testified that this requirement is to prevent sweetheart contracts that result in injury to other locals, and to safeguard the standards and integrity of the contract. Further, Hofer stated that during his association with the International this section of the constitution had not been enforced and the local unions negotiated their own contracts. The International provides assistance to a local only upon the local's request.

Finally, regarding grievance handling, the record shows that under the FIEA constitution grievances were managed by a grievance committee appointed by the president. Under the RCIU constitution, Local 1182's grievances are dealt with by the same personnel who were designated by the FIEA constitution to handle grievances. The International has assigned an advisory representative to assist the Local in these dispute resolution sessions.

Applying the test set forth by the Supreme Court in Financial Institution, as applied by the Board in Western Commercial, we find that the post-affiliation union meets the test of continuity. As set forth above, autonomy essentially remains at the local level, including day-to-day contract administration, handling of grievances, control of collective bargaining, and the calling of strikes. While some differences exist between the FIEA and the RCIU, these are not "sufficiently dramatic" to alter the identity of the bargaining representative and raise a question concerning representation. Accordingly, we find that by failing and refusing to recognize and bargain refusing to recognize and bargain with the RCIU the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[12]

[11] The Respondent contends, citing Hansen v. Guyette, 814 F.2d 547 (8th Cir. 1987), that the International could impose a trusteeship on a local because it fails to obtain authorization to strike. As we acknowledge that the International's constitution confers broad and pervasive powers, the evidence here discloses that the exercise of such authority is reserved for only the most compelling situations, to wit: the Hansen case. In that extraordinary case, a local union engaged in a protracted and violent strike, which commanded national attention—in every sense an atypical series of events. In our view, the fact that an international may exercise this potential authority does not defeat the conclusion that in most situations decisions to strike remain at the local level.

[12] The Respondent contends that after affiliation Local 1182 possesses greater economic power than FIEA, thereby creating a different bargaining entity. We find this contention is without merit. See Insulfab Plastics, above at fn. 8 and Hammond, above.

The Respondent contends that differences in the handling of union finances, the amendment process, membership meetings, and physical facilities manifest a lack of continuity. Little record evidence exists regarding these matters. For example, no membership meetings had been held by the time of the hearing and no amendments had been proposed. The alleged changes in the physical facility involved the relocation of the

More relevant to our determination in this case is testimony that indicates in the previous 5 years trusteeship had been imposed on only 5 of approximately 215 locals, all as a result of financial irregularities. Of these five, one local requested the trusteeship in an effort to end chaos caused by factions within the local.

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On August 30, 1985, Administrative Law Judge David S. Davidson issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Parties filed exceptions and supporting briefs; counsel for Respondents Stack Electric, Inc., Bakken Electric, Inc., and Fowser Electric Co. filed exceptions and a supporting brief; Respondent North Town Electric, Inc. filed exceptions; Respondents Stack Electric, Inc., Bakken Electric, Inc., and Fowser Electric Co. filed a brief in response to the opposing parties' exceptions, and the National Electric Contractors Association and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL–CIO jointly filed a brief amicus curiae.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

Preliminarily, we note that the General Counsel did not allege, and does not contend, that any of the four Respondents in this consolidated proceeding individually meets the Board's standards for assertion of jurisdiction.

In addressing this threshold issue, the judge concluded that "for jurisdictional purposes the combined businesses of employers bargaining through associations may be considered if their employees comprise a multiemployer unit." However, as the judge also correctly noted, in order for employees of an individual employer to become merged into a multiemployer unit, there first must have been some indication that the employees in the single unit had given their assent to becoming part of the multiemployer unit. As the judge explained, such employee assent could be given by a union if the union had previously obtained majority support in that single unit. He further found, as a factual matter, that only in the case of Respondents North Town and Bakken was there evidence of employee assent to becoming part of the multiemployer unit. Specifically, the judge concluded that North Town's predecessor, Helms Electric, and subsequently North Town, had hired an employee for whom it made payroll reports, fund contributions, and dues contributions to Local 292; that for that period, North Town (and Helms before that) had a stable and permanent complement of that one employee and, after that employee left, a permanent and stable complement consisting of one employee who was a member of Local 110. Thus, the judge concluded that North Town's employees were merged into the multiemployer units under contract between the NECA Chapters and Locals 292 and 110. As to Respondent Bakken, the judge found that Bakken utilized the Local 292 hiring hall through 1980; and that Bakken's employees were therefore merged into a multiemployer unit and, because of that, the question of the Union's majority among Bakken's own employees was no longer material.

In considering jurisdiction over Respondent Fowser, the judge concluded that the full-time employee hired by Fowser was neither hired through the referral system nor a union member. Similarly there was no evidence that any of the four employees (employed essentially one at a time) of Stack were either members of the Unions or had authorized either of the Charging Party Unions to represent them. Accordingly, the judge concluded that neither Fowser's nor Stack's employees were merged into the multiemployer unit. He further found that there was no evidence that either Fowser's or Stack's operations by themselves met the Board's jurisdictional standards, and he therefore ordered that the complaints against Stack and Fowser be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

All parties have excepted to different portions of the judge's decision. Thus, the General Counsel, the Charging Parties, and the amici assert that the judge erred in finding no jurisdiction over Respondents Fowser and Stack. Specifically, these parties contend that signing the Letter of Assent immediately merged all the Respondents into a multiemployer unit, and that this result obtains irrespective of the wishes of the Employer's employees or indeed irrespective of whether the Employer has (or had) any employees. Counsel for Respondents, on the other hand, contends that the judge erred in asserting jurisdiction over any of the Respondents. Thus, Respondents contend that the 8(f) agreements entered into by the Respondents and the Unions were subject to repudiation at any time. Respondents further assert that the complaints here should in any event be dismissed because all the Respondents employed one-person units, for which it is inappropriate to order bargaining, and contend that the decision to dismiss with respect to Respondents Fowser and Stack should also be grounded on these additional arguments.

We have decided to affirm the judge's result in part and reverse in part, but only for the reasons set forth below.

After the judge's decision, the Board held oral argument on several issues involving Section 8(f). Thereafter, the Board decided in John Deklewa & Sons,[1] to abandon the conversion and merger doctrines relied on by the judge, as they were applied to collective-bargaining agreements/relationships permitted under Section 8(f) of the Act.[2] In so doing, the Board held that, in light of the legislative history of Section 8(f) and the prevailing practice in the construction industry, the party to an 8(f) relationship who asserts the existence of a collective-bargaining relationship under Section 9(a) has the burden of proving the existence of such a relationship, through either (1) a Board-conducted representation election or (2) a union's express demand for, and an employer's grant of, recognition, based on a clear showing of support for the union among a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit. However, we also held in Deklewa that a union signatory to an agreement permitted by Section 8(f) acquires limited status as a representative under Section 9(a), to the extent that the 8(f) agreement may not be unilaterally repudiated during its term, and may be enforced during its term under the provisions of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3).

We further held in Deklewa that in determining appropriate units for election purposes, the Board will no longer distinguish between "permanent and stable" and "project by project" work forces, and single employer units will normally be appropriate. The merger doctrine was rejected in 8(f) cases because it can operate to bind a single employer and employees to full 9(a) status without providing employees the opportunity to express a representational preference, as Section 8(f) eliminates majority status as a prerequisite for signing a contract. We clearly stated, however, that we did not imply that multiemployer associations and bargaining could no longer be deemed appropriate in the construction industry. Thus, for the reasons set out in greater detail in Deklewa, the Board decided to apply the following principles in construction industry 8(f) cases:

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

Accordingly, we turn to consideration of the facts in this case in light of the reasoning and principles in Deklewa.

I. JURISDICTION

There is no question that all the Respondents here are "engaged primarily in the building and construction industry" within the meaning of Section 8(f) of the Act. The complaints do not allege, and the General Counsel specifically disclaimed, any intent to claim that any of the Respondents individually meet the Board's standards for assertion of jurisdiction. As noted above, the judge found that through application of conversion and merger doctrines, two of the Respondents became members of the multiemployer unit and, as part of that unit, were therefore subject to Board jurisdiction. Although the Board abandoned the merger and conversion theories in Deklewa, we nevertheless conclude that the Board has jurisdiction here; not only over Respondents North Town and Bakken, but over Respondents Stack and Fowser as well.

All four of the Respondent Companies signed the Letter of Assent A proffered by the Unions here. We conclude that the delegation of bargaining authority contained in those Letters of Assent is sufficient to warrant the assertion of jurisdiction because it indicates the individual Respondent's intent to be bound by group action, rather than individual bargaining. This is so irrespective of the facts that (1) none of the Respondents was a member of the Association, and (2) that we find under Deklewa, as set forth below, that the appropriate units consist of each individual Respondent's employees. By throwing in their lot with the multiemployer association, at least for purposes of negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondents joined forces with a group in an activity that has an indisputable impact on commerce so far as the Act we administer is concerned.

[2] Under the conversion doctrine, a collective-bargaining relationship/agreement permitted under Sec. 8(f) could "convert" into one cognizable under Sec. 9(a) simply on the basis of a showing that, during a relevant period, the union enjoyed the support of a majority of the employer's employees in an appropriate unit. Under the merger doctrine, the employer and the union could "merge" employees into a multiemployer unit.

II. THE APPROPRIATE UNITS

As noted above, the Board has abandoned the conversion/merger doctrines relied on by the judge. Here, there were no Board elections or demands for, and voluntary grants of, recognition to the Unions premised on a showing of support for a union among a majority of any Respondent's employees. Rather, the record is clear that the Respondents and the Unions voluntarily entered into their respective 8(f) agreements (i.e., the Letters of Assent A proffered by the Unions) without regard to whether that Union had the support of a majority of the employees, or indeed without regard to whether there were any employees at the time. Accordingly, we conclude that there has been no showing that the agreements between the Respondents and the Unions are anything other than relationships governed by Section 8(f), and that the appropriate units remained those of the individual Respondent's employees.[3]

III. THE BARGAINING OBLIGATIONS

Under the first principle of Deklewa, these collective-bargaining agreements, although governed by Section 8(f), would nevertheless usually be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3), under the "strictly limited" 9(a) status which the Union enjoys during the term of that agreement. There is an exception to that general rule, however, which we find applicable to all four of the Respondents in this consolidated proceeding. In D & B Masonry, 275 NLRB 1403 (1985), the Board adopted the judge's discussion of this issue at 1408.

> It is settled that if an employer employs one or fewer unit employees on a permanent basis that the employer, without violating Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, may withdraw recognition from a union, repudiate its contract with the union, or unilaterally change employees' terms and conditions of employment without affording a union an opportunity to bargain. SAC Construction Co., 235 NLRB 1211, 1230 (1978); Sunray Limited, 258 NLRB 517, 518 (1981); Chemetrons Corp., 268 NLRB 335 (1983). The basis for permitting an employer to engage in this conduct was explained by the Board in Foreign Car Center, 129 NLRB 319, 320 (1960), as follows:
> > The Board has held that it will not certify a one-man unit because the principles of collective bargaining presuppose that there is more than one eligible person who desires to bargain. The Act therefore does not empower the Board to certify a one-man unit. By parity of reasoning, the Act precludes the Board from directing an employer to bargain with respect to such a unit. While we have held that the Act does not preclude bargaining with a union on behalf of a single employee, if an employer is willing, we have never held that an employer's refusal to bargain with a representative on behalf of a one-man unit is a refusal to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5).

In D & B Masonry, the judge found the evidence too "skimpy" to establish that the employees who were employed by the respondent there on an intermittent basis (in addition to the one permanent full-time employee) constituted a permanent and stable work force such as to require the respondent to bargain. An examination of the pattern of employment of those employees by the respondent there showed that during a period of some 19-1/2 months, there was only one regular full-time employee, although for 13 of those months the respondent at various times had also employed one of four other bricklayers.

In this proceeding, the parties stipulated that Respondent Stack employed only the following individuals, besides Stack himself, and only for the periods set forth below:

> D. Heuring: 6 to 7 weeks from July through December 1981, 13 weeks between April and July 9, 1982, and 1 week in October 1982.
> J. Arnold: 13 weeks between July 17 and December 1982.
> J. Doherty: 2 weeks in February-March 1983, and 1 week in January 1984.
> P. Trunk: 7 weeks in November-December 1983, and 14 weeks between January and May 1984.

As to Respondent North Town, it was stipulated that the only individuals employed in addition to Owner Roger Joyce were as follows:

[3] To the extent that our holding with respect to the appropriate unit in Vincent Electric Co., 281 NLRB 903 (1986), and other similar cases, is inconsistent with our decision here, they are overruled.

D. Herlofsky: between January 1981 and July 1982.

S. Eyler: June through August of 1982 (though only at the same time as Herlofsky for 2 weeks in June).

G. Stimson: from late August 1982 through April 1983.

S. Eyler in January through March 10, 1984.

As to Respondent Fowser, the stipulation shows the following employees during the periods stated:

M. Berg: April 13 to June 12, 1980.

R. Engelhart: June 13, 1980, through December 1983. (Fowser's sons also performed odd jobs in the summer of 1983.)

The judge noted that Respondent Bakken employed one individual in 1979, and continued to do so thereafter (albeit with some turnover as to the individual employed). Payroll records in evidence show a single employee (albeit different individuals) working part time in different quarters, and Bakken testified without contradiction that the sole individual he employed averaged less than full time.

We deem the holding in D & B Masonry, supra, dispositive. Indeed, applying the rationale of that case to the facts here, we find these situations present an even stronger case as to each of the Respondents, and that the reasoning of D & B compels the conclusion that at all material times, each of the four appropriate units consisted of no more than a single employee. Hence, none of the Respondents in this proceeding was under a statutory obligation to bargain. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the complaints in their entirety.

ORDER

The complaints are dismissed in their entirety.

Florence I. Brammer, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Douglas Seaton, Esq. (Ponham, Haik, Schnobrich, Kaufman and Doty, Ltd.), of Minneapolis, Minnesota, for the Respondents.
Stephen D. Gordon, Esq. (Robins, Zelle, Larson and Kaplan, Ltd.), of St. Paul, Minnesota, for the Charging Parties.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID S. DAVIDSON, Administrative Law Judge. In these consolidated cases, the charges were filed on 25 January 1984, the complaints issued on 9 March 1984, and the amended complaints issued on 13 April 1984. The amended complaints allege violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in that Stack Electric, Fowser Electric, and Bakken Electric each on 29 July 1983, and North Town Electric on 3 October 1983, unilaterally repudiated collective-bargaining agreements with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 292 and in that Stack on 29 July 1983 and on 23 November 1983, and North Town on 3 October 1983 and on 23 November 1983 unilaterally repudiated collective-bargaining agreements with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 110. Respondents deny the commission of any unfair labor practices.

A hearing in these cases was held before me in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on 29, 30, and 31 May 1984.[1] Briefs have been received from the General Counsel and the Respondents.

The principal issues in this case are whether, by signing Letters of Assent authorizing multiemployer associations to act as their collective-bargaining representatives, Respondents became obligated to adhere to successive collective-bargaining agreements negotiated between the Associations and the Unions and, if so, whether Respondents later unlawfully repudiated those agreements. Respondents challenge the Board's assertion of jurisdiction over them and raise a number of affirmative defenses.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENTS

Stack Electric, Inc. is a Minnesota corporation conducting business from the Brooklyn Park, Minnesota residence of Patrick and Colleen Stack. North Town Electric, Inc. is a Minnesota corporation conducting business from the New Brighton, Minnesota residence of Roger and Margaret Joyce. Fowser Electric Co. is a sole proprietorship conducting business from the Long Lake, Minnesota residence of its owner Daniel Fowser. Bakken Electric, Inc. is a Minnesota corporation conducting business from the Plymouth, Minnesota residence of Alan and Sheila Bakken. All four named Respondents are engaged as electrical contractors in the building and construction industry.

Colleen Stack, sole owner and president of Stack Electric, on or about 10 October 1980, and on or about 16 April 1982, authorized, respectively, the Minneapolis Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association (M-NECA) and the St. Paul Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association (S-NECA), to act as the collective-bargaining representatives of Stack Electric,[2] to bargain with IBEW Locals 292 and 110, respectively.

[1] On 21 June 1984, the parties jointly moved that the hearing record be reopened for the purpose of entering Jt. Exh. 80, a stipulation concerning information compiled from materials subpoenaed by the General Counsel but not provided prior to the hearing's close. The motion was granted and the exhibit was received. Respondents' separate motion to reopen the record was denied.

[2] Stack Electric was a sole proprietorship at the time Colleen Stack, owner, signed the Letter of Assent with Local 292. On 12 April 1983, she notified Local 292 of the incorporation of Stack Electric to update the Local's records.

Margaret Joyce, sole owner and president of North Town, on or about 11 March 1981 and on or about 18 March 1981, authorized M-NECA and S-NECA, respectively, to act as the collective-bargaining representatives of North Town to bargain with Locals 292 and 110, respectively.[3]

Daniel Fowser, on or about 25 March 1979, authorized M-NECA to act as the collective-bargaining representative of Fowser Electric with Local 292.

Alan Bakken, on or about 11 April 1979, authorized M-NECA to act as the collective-bargaining representative of Bakken Electric with Local 292.

M-NECA and S-NECA exist, in part, for the purpose of representing, in the negotiation and administration of collective-bargaining agreements with the respective Unions, those employers who have signed Letters of Assent that so authorize the NECA Chapters.

During the calendar year ending 31 December 1983, collectively Respondents and the employer-members of each of the aforementioned NECA Chapters in the course of their business operations purchased and received at their facilities located within the State of Minnesota products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Minnesota.

Respondents contend that as each only employs one employee, they are not employers within the meaning of the Act. They contend further that jurisdiction cannot be asserted based on their relations with multiemployer associations because they were not members of the associations and never became part of the multiemployer units.

The evidence shows that each Respondent, at all times material, employed at least one and at times more than one employee. It is true that "the Board will not require an employer to bargain in a unit consisting of only one employee." Stern Made Dress Co., 218 NLRB 372 (1975). But an employer of 1 is no less an employer within the meaning of the Act than an employer of 100.[4]

With respect to the second contention, for jurisdictional purposes the combined businesses of employers bargaining through associations may be considered if their employees comprise a multiemployer unit. Nelson Electric, 241 NLRB 545, 546–547 (1979); Wayne Electric, 226 NLRB 409 (1976). Lack of formal membership in the NECA Chapters is immaterial; the important factor is delegation of bargaining authority to the Associations to represent Respondents in collective bargaining coupled with the indication of an "intention to be bound in collective bargaining by group rather than by individual action." Kroger Co., 148 NLRB 569, 573 (1964). However, for employees to become merged into a multiemployer unit there must also be some indication of the employees' assent to becoming part of the multiemployer unit. As set forth more fully below, I find that by signing Letters of Assent that authorized the Associations to represent Respondents in future collective bargaining, Respondents indicated their intent to be bound in collective bargaining by group rather than individual action, but that only in the case of North Town and Bakken is there evidence of employee assent to becoming a part of the multiemployer unit.

Thus, I find that Respondents North Town and Bakken have been at all times material employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction as to them. I find further that in the absence of evidence establishing that Stack Electric or Fowser Electric individually meets the Board's jurisdictional standards, jurisdiction may not be asserted over them.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

1. Background

Each of the Respondents in this case was established by an electrician who had worked in the trade as a member of Local 292 for a number of years. Following their decisions to operate their own businesses, these individuals or their wives signed Letters of Assent "A" with the respective Unions. Respondents later repudiated the Letters of Assent and argued that they were not covered by the then-current collective-bargaining agreements between the Unions and NECA Chapters. The facts as to each of the Respondents vary in detail and are set forth below.

2. The Letters of Assent

Both Unions use the same standard form by which an employer authorizes the applicable NECA Chapter to act as its collective-bargaining representative with the Union. That form reads as follows:

Letter of Assent-A

> In signing this letter of assent, the undersigned firm does hereby authorize _____ as its collective bargaining representative for all matters contained in or pertaining to the current approved _____ labor agreement between the _____ and Local Union _____ IBEW. This authorization, in compliance with the current approved labor agreement, shall become effective on the _____ day of ___, ____. It shall remain effective until terminated by the undersigned employer giving written notice to the _____ and to the Local Union at least one hundred fifty (150) days prior to the then current anniversary date of the aforementioned approved labor agreement.

These letters have been used by the Unions for over 20 years. M-NECA represents over 125 employers signatory to such letters; S-NECA represents over 100 em-

[3] As owner of Helms Electric, the predecessor of North Town, Margaret Joyce previously had signed a Letter of Assent for Local 292.

[4] Respondents also contend that they do not meet the definition of employer in the collective-bargaining agreements between the Associations and the Unions. The facts do not support this contention.

ployer-signatories. Representatives from both NECA Chapters and from both Unions testified that throughout their long bargaining history employer-signatories of the letters routinely treat them as authorizing the NECA Chapters to bargain for them through successive collective-bargaining agreements for the indefinite future, until the employer-signatories timely withdraw their consent pursuant to the terms of the letters. New letters are not solicited or received at contract expiration time; some have been in effect for as long as 20 years.

3. The collective-bargaining agreements

During the periods at issue here, M-NECA and Local 292 had successive collective-bargaining agreements in effect for the following dates:

1 June 1976	31 May 1978
1 June 1978	31 March 1980
1 April 1980	30 April 1982
1 May 1982	30 April 1984

Article I, section 1.01 of the 1982–1984 agreement provides for the year-to-year continuation of the agreement unless it is specifically terminated or modified through procedures established in the agreement.

S-NECA and Local 110 had a collective-bargaining agreement effective from 1 May 1982 to 27 April 1984. On 7 October 1983, the parties extended it to 30 April 1986, as a result of bargaining that began no earlier than 9 August 1983 and ended on 21 September 1983. The extension was negotiated pursuant to article I, section 3 of the 1982–1984 agreement, which subjects the agreement to "change or supplement at any time by mutal consent of the parties."

4. Stack Electric

Before going into business, Patrick Stack went to see Owen Schleisman, business representative of Local 292, to find out what he had to do to go in business because he wanted to get commercial jobs. Stack also wanted to continue to make payments to union fringe benefit funds in order to get hospitalization coverage. Schleisman advised him that he could not sign a Letter of Assent but that his wife could. Schleisman gave him a copy to take home to his wife to sign.[5] Stack took the letter home and, on 10 October 1980, his wife Colleen Stack signed the Letter of Assent, effective 2 October 1980, authorizing M-NECA to act as Respondent's representative in collective bargaining with Local 292. Colleen Stack was sole owner of Stack Electric and continued as sole owner after it was incorporated on 2 December 1980.

In April 1982, Local 110 Business Representative Kelly approached Stack while working on a job in Local 110's jurisdiction and asked if he had signed a Letter of Assent with Local 110. When Stack said that he had not, Kelly told him he had better have one signed.

On 16 April 1982, C. Stack signed the Letter of Assent, effective that date, similarly authorizing S-NECA to act as Respondent's representative in bargaining with Local 110.

On 12 April 1983, C. Stack sent a letter to Local 292 to update its records by informing it that Stack Electric, previously a sole proprietorship, had incorporated as of 2 December 1980.

During Stack's initial visit to the Local 292 hall before his wife signed the Letter of Assent, Local 292 referred Stack to Stack Electric for employment. Stack runs the business with his wife and since the business became incorporated has been its vice president. Since the latter part of 1981 Stack Electric has employed one additional employee for substantial periods of time and perhaps two for short periods of time.

On 29 July 1983, Stack Electric's attorney notified M-NECA and the business managers of Locals 110 and 292 that Stack was withdrawing its bargaining authorization from NECA and that Stack did not consider itself bound to any agreements in effect after 30 April 1982. On 20 September 1983, the attorney for both Unions responded by letter, indicating that, pending his review of the matter, Stack was still bound to both contracts, and on 3 October 1983 the Union's attorney by letter reiterated and amplified the Union's position that Stack was bound to both contracts.

5. North Town Electric

In June 1980, Roger Joyce contacted Local 292 Business Manager Schleisman to find out what he had to do to become a union contractor. Schleisman told him he would have to sign a Letter of Assent. On 2 October he and his wife Margaret went to Schleisman's office where Schleisman repeated what he had said earlier and Margaret signed a Letter of Assent as sole proprietor of Helms Electric. Roger had known that it was necessary for his wife to own the business in order for him to work with the tools of the trade and receive fringe benefits.

In February 1981, North Town was incorporated with Margaret Joyce as president and sole owner, and it became the successor to Helms. When Margaret notified Local 292 of the change, she was asked to sign a new Letter of Assent, and on 11 March 1981, she signed a Letter of Assent for North Town, effective that date, authorizing M-NECA to act as North Town's representative with Local 292. On 18 March 1981, M. Joyce signed a Letter of Assent, effective that date, similarly authorizing S-NECA to represent North Town with Local 110.

At the time of the Joyces' initial visit to the Local 292 hall, Roger Joyce came off withdrawal status, paid dues, and was referred to Helms as an employee. When North Town was incorporated, Roger became its vice president, and he and his wife have run the business together. In January 1981 North Town hired Don Herlofsky, who worked continuously until July 1982.[6] Later, North

[5] Apparently, the reason for putting the business in Colleen Stack's name was to avoid a contractual requirement for employment of a full-time journeyman in addition to a working employer and also to make it possible for Stack to receive fringe benefits.

[6] The record does not show whether Herlofsky was referred by Local 292 but a monthly payroll report shows that Local 292 dues were deducted from his pay.

Town hired Warren Stimson on referral from Local 110. Stimson worked continuously from late August 1982 to April 1983. Payroll reports indicate that Stimson was a member of Local 110. In addition, Steven Eyler worked June through August 1982, overlapping with Herlofsky for only 2 weeks, and again from January through mid-March 1984. From February 1981 through November 1982, North Town made payments into the Local 292 benefits fund and from August 1982 through April 1983, North Town made payments into the Local 110 benefits fund.

On 3 October 1983, North Town's attorney notified M-NECA and Locals 292 and 110 that North Town was withdrawing its bargaining authorization from NECA and that North Town did not consider itself bound to any agreements in effect after 30 April 1982. On 16 December 1983, the Unions notified North Town that they considered North Town still bound to the agreements.

6. Bakken Electric

In 1976 Alan Bakken went into business as a sole proprietor. He talked to Local 292 Business Manager Thomas to find out what he could do to freeze retirement benefits he had earned. Thomas told him he should sign a residential Letter of Assent and he did. In 1979 his wife called Local 292 to ask what she needed to do to get electricians referred for commercial work. The Union mailed her a Letter of Assent which Alan Bakken signed on 11 April 1979 to be effective that date, authorizing M-NECA to act as Bakken Electric's representative with Local 292 with respects to the inside commercial agreement. Bakken later incorporated his business in 1981 because he believed that if he was an employee he could still work under union rules.

Before Bakken signed the Letters of Assent he had one other employee besides himself. After that he hired three or four employees through the Local 292 hall, never employing more than one of them at a time. He paid them at the contract rate and made fringe benefit payments on their behalf to the Local 292 fund at least through 1980. Thereafter, Bakken hired directly without going through the Local 292 hall and did not make fringe benefit payments for his employees. Bakken stopped paying dues for himself in July 1982 and did not consider Bakken Electric to be a union shop after that.

On 29 July 1983, Bakken Electric notified M-NECA and Local 292 that it did not consider itself to be bound by any agreements in effect after 30 March 1980 and that it retracted its authorization of NECA to bargain on its behalf. On 20 September 1983, union counsel indicated that, pending further investigation, it considered Bakken bound to the existing agreement and on 3 October 1983, the Union rejected Bakken's purported withdrawal.

7. Fowser Electric Co.

Dan Fowser went into business as a sole proprietor in 1977. Previously he had contacted Local 292 Business Manager Thomas to ask what he had to do. He wanted to become a union contractor so that if he failed in business he could return to work as a union member. Thomas told him that he would have to sign a Letter of Assent to get commercial jobs and that he might as well sign the Letter for the residential contracts as well in case he wanted to do residential work in the future.

On 25 March 1977, he signed Letters of Assent, effective that date, authorizing M-NECA to act as Fowser Electric's bargaining representative with Local 292 for both the commercial and residential contracts. He understood that he would pay dues to Local 292 and be a working member. He went into business about a month later. In 1980 Fowser hired a full-time employee who worked from April 1980 to December 1983 and he employed one other employee temporarily from mid-April through mid-June 1980. Neither was hired through the referral system nor were they union members.

On 29 July 1983, Fowser notified M-NECA and Local 292 that he considered himself to be bound to no agreements in effect after the expiration of the 1976–1978 agreement and that he retracted NECA's authority to bargain for him. Ensuing correspondence between the Union and Fowser was identical to that between the Union and Bakken as described above.

Concluding Findings

1. Contentions

There is no question that each of the Respondents ultimately took the position that they were no longer bound by the association agreements and atempted to repudiate them. The General Counsel contends that the Letters of Assent continued to bind Respondents to successive renewals of the agreements in effect at the time the Letters were signed until such time as they gave timely notice of termination to the Associations and the Unions. With respect to Local 292, the General Counsel contends that the notices given by all Respondents were ineffective until 30 April 1984, the end of the M-NECA/292 agreement then in effect. With respect to Local 110 the General Counsel contends that the notices were defective because they were sent to M-NECA and not S-NECA. In addition, the General Counsel contends that North Town's notice was untimely with respect to the extension of the 1982–1984 S-NECA/110 agreement. Therefore, the General Counsel contends that the untimely or unperfected repudiations of the agreements during their terms violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Respondents contend that the letters did not authorize the Associations to represent them beyond the terms of the agreements in effect at the time they were signed, and that the attempts to withdraw were timely effective. In addition, they raise a number of affirmative defenses, including challenges to the Unions' majorities, the enforceability of the agreements as prehire agreements, alleged improper conduct by the Unions in obtaining Respondents' signatures on the Letters of Assent, alleged unfair representation of Respondents by the Associations, and alleged acquiescence by the Unions in Respondents' repudiation of the agreements.

2. The effectiveness of the Letters of Assent as authorization to the Associations to enter into further contracts

The Stacks, Joyces, Bakken, and Fowser all testified that they understood and intended that the Letters of Assent would bind them to only the collective-bargaining agreement in effect at the time they signed the letters. However, the reliability of this state-of-mind testimony is impunged by testimonial inconsistencies and by Respondents' actions.[7] Indeed, Respondents' actions show that they understood, as did the signers of similar letters with Locals 292 and 110, that the letters they signed invested the NECA Chapters with the Respondents' bargaining authorizations continuing into the future and were not conterminous with the collective-bargaining agreements then in effect.

The letters state that they remain effective "until terminated by the . . . employer . . . at least one hundred fifty (150) days prior to the then current anniversary date of the . . . [current] approved labor agreement." The term "current anniversary date" is uniformly understood to mean the expiration date of the current contract. The phrase "then current anniversary date" indicates, through use of the modifier "then," that changing anniversary dates were anticipated by those party to the Letters and contracts; changes in the anniversary dates, of course, can only come through renegotiated contracts.

Moreover, the employer signing the letter authorizes the NECA Chapter "as its collective bargaining representative for all matters contained in or pertaining to the current approved . . . labor agreements." Both agreements here contain clauses by which the agreements are automatically renewed unless renegotiated or specifically terminated by the parties. Thus, renegotiation of the contract itself is "contained in" the current contract, and the subjects of renegotiation are also matters contained in or pertaining to the contract.

The Board has previously considered the duration of virtually identical Letters of Assent and found that they extended representative authorization to an association beyond the expiration date of the contract in effect when they were signed. Nelson Electric, 241 NLRB 545 (1979), enfd. 638 F.2d 965 (6th Cir. 1981); Rayel Electric, 260 NLRB 1327 (1982). As noted in Nelson Electric, supra at 550, "it was the continuing authority to negotiate, which was granted to NECA and which has never been terminated, which is critical—not the adoption of the terms of a specific agreement."

Thus, based on the actions of the parties, the plain language of the Letters of Assent, and prior constructions of identical letters, I conclude that the Letters of Assent authorized the Associations to negotiate and bind Respondents to agreements subsequently negotiated between the Associations and the Unions until Respondents timely withdrew their bargaining authorizations. I reject Respondents' affirmative defense that the letters were effective only for the terms of the contracts in effect at the time they were signed.

3. Respondents' repudiation of the M-NECA/292 agreement

At the time Respondents repudiated the M-NECA/292 agreement (29 July for Bakken, Fowser, and Stack and 3 October for North Town) the current agreement still had a number of months to run until its 30 April 1984 expiration date. Although Respondents could prospectively withdraw M-NECA's authority to enter into any successor agreement with Local 292 on their behalf,[8] they could not in midterm repudiate the existing agreement for the remainder of its term without the approval of Local 292 and M-NECA, which was never given.[9] Accordingly, as I find below no merit to Respondents Bakken and North Town's affirmative defenses, I conclude that their repudiation of the M-NECA/292 agreements violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. Respondent North Town's repudiation of the S-NECA/110 agreement

On 3 October 1983, North Town's counsel wrote Richard Parenti, secretary-manager of M-NECA, to notify him that North Town did not believe it was bound by the collective-bargaining agreements with Locals 110 and 292 and to request "that it receive no further correspondence from N.E.C.A. or from Local 110 or 292 on the subject of these agreements or their administration." In that letter counsel also took the position that North Town had never executed "a delegation of collective bargaining rights in connection with the 1982-1984 agreements between N.E.C.A. and Locals 110 and 292." In conclusion, the letter stated that North Town Electric "hereby gives notice of its withdrawal from membership in and retraction of any previous authorization of N.E.C.A. to act on its behalf as collective bargaining representative, pursuant to Boro Burglar Alarm Co., 234 NLRB 58."

On 23 November 1983 counsel for North Town again wrote Parenti terminating its authorization of M-NECA to serve as North Town's collective-bargaining representative with respect to renegotiation of the current agreements between M-NECA and Locals 110 and 292. Counsel expressly disclaimed waiver of any position taken in the 3 October letter. Copies of both letters were sent to Locals 110 and 292 but not to S-NECA.

[7] Fowser testified that he was told by Local 292 business manager that if he signed both the residential and commercial letters he would never have to come back again in the future. Bakken testified that he considered himself a union contractor until he stopped paying dues in July 1982, well after expiration of the agreement in effect when he signed his second Letter of Assent. Bakken, North Town, and Stack Electric submitted payroll reports and participated in benefit plans available only by contract after expiration of the contracts in force when their Letters of Assent were signed. The payroll reports showed that all three paid the wage rates established by the succeeding contracts. One of the payroll reports submitted by North Town was in response to a delinquency notice relating to a period after expiration of the initial contract term. In addition, North Town and Bakken utilized union referral procedures after expiration of the initial contract term, and C. Stack notified Local 292 of the incorporation of Stack Electric to update its records a year after expiration of the contract in effect when its Letter of Assent was signed.

[9] Nelson Electric, supra.

Counsel for the General Counsel contends that neither letter was effective to terminate S-NECA's authority to represent North Town in bargaining with Local 110 because neither was sent to S-NECA. Counsel for the General Counsel also contends that the 3 October letter was ineffective because it did not comport with the specified method of terminating an assent letter's authority.

Insofar as the record shows, the first time S-NECA became aware of the letters was during January 1984 when the assistant manager of S-NECA received copies from its attorney. On 24 January 1984, North Town's counsel sent copies of the 3 October and 23 November letters to S-NECA for the first time.

Although counsel for the General Counsel appears to contend otherwise, the 3 October letter conveys unequivocally North Town's intent to terminate S-NECA's authority to bargain for it. Not only may that intent be inferred from the statements of position with respect to the present agreement and the authority of NECA, but the letter specifically retracts any previous authority of NECA to act as its bargaining representative.

There is no question that the attempt to withdraw bargaining authority from S-NECA was timely with respect to the 1982–1984 association agreement with Local 110. That agreement provided:

> Sec. 1.01 AGREEMENT DATES—This agreement shall take effect May 1, 1982, and shall remain in effect through April 27, 1984, unless otherwise specifically provided for herein. It shall continue in effect from year to year thereafter from May 1 through April 30 of each year, unless changed or terminated in the way later provided herein.

The agreement provides further that either party desiring to terminate or modify the agreement must notify the other at least 90 days before the anniversary date and that the agreement shall be subject to change or supplement at any time by mutual consent of the parties.

Before 1983, for the previous several contracts, negotiations for extensions or new agreements typically began in January or early February of the expiration year. However, in 1983 negotiations began in the spring when the Association on behalf of the contractors sought to defer a wage increase due under the 1982–1984 agreement. Those discussions were unsuccessful, but discussions started again in August which led to the extension agreement signed on 7 October and effective on that date. Agreement on terms was reached in late September, subject to ratification.

S-NECA mailed communications describing the negotiations and the agreement on terms in September, but it did not mail copies to all contractors who had signed Letters of Assent. Rather, it mailed them to all members of S-NECA and to those contractors who were currently employing individuals under the collective-bargaining agreement based on their submission of payroll reports to the fringe benefits funds. Insofar as it appears, North Town did not receive the communications from S-NECA. North Town was not a member of S-NECA, and it did not file payroll reports or use employees referred by S-NECA after April 1983.

In Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388, 395 (1958), the Board held:

> We would . . . refuse to permit the withdrawal of an employer or a union from a duly established multiemployer bargaining unit, except upon adequate written notice given prior to the date set by the contract for modification, or to the agreed-upon date to begin the multiemployer negotiations. Where actual bargaining negotiations based on the existing multiemployer unit have begun, we would not permit, except on mutual consent, an abandonment of the unit upon which each sides has committed itself . . . absent unusual circumstances.

Here actual bargaining negotiations to extend the 1982–1984 contract had begun and there was no mutual consent after the notice was given. However, the question remains whether the notice should be considered timely because of the terms of the Letter of Assent or the fact that negotiations began much earlier than customary and much earlier than the 90-day period mentioned in the contract. Acropolis Painting, 272 NLRB 150 (1984), offers guidance. There the Board found that an "unannounced premature commencement of actual negotiations could not foreclose the Respondents from withdrawing in accord with the agreed-upon procedure set forth in [the association agreement]."

In that case the agreement between the multiemployer association and the union provided that during January of the expiration year of the agreement any signatory party could withdraw from the agreement effective with its 1 July expiration date by giving written notice and that "said notice of withdrawal eliminates said party from participation in any negotiations regarding this Agreement." The agreement provided for automatic renewal in the absence of written notice of a desire to change or revise the agreement not less than 120 days before the termination date. The agreement in effect at the time the case arose ran from 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1983. Historically, the union and association had negotiated successor contracts in the spring of the year in which a contract was scheduled to terminate. In November 1982, however, the association and union agreed to early contract negotiations to grant employees covered by the contract economic relief from a 1 January 1983 pay raise called for by the 1980–1983 agreement, and in early December they reached agreement on a new contract to run from 1 January 1983 to 30 June 1987 which was ratified by the association membership on 14 December 1982 and by the union on 28 December 1982.

During the negotiations representatives of the association and the union were in disagreement over the rights of employer members to withdraw under the terms of the 1980–1983 agreement. Association representatives took the position that they could still withdraw during January 1983 while union representatives took the position that they could no longer withdraw once agreement was reached. When the respondents in the case sought to withdraw during January, the union wrote them that their letters were untimely, that the letters did not serve to remove them from the negotiations that took place before they tried to withdraw, and that they were bound by the terms of the 1983–1987 agreement. All four respondents had been members of the association and at least two were in good standing at the time they sought to withdraw.

The facts in the instant case are substantially identical in most respects. Here, the Letter of Assent between North Town and Local 110 provided by its terms that the authorization of the S-NECA as collective-bargaining representative of North Town would remain in effect until terminated by written notice at least 150 days before the termination date of the current agreement. That agreement provided for automatic renewal in the absence of 90 days' notice of intent to terminate or modify. Historically, the parties had started to negotiate early in the year in which the contract was scheduled to terminate. In 1983 negotiations started almost 6 months earlier than normal, and the agreement entered into on 7 October 1983, more than 6 months before the termination date of the 1982–1984 agreement, extended its term through 30 April 1986.

The facts in this case differ with respect to the association membership of North Town, notice of the negotiations, and the positions taken by the Association and Union with respect to withdrawal. North Town was never a member of S-NECA. As it was not currently employing anyone on whom it was making reports to Local 110, it received no notices from S-NECA and insofar as the record shows had no notice of the negotiations which led to the extension of the 1982–1984 agreement.[10] There is no evidence that here the Association and Union discussed at all the impact of the extension of rights of employers to withdraw from multiemployer bargaining.

I conclude that these factual differences do not warrant a different result here from that reached in Acropolis Painting, supra. As a nonmember of S-NECA with no notice of any kind of the 1983 negotiations, North Town had if anything greater right to rely on the terms of the Letter of Assent it had signed than the respondents in Acropolis who were members of the association and at least some of whom had been sent notice of the extension negotiations before the agreement was reached and ratified. Although the dispute between the association and the union in Acropolis over members' withdrawal rights may have led some members to rely on withdrawal provision of the association agreement, the association and members had identical interests as parties to the contract. Certainly, absent agreement by the Association with the Union's position as to withdrawal, not present in either case, the contractual rights of a member vis-a-vis the Union could not be abrogated. Here, no less than in Acropolis, the terms of the Letter of Assent that was signed by North Town and Local 110 may be viewed as mutual consent to withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining regardless of whether bargaining for a new agreement has commenced. Inasmuch as there is no evidence that North Town knew of the negotiations or of the terms of the extension or withdrew because of dissatisfaction with its terms, there is no need to decide whether failure to withdraw after receiving such notice might render withdrawal equivocal or otherwise warrant a different result under Retail Associates. Thus, I conclude that the facts in this case are if anything stronger for giving effect to a withdrawal from multiemployer bargaining given timely with respect to the expiration date of the 1982–1984 agreement.

The question remains whether North Town gave timely notice in compliance with the Letter of Assent. The date 28 November 1983 was 150 days before 27 April 1984 and was thus the last date for timely notice during the 1982–1984 agreement. North Town gave notice to M-NECA and Local 110 on 3 October, clearly in advance of that date. But S-NECA did not receive a copy of the letter and had no other notice until January, well after the 1 December date.

Under Retail Associates, supra, 120 NLRB at 393–394, although an untimely withdrawal requires consent of both the union and association, a timely withdrawal does not require mutual consent of the association and union but only that it be unequivocal, be made in good faith, and contemplate relatively permanent abandonment.

Here, where it appears that Respondent's attorney mistakenly assumed that the Minneapolis NECA office acted as a central office for the NECA Chapters in the area, the withdrawal letter is not deficient by any of the criteria prescribed by Retail Associates. The Union was timely notified of North Town's unequivocal "retraction of any previous authorization of N.E.C.A. to act on its behalf as collective bargaining representative." Even after receiving the copy of the 3 October letter, S-NECA made no response and apparently chose not to exercise its right—contained in the Letter of Assent—to timely notification. Moreover, North Town's failure to direct its notice properly to S-NECA had no impact on any policy served by the rules laid down in Retail Associates. Because negotiations took place and were completed by choice of the Association and Union before the time provided in the Letter of Assent for withdrawal and before the North Town letter was sent, North Town's letter could have no impact on the negotiations. Also, because North Town had communicated to Local 110 its determination to withdraw before it knew of the extension agreement its decision could not have been influenced by the negotiations or their outcome and could have no more destabilized the multiemployer bargaining relationship than if S-NECA had been sent the 3 October letter on that date. Accordingly, I find that North Town's withdrawal notice of 3 October 1983 was effectively given and that North Town was released from the S-NECA/110 1982–1984 contract on its original expiration date.

However, as in the case of the M-NECA agreement discussed above, although North Town could withdraw prospectively S-NECA's authority to enter into any successor agreement with Local 110 on its behalf, it could not repudiate the existing agreement for the remainder of its original term. Accordingly, as I find below no merit to North Town's affirmative defenses, I conclude that its repudiation of the S-NECA/110 agreement before 27 April 1984 violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. Respondents' defenses

a. The Unions' majority

Respondents contend that the Letters of Assent and the agreements with Locals 110 and 292 are void and unenforceable because they were prehire agreements which never matured into enforceable collective-bargaining agreements. Counsel for the General Counsel contends that the units defined in the agreements are association-wide units, that the employees of each Respondent do not constitute separate bargaining units, and that the desires of the employees of the individual employers are therefore irrelevant.

In a single employer setting applicable case law with respect to prehire agreements is clear. A union and employer in the building and construction industry may unlawfully enter into a prehire agreement but it creates no presumption of majority status. A relationship thus established may be converted into a 9(a) relatioship on a showing that the union has obtained majority status in a permanent and stable complement of employees, but in the absence of such a showing, the agreement remains voidable, NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 103, 434 U.S. 335 (1978).

In a multiemployer setting the status of contracts between additional employers joining the multiemployer group and the union representing the multiemployer unit is less clear. The Board has certified multiemployer units without inquiring into the number of employees employed by individual employer-members of the group. Central New Mexico Chapter, 152 NLRB 1604 (1965), Northern Nevada Chapter, 131 NLRB 550 (1961). But in those cases there was an established history of multiemployer bargaining, and the issue of the status of employers joining the group by signing prehire Letters of Assent does not appear to have been raised.[11]

In C.I.M. Mechanical Co., 275 NLRB 685 (1985), concurring Member Dennis squarely faced this issue, writing:

> An employer cannot bind its employees to representation in a multiemployer unit without the employees' express or implied consent. Mohawk Business Machines, 116 NLRB 248, 249 (1956). Typically, a union gives such consent, but to do so, the Union must be the employees' statutory bargaining representative. Otherwise, employees could become part of a preexisting multiemployer unit without in any way having expressed a desire to select the union as their collective-bargaining representative, and would be unable to challenge the union's status except in the multiemployer unit. If, however, a union attains majority status support among an employer's own employees, it will have gained the authority to give the employees' consent and to merge them into the multiemployer unit.

In that case the majority did not reach the issue because it found that the employer had not expressed a clear and unequivocal intent to engage in multiemployer bargaining. However, Member Dennis' analysis was also adopted in Baton Rouge Building Trades Council v. E. C. Schafer Construction Co., 657 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1981).

This analysis is consistent with longstanding authorities and principles, and I have found no authority to the contrary. Accordingly, I conclude that the analysis set forth in Member Dennis' concurrence should be followed in this case.

To determine whether the relationship between the Unions and Respondents in this case matured into 9(a) relationships, the facts as to each of the Respondents must be examined separately.

At the time C. Stack signed the Letter of Assent with Local 292, the only employee of Stack Electric was Patrick Stack, who ran the business with his wife and became vice president when it was incorporated. As husband of the owner and as a managerial employee, Patrick Stack would be excluded from any collective-bargaining unit and was not an employee within the meaning of the Act.[12] Thus, the Letter of Assent with Local 292 was signed and the collective-bargaining agreement entered into at a time when Stack Electric had no employees. As Stack Electric, like the other Respondents was an electrical contractor performing work in the building and construction industry the agreement between Stack and Local 292 was an 8(f) agreement at the time of its inception.

As set forth below, there is also no evidence that Local 110 represented any employees of Stack Electric when C. Stack signed the Letter of Assent with Local 110, so that the agreement between Stack Electric and Local 110 was also an 8(f) agreement.

Since the latter part of 1981, for substantial periods of time Stack employed four different persons, essentially one at a time, but there is no evidence that any of these employees were members of Local 110 or Local 292 or authorized either Union to represent them. There is no evidence that Stack obtained their services by referral from either Union, reported their earnings to either Union, or paid fringe benefits on their behalf. Thus, it has not been established that Local 110 or Local 292 ever attained majority status in a permanent and stable complement of employees. Therefore, both agreements remained subject to repudiation by Stack. Consequently, following the analysis set forth in Member Dennis' concurrence above, Stack Electric's employees did not become a part of the multiemployer unit, and in the absence of any evidence that Stack Electric's business operations taken by themselves meet the Board's jurisdictional standards, I shall recommend that the Board not assert [11] See also Nelson Electric, supra. Although the issue was not raised, it appears from the facts that the union had acquired a majority in a permanent and stable work force before the respondent tried to repudiate the agreement.

[12] Although Stack and Local 292 may have considered Patrick Stack a full-time journeyman electrician and not a working employer for purposes of contract enforcement, their agreement is not determinative of his status as an employee within the meaning of the Act.

jurisdiction over Stack Electric and that the complaints against it be dismissed.

North Town's predecessor, Helms Electric, had no employees when Margaret Joyce signed the Letter of Assent with Local 292. Like Patrick Stack, Roger Joyce was referred to North Town by Local 292, and he ran the business with his wife and later became its vice president when it was incorporated. Like Stack, he was not an employee within the meaning of the Act.

Within a month or two after the Letter of Assent was signed, Helms hired Don Herlofsky who worked for Helms from January 1981 until July 1982. The record does not show whether Herlofsky was referred by Local 292, but it does show that Helms and later North Town made payroll reports and contributions to the Local 292 fringe benefit funds and remitted union dues on Herlofsky's behalf. During the period of Herlofsky's employment, Helms and then North Town employed no other employees. I find that Helms and North Town had a stable and permanent complement consisting of Herlofsky, that Herlofsky had become a member of Local 292, and that Local 292 thus had a majority among Helms and North Town's employees. Thus, I conclude that the initial agreement between Helms and Local 292 became a 9(a) agreement and that the successor Letter of Assent executed after North Town was incorporated was likewise a 9(a) agreement.

After North Town signed the Letter of Assent with Local 110, the month after Herlofsky left, North Town hire Warren Stimson, a member of Local 110 on referral from Local 110. Stimson worked until April 1983 as North Town's only employee. Thus, at least by the time Stimson was hired, Local 110 represented a majority of a permanent and stable complement of North Town's employees. Accordingly, I find that under the principles set forth above, North Town's employees were merged into the multiemployer units under contract between the Associations and Locals 110 and 292. These contracts were thus not subject to repudiation by North Town as 8(f) agreements, and having become merged into the existing multiemployer units the question of whether either Union continued to represent a majority of North Town's employees was no longer material.

Bakken went into business in 1976. The Letter of Assent he signed at that time applied to the residential contract not at issue in this case. In 1979 Bakken signed the Letter of Assent applicable to the commercial agreement. Before signing the Letter of Assent, Bakken employed one employee in addition to himself and he continued to do so thereafter with some turnover of individuals. Bakken, as owner of his Company, is not an employee within the meaning of the Act. Although it is unclear when Bakken started to utilize the Local 292 hiring hall, he started to do so at some time after the first Letter of Assent was signed and continued to employ electricians referred by Local 292 through 1980. Thus, I find that at least after, if not before, the 1979 Letter of Assent was signed Respondent had a stable and permanent complement of employees that Local 292 represented. Accordingly, I find that Bakken's employees were merged into M-NECA unit under the contract between M-NECA and Local 292 that was not subject to repudiation by Bakken as an 8(f) agreement. Thereafter, the question of Local 292's majority among Bakken's employees was no longer material.

Finally, turning to Fowser, the evidence shows that Fowser signed Letters of Assent in 1977 when he went into business as a sole proprietor. Apart from himself, Fowser employed no one until 1980 when he hired a full-time employee and a temporary employee. Neither was hired through the Local 292 referral system and neither was a union member. Thus, there is no showing that Local 292 ever represented employees of Fowser. Accordingly, as in the case of Stack Electric, Fowser's employees did not become part of the multiemployer unit, and in the absence of any evidence the Fowser's business operations taken by themselves meet the Board's jurisdictional standards, I shall recommend that the Board not assert jurisdiction over Fowser and the complaint against Fowser be dismissed.

b. Alleged unfair labor practices, misrepresentation, fraud, coercion, and duress

Respondents contend that the Letters of Assent are tainted by unfair labor practices and related misconduct of the Unions at the time the Letters of Assent were signed and continuing thereafter. More specifically, Respondents contend that they were required to join and pay exactions to the Unions, that the Unions interfered with Respondents' choice of bargaining representatives, and that the Unions refused to bargain over any alternatives to signing the Letters of Assent as a basis for agreement between Respondents and the Unions.[13]

At the outset of the hearing counsel for the General Counsel moved to strike the affirmative defense based on the Unions' alleged unfair labor practices because it was barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. The motion was granted to the extent that the allegations of union unfair labor practices were based on conduct which occurred more than 6 months before the charges in this case were filed. Respondents' request that this ruling be reconsidered is denied. Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962, 964 (1970).

Although this ruling disposes of most of Respondents' contentions, they are in any event virtually without factual foundation.[14]

Despite Respondents' claims that the Unions forced Respondents to sign Letters of Assent, insisted that they do so, and refused to consider other alternatives or to bargain individually with Respondents, the facts show an entirely different picture. Respondents went to the Unions, not vice versa. They asked the union business representatives what to do in order to become union contractors. When the business representatives told them

[13] Although these contentions were made collectively by all Respondents, in view of the dismissal recommended above as to Stack and Fowser, the remaining contentions will be considered only insofar as they apply to North Town and Bakken. If it were necessary to reach these issues in relation to Stack and Fowser, however, generally the same conclusions would follow.

[14] Record citations in support of this contention and indeed throughout Respondents' brief are largely to unrelated evidence or evidence that requires highly subjective and colored interpertation to draw from it the assertions Respondents base on it.

to sign Letters of Assent, they did not ask if there were other alternatives nor did they ask to bargain separately. The business representatives did not demand any action or refuse any action. They answered the questions asked them by Joyce and Bakken, and Joyce and Bakken accepted those answers. As the Unions represented no employees of Joyce or Bakken at that time, they had no duty to bargain with Joyce or Bakken at all; bargaining between them was entirely consensual. The contention by Respondents that the Unions had special obligations to Joyce and Bakkens as union members to tell them of other alternatives is baseless. The Unions' duty to Joyce and Bakken was only to represent them fairly as employees. Union membership conferred no obligation on the Unions when it dealt with them as prospective employers.[15]

When Joyce and Bakken approached the Unions initially it was because they wanted something from the Unions. In Joyce's case he wanted to be a union contractor, to work, and to receive fringe benefits. In Bakken's case, he wanted to freeze his retirement benefits and to obtain commercial referrals. Only later did each decide that he no longer wanted to be bound by the agreements he had made. Although Respondents contend that the Unions engaged in a continuing violation of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by refusing to bargain individually with Respondents, the Unions' refusal to do so was hardly an unfair labor practice; rather it was a logical consequence of their position, supported by the complaint, that Respondents were bound by the existing association contracts.

Closely related are Respondents' contentions that the association agreements are void or unenforceable because of misrepresentation, fraud, duress, or coercion. They are rejected for the same reasons. Again most, if not all the allegations, if sustained, would constitute unfair labor practices that occurred more than 6 months before the charges in this case were filed. But more basic, the factual assertions are not supported by the evidence in the record. Respondents would have it that they were the objects of pressure from the Unions to sign the Letters and join the Unions "or else." They would have the Unions seen as aggressors who pressured Respondents, insisted that they sign the Letters and pay union dues, and deliberately concealed information from them. No fair reading of the record can lead to that conclusion.

c. Alleged unfair representation by M-NECA and S-NECA

Respondents contend that M-NECA and S-NECA unfairly represented them in contract administration and negotiations with the Unions and that the unfair representation constituted unusual circumstances that justified Respondents' withdrawal from the multiemployer bargaining units. They contend that the consequences of the unfair representation resulted in dire economic circumstances that also justified withdrawal from the multiemployer units. The gist of Respondents' contention is that the Associations favored large employers over small contractors by acquiescing in the Unions' insistence that each small employer be required to employ a full-time journeyman and pay full-time fringe benefits for him despite a past practice ignoring that requirement and by participating in the premature extension of the 1982–1984 S-NECA/110 agreement.

The evidence fails to establish any factual basis for their contentions. The Local 292 contract contains a requirement for employment of a full-time journeyman in addition to a working employer. The Local 110 agreement limits the amount of work which may be performed by an owner and describes a 40-hour normal workweek for employees. Both agreements contain exceptions in effect at all times material for periods of excessive unemployment. Both Unions permit individuals to put ownership in the names of their spouses to avoid restrictions on work by employers. There is no evidence that North Town was required to employ a full-time journeyman in addition to Joyce or that Bakken was required to employ a full-time electrician. The evidence as to grievances filed against them by the Unions show only that they protested the use of employees not hired through the union referral systems, not that they insisted on full-time employment for their employees. Moreover, the evidence shows that the small employers were represented in the membership and boards of both Associations, and there is no factual basis from which to conclude that their interests were subordinated to those of larger employers.

With respect to the extension of the S-NECA/110 agreement, Respondents assert that in reopening the 1982–1984 contract and reaching agreement to extend it for another 2 years fully 9 months before its expiration date and many months before the outset of renewal negotiations in any previous contract year, S-NECA engaged in conspiratorial negotiations to extend prematurely the 1982–1984 agreement, to prevent the defection of small employers, and to promote the interests of larger employers to the detriment of small employers like Respondents. This contention relates only to the complaint against North Town based on the Local 110 agreement.

There is, however, no evidence that these negotiations were conducted in secret, conspiratorially, or with intent to promote the interests of large employers over those of small employers. S-NECA communicated with contractors currently employing electricians under the Local 110 agreement during the course of the negotiations and reported to contractors the failure of an attempt earlier in the spring to negotiate agreement to adjust a wage increase due on 1 May 1983 to give relief to the contractors. Whether North Town specifically was notified of or was aware of the negotiations, it is clear that the negotiations were neither secret nor conspiratorial.

The outcome of the negotiations was to provide a 10-cent hourly increase in the employers' contributions for medical benefits, a 2-year wage freeze, and a reduction in apprentice wages for the first 2 years of apprenticeship.

[15] There is some irony in the contentions that the Unions should have protected Respondents from doing what they wanted to do and that they unlawfully exacted dues from Respondents when it was Respondents who came to the Unions to ask what they could do to become union employers while at the same time preserving for themselves the benefits of employees and, in Joyce's case, the right to be viewed as an employee. See Nelson Electric, supra, 241 NLRB 551 fn. 20.

Respondent contends that the provisions favored larger shops because only they could utilize apprentices. However, the ratios of apprentices to journeymen provided in the Local 110 agreement show no such favoritism.

The evidence Respondent adduced to show dire economic consequences of the alleged misrepresentation by the Associations is unworthy of reliance. It is speculative, based on off-the-top-of-the-head recollections, estimates, and questionable assumptions by witnesses who seemingly testified on these matters on the spur of the moment. If such evidence is to have any weight, it must have a more solid foundation than that which underlay the testimony of economic consequences proffered in this case. Moreover, even accepting that evidence at face value, it showed at most impairment of profit, not the kind of losses which would make continued operation under the association agreements impossible. Accordingly, I find no merit in this defense.

d. The alleged acquiescence in Respondents' noncompliance with the agreements

Respondents contend that these cases "cry out" for application of the doctrines of waiver, equitable estoppal, and related law because Respondents failed to observe various terms of the agreement with the acquiescence or agreement of the Unions and the Unions failed to take enforcement action.

Once again the evidence fails to support Respondents' claims. With respect to Bakken, although Bakken paid no local dues after signing the initial Letter of Assent, made no fringe benefit contributions on nonunion employees, did not pay contract wage scales to nonunion employees, and did not utilize referrals from Local 292 after 1980, none of these facts show acquiescence in contract violations by Local 292. At the time Bakken signed the first Letter of Assent he was a sole proprietor and, insofar as the record shows, he remained the owner after Bakken Electric incorporated. There is simply no showing that under the Local 292 contract Bakken was required to pay dues or make fringe benefit payments on his own behalf. As to remainder, there is no showing that Local 292 knew or should have known of Bakken's violations before a grievance was filed against Bakken in early 1983. It is common in the industry for employers with Letters of Assent not to work within the Union's jurisdiction for some period of time and to make no fringe benefit reports to the Union. The Union becomes aware of contract violations only if a business representative happens to visit a jobsite while the contractor is there.[16] There is no showing that that happened before the grievance against Bakken was filed.

North Town relies on the fact that its benefit coverage was terminated by Local 292 in December 1982, that North Town stopped fringe benefit contributions to Local 110 in April 1983, that Roger Joyce stopped dues payments to Local 292 in December 1982, that he never paid dues to Local 110, and that North Town did not pay union wage scales except to those employees who were referred by the Unions. With respect to Local 292, the evidence shows that Local 292 stopped accepting fringe benefit payments from Roger Joyce because North Town was then working as a St. Paul contractor. Joyce's own testimony supports that conclusion, at least in part. Although Joyce testified that he tried by telephone without success to talk to someone about the reason for termination, he did not contest the termination in writing or inform the Union that it was in error as to the location of his work. Terminating Roger Joyce's fringe benefits because he was working within Local 110's jurisdiction did not carry with it acquiescence in North Town's violation of the Local 292 agreement at times when North Town was working within its jurisdiction and, indeed, Local 292 filed a grievance only several months later when North Town was found working within its jurisdiction. There is no evidence that Local 292 was or should have been aware of North Town's contract violations before the grievance was filed. What has been said with respect to Local 292 is essentially applicable to North Town's relations with Local 110 as well.

Insofar as Respondents' contentions are based on delay by the Unions and their counsel in responding to the attempts of Bakken and North Town by letter to repudiate the contracts on 29 July and 3 October 1983, respectively, in the light of the length and complexity of the contentions made by Respondents' counsel, there is no showing of delay in response that would imply acquiescence by the Unions or of reliance on the delay by Respondents that would support their defense.

Accordingly, I find that there is no merit in the affirmative defenses advanced by North Town and Bakken, that they violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the M-NECA/292 agreement in midterm, and that North Town violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by repudiating the S-NECA/110 agreement before its 27 April 1984 expiration date.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. North Town Electric, Inc. and Bakken Electric, Inc. are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Stack Electric, Inc. and Fowser Electric are not employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act over whom the Board would assert jurisdiction.

3. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Locals 110 and 292, AFL–CIO are labor organizations within the meaning of the Act.

4. All employees employed by employers who have authorized the Minneapolis Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Association, to bargain for them, who perform work as described in article III, section 3.12 of the Inside Construction and Maintenance Agreement, 1982–1984, between Local 292 and the Minneapolis Chapter constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By repudiating the collective-bargaining agreement between Local 292 and the Minneapolis Chapter of the Association on 29 July 1983, before its expiration date, Respondents Bakken Electric, Inc. and North Town Electric, Inc. have engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. All employees employed by employers who have authorized the St. Paul Chapter, National Electrical Contractors Associations, to bargain for them, who perform work as described in article III, section 3, of the Construction and Maintenance Agreement, 1982–1984, between Local 110 and the St. Paul Chapter constitute a unit appropriate for the prupose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

7. By repudiating the collective-bargaining agreement between Local 110 and the St. Paul Chapter of the Association on 3 October 1983, before its 27 April 1984 expiration date, Respondent North Town Electric, Inc. has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondents Bakken and North Town engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As I have found that Bakken and North Town unlawfully repudiated the 1982–1984 M-NECA/292 collective-bargaining agreement and that North Town unlawfully repudiated the 1982–1984 S-NECA/110 collective-bargaining agreement, I shall recommend that they be ordered (a) to give retroactive effect to the repudiated agreements, (b) to make their employees whole for any losses sustained by them by the failure to honor the terms and conditions of the repudiated agreements, as prescribed in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), plus interest, as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and (c) to make whole the various fringe benefit funds for any contributions required to be paid under the terms and provisions of the agreements, as prescribed in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On May 31, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions accompanied by a brief memorandum, and the Respondents and Charging Parties Local Union No. 591 and Local Union No. 595 filed answering briefs.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decidedto affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions,[3] to modify his remedy,[4] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

AMENDED REMEDY

The General Counsel's cross-exceptions and supporting memorandum argue that the judge improperly deferred to an arbitrator's award concerning the Respondents' unilateral deletion of article V, section 11, of the Ad-Art–Local 591 collective-bargaining agreement and, as a result, failed to provide a make-whole remedy for employees who replaced unlawfully terminated employees at the Respondents' Oakland, San Jose, and San Diego facilities and who were not compensated at the applicable contract rate. The General Counsel's argument against deferral is based on the contention that the arbitrator's decision involved an issue of unit placement, composition, or scope. We do not find that to be an accurate characterization of the decision. The General Counsel also contends that the rights of the Charging Party Unions, Local's 595, 332, and 569, have been affected without according them due process as they were not present at, nor did they participate in, the arbitration proceedings. We note, however, that all the Charging Party Unions either support or acquiesce in the judge's decision to defer, and have not excepted to the judge's decision to defer. Under these circumstances, we affirm the judge's decision to defer to the arbitrator's decision.

We nevertheless conclude that the judge's recommended Order fails to include the appropriate remedy for the above-mentioned replacement employees at the Respondents' San Jose and San Diego facilities who may not be included in the arbitrator's award. We agree with the judge's analysis of the arbitrator's award as calling for backpay for employees referred from Stockton to other locations at the out-of-jurisdiction rates prescribed in the Respondents' contract with Local 591. The judge independently found, however, that the Respondents had unlawfully reassigned, to nonunion employees in both San Jose and San Diego, work previously done by unlawfully terminated union-represented employees at those locations.[5] As noted above, the arbitrator's award concerned only violations of the Respondents' Local 591 contract, covering work referred from Stockton. The unlaw-

[1] The Respondents have requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondents have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In fn. 16 of his decision, the judge incorrectly states that J. Papais did not deny that when he signed the 1982 Local 332 agreement it contained the designation of "Ad-Art, Inc." as the employer. Nevertheless, in the absence of any other identification of the employer, the judge's finding that the contract designated Ad-Art, Inc. as the employer when Papais signed it is affirmed.

We correct inadvertent errors by the judge in his decision as follows: (1) in fn. 2, the date should be May 23, 1985; (2) in sec. C,2, par. 1, the union that filed a grievance on October 25 was Local 591, not Local 595; (3) the former Ad-Art employee whose testimony is described in sec. C,3, pars. 4 and 5 is Todd Reich, not Tom Reid.

There was no exception to the judge's finding that the Respondents violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish certain information to Local 332.

[3] Because we have adopted the judge's finding that the Respondents' decision to terminate bargaining unit employees and transfer or reassign their work was motivated by the Respondents' desire to avoid their union contract obligations, we agree with the judge's conclusion that such decisions are not legitimate entrepreneurial decisions exempt from the Respondents' bargaining obligation. Hydro Logistics., 287 NLRB 602 (1987); Strawsine Mfg. Co., 280 NLRB 553 (1986). Therefore, we find it unnecessary to rely on his alternative theory (in sec. D of his Analysis and Conclusions) that the midterm contract modifications violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act whether the decisions involved mandatory subjects of bargaining.

[4] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after 1 January 1987 shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 22 U.S.C. § 6621) shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[5] The judge found that the Oakland work was reassigned to Stockton employees.

ful reassignment 8(a)(5) violations found by the judge regarding the work at San Jose and San Diego affected employees who were not referred from Stockton and whose employment is therefore outside the reach of the arbitrator's award. Although the record is not clear whether the San Jose replacements were hired locally or referred from Stockton, it appears that at least two San Diego replacements were hired locally and that the work was also reassigned to employees from the Respondents' Cucamonga facility. All replacements performing work that should have been performed under the applicable collective-bargaining agreements are entitled to be made whole for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the Respondents' failure and refusal to honor the agreements, including all contributions the Unions would have received in accordance with the agreements. Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 218 (1979), enfd. mem. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980). Determination of the identity of any replacement employees who are not included in the arbitrator's remedy may be made in the compliance stage of this proceeding.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondents, Ad-Art, Inc.; Ad-Art, Inc., d/b/a Electrical Products Corporation; and Ad-Art, Inc., alter ego of Electrical Products Corporation, Stockton, Oakland, San Jose, and San Diego, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 2(m) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(m) Make whole the individuals who were hired at their San Diego and San Jose facilities to replace the unlawfully terminated employees for any losses they may have suffered by reason of the failure and refusal by the Respondents to honor the collective-bargaining agreements described above, including all contributions the Unions would have received in accordance with those agreements, with interest."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union 591 (Stockton) as the exclusive bargaining representative of all our employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union 595 (Oakland) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all our employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local Union 332 (San Jose) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all our employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (San Diego) as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all our employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees and relocate sign hanging, installation, maintenance, and service work, or any other work encompassed within the Oakland, San Jose, or San Diego bargaining units, with the object of escaping the obligations imposed by a collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to apply to all our employees in the Oakland and San Jose bargaining units all terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreements.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry of San Diego County (the Association) and Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to apply to all our employees in the San Diego bargaining unit all the terms and conditions of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to supply Local 332 with necessary and relevant information on request.

WE WILL NOT bypass Local 591 (Stockton) and bargain directly or indirectly with the employees in the Stockton bargaining unit for which Local 591 is the exclusive bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against employees regarding to hire or tenure of employment or any other term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of a labor organization or for engaging in activities protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with IBEW Local 591 (Stockton) as the exclusive bargaining representative of all our employees employed in the appropriate bargaining unit.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with IBEW Local 595 (Oakland) as the exclusive bargaining representative of all our employees employed in the appropriate bargaining unit.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with IBEW Local 332 (San Jose) as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the appropriate bargaining unit.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively with Local 569, IBEW (San Diego) as the exclusive bargaining representative of all our employees employed in the appropriate bargaining unit.

WE WILL apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all our employees employed in the Oakland bargaining unit.

WE WILL apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all our employees in the San Jose bargaining unit.

WE WILL execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569.

WE WILL apply the terms and conditions of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569 to all our employees in the San Diego bargaining unit.

WE WILL furnish Local 332 with the requested information necessary and relevant for its duties as exclusive bargaining representative.

WE WILL offer all sign hanger and installer employees terminated at the San Diego, Oakland, and San Jose facilities in November 1983 immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if their former positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make all these employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the termination of the San Diego, Oakland, and San Jose sign hangers and installers in November 1983, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, those employees who were hired in San Diego and San Jose to replace bargaining unit employees terminated at those facilities for any losses that they may have suffered by reason of our failure and refusal to honor the collective-bargaining agreements, including all contributions the Unions would have received in accordance with those agreements.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard these consolidated cases in trial at Oakland, California, on various dates beginning May 8 and ending July 18 and at San Diego, California, on July 31, 1984. The cases arose as follows: International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 591 (Local 591 or the Stockton Local) and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 595 (Local 595 or the Oakland Local) filed a charge in Case 32–CA–6047 on November 9, 1983, against Ad-Art, Inc. (Respondent Ad-Art) and Electrical Products Corporation (Respondent EPC) (collectively Respondents). Thereafter, the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondents on December 30, 1983, in Case 32–CA–6047. On January 9, 1984, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 332 (Local 332 or the San Jose Local) filed a charge against Respondents in Case 32–CA–6172. On February 27, 1984, the Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases, amended consolidated complaint, and notice of hearing against Respondents in Cases 32–CA–6047 and 32–CA–6172. Meanwhile, Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (Local 569 or the San Diego Local) filed an original charge and a first amended charge against Respondents in Case 21–CA–22907, on January 16 and March 1, 1984, respectively. On March 8, 1984, the Acting Regional Director for Region 21 of the Board issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondents in Case 21–CA–22907. Thereafter, Case 21–CA–22907 was transferred by the Acting General Counsel to Region 32 and renumbered Case 32–CA–6388. On April 30, 1984, the Regional Director for Region 32 issued an order consolidating all three cases for hearing.[1]

The complaint alleges in substance that Respondent Ad-Art is an alter ego of Respondent EPC and that Respondents constitute a single business enterprise. The complaint further alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by failing and refusing to apply the collective-bargaining agreements between Respondent EPC and the IBEW Locals 569, 595, and 332 to the operations of Respondent EPC, which were taken over by Respondent Ad-Art on or about November 30, 1983. Further, the complaint alleges that Respondents violated the Act by terminating employees represented by the three IBEW locals and by unilaterally reassigning the work of those employees prior to bargaining with the Oakland, San Jose, and San Diego Locals. Regarding the Stockton Local, the complaint alleges that Respondents engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(5) by directly dealing with and threatening employees and by unilaterally changing a provision of the collective-bargaining agreement dealing with compensation for work performed outside the geographical territory of the Stockton Local. Respondents contend that Ad-Art and EPC are entirely separate businesses and that Respondent EPC sold its assets to Ad-Art and went out of the electrical sign business. Further, Respondents deny the commission of any unfair labor practices. Regarding the complaint allegations concerning the Stockton Local, Respondents argued, at the hearing and in their posttrial brief, that the Board should defer to the grievance and arbitration provisions of the existing collective-bargaining agreement. After the arbitrator issued his decision, Respondents argued against deferral.

All parties have been afforded full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record,[2] on the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

[1] References to the complaint refer to both the consolidated complaint in Cases 32–CA–6047 and 32–CA–6172 and the complaint in Case 32–CA–6388.

[2] On May 23, 1984, I reopened the record to receive in evidence a copy of the arbitration decision.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS[3]

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Ad-Art is a California corporation with an office and principal place of business in Stockton, California, where it is engaged in the nonretail manufacture, sale, service, and installation of electrical signs.

At all times material until November 30, 1983, Respondent EPC was a California corporation with an office and principal place of business in Oakland, California, where it was engaged in the nonretail manufacture, sale, service, and installation of electrical signs.

During the 12 months prior to the issuance of the complaint, Respondents Ad-Art and EPC, in the course and conduct of their respective business operations, each purchased and received goods and services in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. The complaint alleges, Respondents admit, and I find that Respondents Ad-Art and EPC are each an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that IBEW Locals 591, 595, 332, and 569 are each a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent Ad-Art has been engaged in the business of manufacturing, installing, and servicing electrical signs since at least 1958. Lou Papais is the president of Respondent Ad-Art and the owner of 50 percent of its stock. John Papais, Lou's brother, is Ad-Art's secretary/-treasurer and the owner of 25 percent of its stock. Dan O'Leary is Ad Art's vice president and the owner of the remaining 25 percent of its stock. L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary hold the same offices with Respondent EPC as they hold with Ad-Art. Further, the stock of EPC is owned by L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary in the same percentages as they own all the stock of Ad-Art.

In May 1978, L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary formed EPC[4] for the purpose of acquiring the California assets of Federal Sign and Signal Corporation (Federal), a competitor of Ad-Art. From January 1979 until November 1983, Ad-Art and EPC had the following facilities in the following locations:

[3] The record consists of over 2600 transcript pages and over 500 exhibits. The factual findings are based on the record as a whole and my observation of the witnesses. Although these findings may not contain or refer to all the evidence, all has been weighed and considered. The credibility resolutions have been derived from a review of the entire record and exhibits, with due regard for the logic of probability, the demeanor of witnesses, and the teachings of NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 408 (1962). Regarding those witnesses testifying in contradiction to the findings their testimony has been discredited, either as having been in conflict with credited documentary or testimonial evidence or because it was in and of itself incredible and unworthy of belief. In certain instances, I have set forth credibility findings.

[4] The original name of the corporation was Electrical Display Corporation, but within a short period of time, the name was changed to EPC.

Ad-Art:

Stockton: Main office and manufacturing plant plus sales, service, and installation.
Sacramento: Sales, service, and installation office.
Fresno: Sales, service, and installation office.
Reno, NV: Sales, service, and installation office.
Las Vegas, NV: Sales, service, and installation and light manufacturing plant.

EPC:

Oakland: Main office and manufacturing plant plus sales, service, and installation.
Cucamonga:[5] Manufacturing plant and installation.
San Jose: Sales, service, and installation office.
Los Angeles: Sales, service, and installation office.
San Diego: Sales, service, and installation office.

Regarding the Unions in this case, Ad-Art had a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 591 covering its manufacturing and sign installers at its Stockton location. Respondent EPC had an agreement with Local 595 covering its sign installers at Oakland, an agreement with IBEW Local 2131 covering its Oakland manufacturing employees, an agreement with Local 332 covering sign installers at its San Jose facility, and an agreement with Local 569 covering its San Diego sign installation employees as part of a multiemployer association.

During May 1983, Respondent EPC, in an attempt to cut expenses, consolidated management and accounting functions with Respondent Ad-Art. From May until November 1983, the employees of Respondent EPC were paid by checks drawn on an account of Respondent Ad-Art. In July 1983, Respondent EPC closed its manufacturing plant in Oakland.[6] In November 1983, Respondent EPC allegedly sold its assets to Ad-Art, including automobiles, trucks, machinery, equipment, furniture, fixtures, and leasehold improvements.

At the time of the hearing, Ad-Art was operating a sales facility at the former EPC Oakland office. EPC's salesmen were rehired by Ad-Art but the sign installers represented by Local 595 were terminated. Respondent Ad-Art is installing signs in the San Francisco Bay Area by using nonunion sign hangers operating out of its Stockton facility. In San Jose, the office manager, artist, and salespeople were retained by Respondent Ad-Art. The installers represented by Local 332 were terminated. The installation work has been performed by nonunion personnel and by alleged subcontractors. In San Diego, the two installers were terminated and Respondent Ad-Art operated on a nonunion basis until March of 1984 and thereafter performed the work with personnel from its Cucamonga facility.

Within this factual background, the complaint alleges that Respondent Ad-Art is an alter ego of Respondent EPC and that Respondents constitute a single business enterprise. The complaint further alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act by terminating the sign installers represented by the Oakland, San Jose, and San Diego Locals and by refusing to recognize and abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreements between the Unions and Respondent EPC. The complaint also alleges that Respondents violated the Act by reassigning the work of those bargaining unit employees without proper notice to and bargaining with the Oakland, San Jose, and San Diego Locals. Further the complaint alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to furnish information to the San Jose Local regarding the relationship between Respondents Ad-Art and EPC.

During the time period when Respondents were transferring the assets of EPC to Ad-Art, Respondents sought certain contract concessions from the Stockton Local so that they could more economically perform work outside the geographic territory of the Stockton Local. The complaint alleges that Respondents violated the Act by directly dealing with and threatening employees represented by the Stockton Local and by unilaterally changing the provision of the collective-bargaining agreement dealing with compensation for work performed outside the geographic territory of the Stockton Local. Respondents denied the commission of any unfair labor practices and sought deferral of the Stockton matters to the arbitration process.[7] Further, Respondents contend that the Stockton Local agreed to amend the provisions of the contract in exchange for a 50-cent-per-hour wage increase.[8]

B. The Relationship Between the Companies

1. The formation of EPC and its bargaining history

As mentioned earlier, in May 1978 Respondent EPC was formed to purchase the California assets of Federal. Shortly thereafter, Clifford R. (Bob) Allen, a vice president of Federal, was hired to manage EPC. Although Allen was EPC's top official and aware of its contention that it was a separate company from Respondent Ad-Art, Allen testified that prior to working for Ad-Art he was the vice president of Federal. After laughter from the audience, Allen amended his answer and testified that he worked for EPC prior to being a vice president of Ad-Art.[9] In addition to this admission, an offer of employment which resulted in Allen's hire as general manager of EPC in 1978, indicated that Ad-Art, rather than EPC, was Allen's employer.

In May 1978, Allen held a meeting with the former Federal employees in Oakland and told the employees that Ad-Art had bought the facility. The former Federal sign hangers were transferred to Ad-Art's facility in Emeryville and worked with the Ad-Art employees at that facility until approximately January 1, 1979. The employees were carried on the payroll of Ad-Art. In early 1979, the sign hangers and installers consisting of Ad-Art and former Federal employees from Emeryville were transferred to Oakland and became employees of Respondent EPC.

During the 6 months that the combined crew of sign hangers operated in Emeryville, Federal's former Oakland managerial, clerical, and sales employees became EPC employees. However, the Oakland manufacturing plant was closed until negotiations were concluded with IBEW Local 2131, a factory Local.

The 1978 negotiations between EPC and Local 2131 were conducted for the Company by Allen. However, Allen was given instructions prior to the negotiations by L. Papais, and Allen kept L. Papais informed regarding the progress of the negotiations. Allen reached tentative agreement with Local 2131 and submitted the proposed agreement to L. Papais "with the full knowledge of the Union that you needed to review, comment and approve before we finally agree." Allen testified that during negotiations he told Local 2131 that nothing could be agreed to without L. Papais' approval.[10] Subsequently, Allen executed the agreement with Local 2131 covering the Oakland manufacturing facility.[11]

At the time of the formation of EPC, Ad-Art's Emeryville sign hangers, servicemen, and installers were represented by the Oakland local pursuant to a contract effective by its terms from July 1, 1977, to June 30, 1980. In the middle of 1978, Allen notified the Oakland local that the former Federal sign installers would be "merged" with the Ad-Art sign installers and moved to Ad-Art's Emeryville location. While in Emeryville, the combined group of employees were paid by Ad-Art under the terms of the 1977–1980 bargaining agreement. In January 1979, when the merged group was moved back to the Oakland facility, EPC paid the employees under the terms of the 1977–1980 agreement.

In March 1980, Allen entered into negotiations with Local 595 for a succeeding agreement to the 1977–1980 contract. On September 22, 1980, Allen wrote L. Papais about the possibility of a strike and his plan to operate during a strike. Allen asked L. Papais to let him know if Papais disagreed with Allen's proposed course of action. Allen received no response from Papais. The strike ultimately settled and a collective-bargaining agreement was signed by Allen effective from July 1, 1980, until June 30, 1983.[12]

In San Jose, Ad-Art had a series of collective-bargaining agreements with Local 332 prior to the formation of EPC. The 1976–1979 agreement between Ad-Art and Local 332 was applied to the EPC employees after the formation of EPC. In 1979, in response to the San Jose Local's reopener letter, J. Papais notified the San Jose Local that Ad-Art no longer had employees in the San Jose area and that the employees had become employees of EPC. J. Papais stated that "Bob Allen, our General Manager and Vice President, will handle all present and future negotiations." Thereafter, Allen received a copy of Ad-Art's 1976–1979 agreement with the San Jose Local from J. Papais. J. Papais told Allen that Ad-Art's attorney would receive a copy of the contract because "he advises us as to how to handle contract matters." Thereafter, Allen entered into negotiations with Local 332 for a succeeding agreement. During negotiations, Allen proposed, inter alia, a "company" health and welfare plan. The company plan proposed by Allen was the health and welfare plan then in effect in Sacramento, an Ad-Art (not an EPC) facility. The 1979–1982 agreement subsequently entered into by EPC and the San Jose Local did not contain a "company" health and welfare plan.

In 1982, when the San Jose Local sought to negotiate a succeeding agreement to the 1979–1982 agreement, Allen was not available.[13] The San Jose Local ultimately negotiated with Ron Johnson, Ad-Art's attorney.[14] After an agreement was reached, the San Jose Local sent the 1982–1984 agreement to "Ad-Art a/k/a EPC" in Stockton for signature.[15] The agreement was signed by J. Papais and indicated the employer as "Ad-Art, Inc."[16]

EPC began operating the former Federal branch office in San Diego in 1978. In 1980, Allen executed a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 569 covering EPC's sign hangers and installers in San Diego. The agreement, effective by its terms from July 11, 1980, through July 10, 1983, was a multiemployer contract covering the employer-members of the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry Association of San Diego County.[17] The agreement, signed by Allen, indicated the [10] To the extent that L. Papais and Allen testified that L. Papais did not discuss the negotiations with Allen, their testimony is discredited.

[11] L. Papais also advised Allen concerning negotiations with IBEW Local 477 regarding the Cucamonga manufacturing facility in 1979.

[12] The following described employees of Respondents (the Oakland unit) constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including but not limited to sign installers and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their Oakland, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[13] Allen was in Saudi Arabia working on a major project of Ad-Art's at the Riyadh airport in Saudi Arabia.

[14] The union officials were told by Stan Benz, personnel director, that Johnson had authority to sign an agreement on behalf of the Employer.

[15] The following described employees of Respondents (the San Jose unit) constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including but not limited to tube benders, shopmen, cleaners and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their San Jose, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[16] Respondents contend that the name Ad-Art, Inc. was added after J. Papais signed the document. However, there is no credible evidence to support that contention. Jerry Cooper, Local 332's business representative, credibly testified that he received the document with the designation already on it. J. Papais did not specifically deny signing the document as received in evidence. Further, J. Papais similarly signed two prior agreements with Local 332 with the employer identified as "Ad-Art, Inc. and Ad-Art."

employer as "Ad-Art." Neither EPC nor Ad-Art withdrew from the multiemployer association. As will be discussed in more detail, infra, in 1983, Ad-Art's personnel director wrote the Union stating that EPC was going out of business and therefore had no need to negotiate or execute a succeeding bargaining agreement.

2. Interrelationship of operations

As mentioned earlier, the former Ad-Art and former Federal employees commenced working as EPC employees in Oakland in January 1979. The Ad-Art trucks and other rolling stock with the Ad-Art name and logo were transferred from the Ad-Art Emeryville facility to the EPC Oakland location. An EPC logo was added to the trucks and other rolling stock so that the Ad-Art name and logo and EPC logo all appeared. The sign over the door to the facility bore the Ad-Art name and logo. Underneath the Ad-Art name in smaller letters was the name "Electrical Products Corporation." The telephone at the facility was answered as "Ad-Art," "EPC," or "Ad-Art/EPC."

The Oakland employees of EPC who had previously worked for Ad-Art continued to wear Ad-Art uniforms and caps while employed by EPC. The former Federal employees did not wear uniforms. When the Oakland employees were issued employee identification cards in 1980 and 1981, the cards bore a dual designation of Ad-Art and EPC. In 1981, EPC's employees began receiving paychecks that had the Ad-Art name and logo in the background. In May 1983, EPC's employees began receiving paychecks drawn on an Ad-Art account, which paychecks did not in any way indicate that EPC was the alleged employer.

The EPC employees of San Jose occupied the same premises they occupied as Ad-Art employees. The same employees—sign hangers, servicemen, office manager, foremen, salesmen, and artist—continued in their jobs without a break in service. No one was hired or fired. The 1976–1979 collective-bargaining agreement then in effect was continued without interruption. The employees continued to wear their Ad-Art uniforms.

Beginning in December 1978 the San Jose employees received EPC paychecks. In 1981, the EPC paychecks bore the name of Ad-Art and the Ad-Art logo in the background. From May 1983 until the alleged closure of the San Jose facility, the employees received Ad-Art paychecks. Beginning in 1982, the employees used company identification cards that indicated the employer as Ad-Art and EPC.

EPC acquired its initial active accounts from the purchase of the Federal assets and from Ad-Art leases in San Jose and the Bay Area. In 1980, Allen informed his staff members and department heads that "Electrical Products is responsible for maintaining EPC leases, Federal leases and the Ad-Art leases in the Bay Area, Los Angeles, and San Diego." The lease agreements provided that the sign company retained title to the signs. The customer paid a monthly rental fee that included maintenance, service, taxes, insurance, and financing.

When Federal sold its assets to EPC, the Federal sign leases were part of the acquisition; EPC actually bought Federal's interest in the leases and continued the maintenance on them. Ad-Art did not sell any of its leases in the Bay Area or San Jose area to EPC; rather, Ad-Art maintained title to the leases (and collected the monthly rental fees from the signs), but "subcontracted" out the maintenance of these leases to EPC. Ad-Art did not pay EPC for its services, but rather charged the amounts to an intracompany account.

The salesmen of Ad-Art at its Emeryville location transferred to Oakland and became EPC employees in 1979. These salesmen continued to service the same active accounts that they serviced prior to the transfer. The salesmen carried business cards, provided by EPC, which bore both the names of Ad-Art and EPC. Customer order forms often reflected the Ad-Art name, although the facility involved was the EPC Oakland facility. In addition, EPC salesmen advertised Ad-Art customers as their own when soliciting new business. In many instances, both Ad-Art and EPC represented themselves as one company for advertising purposes. Further, EPC salesmen signed contracts with parties indicating "Ad-Art/Electrical Products Corporation" as the sign company. EPC sales manager, Robert Ramsey, sold two jobs in San Francisco in 1983 in which he indicated Ad-Art, Inc. was the seller of the signs.[18] According to Allen, Ramsey, although an EPC sales manager, continually "forgot that the operation was in Oakland and not Stockton."

Even prior to the consolidation of April 1983, the operations of Respondents Ad-Art and EPC were greatly interrelated. As indicated earlier, after the formation of EPC, Ad-Art closed its Emeryville operations (its only sales and installation office in the San Francisco Bay Area) and transferred a combined Ad-Art/EPC staff to EPC's Oakland facility. Thereafter, the Bay Area was serviced by the Oakland facility and Ad-Art itself did not maintain an office in that geographic area. Also following the formation of EPC, Ad-Art ceased operating a sales, service, and installation office in San Jose. The Ad-Art facility became an EPC facility and all the employees were transferred to the EPC payroll without any break in service. Ad-Art was the leasee of the premises utilized by EPC in San Jose. However, EPC exercised the renewal option of the lease. There was no lease to EPC nor did Ad-Art sublet to EPC. Once EPC was formed, Ad-Art did not maintain offices in the San Jose area.

Although Ad-Art did not maintain offices in San Jose or the Bay Area, it continued to sell signs in those areas. These signs were installed by crews from EPC and on tieing of tubing on racks and the blocking out of tubing; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitutes a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act.

[18] Ramsey testified that EPC and Ad-Art were two separate companies and that after 1978 he had no relationship with Ad-Art. Ramsey was impeached by the testimony of credible witnesses and, more importantly, by documentary evidence and the testimony of his boss, Bob Allen. Ramsey's testimony was so effectively impeached that it could not be left unmentioned.

some occasions by joint Ad-Art and EPC crews. There was also joint manufacture of signs between Ad-Art's plant in Stockton and EPC's facility in Oakland. The companies billed each other for services performed; however, there was never any payment. The companies maintained an intracompany debt, but that debt was never paid.

Aside from the wholesale transfer of employees at the time EPC was starting up, there was little transfer of employees until the alleged closing of EPC in the fall of 1983. However, there was substantial interchange of management personnel. As previously stated, Allen, EPC's general manager, left his EPC duties to manage a job for Ad-Art in Saudi Arabia.[19] Allen is now a vice president of Ad-Art. Terry Long left Ad-Art to replace Allen at EPC. At that time Long's salary was split between Ad-Art and EPC. After several months, Long requested that he be paid by only one company to lower his FICA deductions. Long was then transferred to EPC's payroll and paid only by EPC, although Long continued to serve as assistant general sales manager for both Ad-Art and EPC. After the alleged closure of EPC, Long became a vice president of Ad-Art. When Long transferred to EPC, Bob Newman, an EPC salesman, was transferred to Ad-Art to replace Long.

Lower level managers have also transferred between the Companies. Ron Puksar, a supervisor for Ad-Art, had authority over EPC employees on a San Francisco job that lasted from 1977 through 1981. In 1981, Puksar was dropped from the Ad-Art payroll and placed on the EPC payroll the next day. Jackie Toschak, presently an office manager for Ad-Art, was transferred from Ad-Art to EPC when EPC was first formed. In 1981 Toschak was promoted to office manager of EPC's San Jose office. At the time of this promotion, O'Leary wrote her a congratulatory letter stating "Ad-Art is very fortunate to have a Jackie Artozqui Toschak." Toschak remained the office manager of the San Jose office when it changed from EPC to Ad-Art in 1983. Credit managers, accountants, and artists have also transferred between the two corporations.

During the period from 1979 to 1983, Ad-Art and EPC were held out to the public as a single entity. The telephone listing for EPC was as "AD-ART INC." or "AD ART ELECTRICAL PRODUCTS CORP." with an Ad-Art logo. The EPC employees wore Ad-Art uniforms and had identification cards that indicated Ad-Art/Electrical Products Corp. as their employer. The EPC salesmen carried business cards that indicated Ad-Art/Electrical Products Corp. as their employer. Further the salesmen used contracts that identified their Company as Ad-Art/Electrical Products. The salesmen presented drawings and blueprints to customers that, in many instances, identified the company as Ad-Art. In many instances licenses and permits obtained from Government agencies identified Ad-Art/Electrical Products or Ad-Art as the contractor.

Signs manufactured in Ad-Art's Stockton facility were shipped to EPC's Oakland facility approximately once a week. The bills of lading identified the destination as "Ad-Art, San Jose" and "Ad-Art Oakland." Intracompany memos sent to Ad-Art offices were also sent to EPC offices and on many occasions referred to EPC facilities as Ad-Art facilities. EPC utilized forms that identified the Company as Ad-Art/Electrical Products Corporation.

At times when EPC sign hangers and installers in Oakland or San Jose were hanging signs, Ad-Art employees from Stockton were sent into the area to help with the work. Conversely, when Ad-Art employees were hanging signs, EPC employees were sent into the Stockton area to help perform the work. On several occasions, EPC employees would start jobs and subsequently Ad-Art employees from Stockton would finish the job. On numerous occasions, Ad-Art and EPC crews worked side by side on jobs installing or repairing signs. Some of these mixed jobs are explained by the fact that EPC had a 115-foot boom truck. Ad-Art had no similar piece of equipment and, thus, would utilize the EPC equipment and its two-man crew when the need for such equipment arose. The crew of EPC's 115-foot boom truck, on occasion, received supervision directly from Ad-Art's, rather than EPC's, supervisors.

Customers of EPC on occasions made their checks payable to "Ad-Art" or "Ad-Art Electric." On one occasion, EPC performed work for a customer in San Diego in return for satisfaction of a debt owed to that customer by Ad-Art. As previously mentioned, EPC salesmen, including Sales Manager Ramsey, sold signs to customers on contracts indicating that Ad-Art was the seller. It is not clear whether the payment on such contracts went to Ad-Art or to EPC.

As indicated earlier, Ad-Art and EPC billed each other for services performed. Payment was never made for such services, however. The amounts were recorded in a ledger under "intra-company debt." At the time of the alleged closure of EPC, EPC was in debt to Ad-Art. Since the close of EPC, Ad-Art has been in debt to EPC, but no payments have been made and no interest has been charged.

3. The consolidation of Ad-Art and EPC

In April 1983, Ad-Art and EPC consolidated certain management functions. Respondent offered in evidence a "Management Agreement" dated April 26, 1983, between EPC and Ad-Art.[20] The agreement provided that Ad-Art shall provide "all accounting, bookkeeping, and other services related to the administration of the accounting functions of EPC arising in the ordinary course of business, including therein the collection of funds due EPC and the administration and payment of payables and payroll of EPC personnel." Under the agreement EPC agreed to pay Ad-Art $46,400 a month for such services.[21] This price was arrived at by L. Papais by [19] While Allen was working in Saudi Arabia, EPC's Oakland facility commenced working exclusively for that project. EPC's signs then were manufactured by EPC's Cucamonga facility and Ad-Art's Stockton facility.

[20] The agreement was signed by L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary. Each officer signed on behalf of both Companies.

[21] The services were not paid for, but were charged to the intracompany debt.

taking EPC's accounting costs and administration costs and deducting 20 percent. The consolidation of April and May 1983 can best be explained by Respondent's payment of the debt incurred in the formation of EPC. The creditors of EPC, who lent Respondents the capital to purchase the Federal assets, demanded that EPC assets not be merged with those of Ad-Art. The purpose of this demand was to prevent the claims of EPC creditors from being subordinate to the claims of Ad-Art creditors. This debt was retired in 1983, however. Thus in April 1983, Respondents were free to consolidate operations and save money as a result of the elimination of the duplication of certain functions.

Thereafter, on May 25, 1983, L. Papais sent a memorandum to all employees stating that "because of the recent consolidation of Ad-Art and Electrical Products, a Central Control Department has been established to centralize all of the company's job processing activities, including estimating, engineering, job checking and coordinating." Roger Wilkerson, an EPC manager, was placed in charge of the new corporate central control at Ad-Art's Stockton facility.

From May 1983 until their termination, EPC employees were paid by checks drawn on an Ad-Art account. Further, the 1983 W-2 forms for EPC employees showed Ad-Art as their employer for that entire year.

In April 1983, Ad-Art's credit manager advised all Ad-Art and EPC offices that all contracts, security agreements, lease agreements, maintenance agreements, and letter contracts "must bear the name AD-ART SIGNS, INC., and no other firm."

As will be discussed in more detail below on November 30, 1983, EPC sold to Ad-Art all its assets, including automobiles and trucks, machinery, equipment, furniture, fixtures, and leasehold improvements, for their book value. Ad-Art allegedly paid the purchase price by canceling EPC's debt to Ad-Art, assuming EPC's debts, and incurring a debt to EPC for the remainder of the purchase price. EPC is still in existence and is leasing its Oakland facility to Ad-Art. The rent is added to the debt from the alleged sale. Financing costs were avoided by having EPC lease to Ad-Art rather than sell the Oakland facility. No payment has been made and no interest has been charged. In fact, Ad-Art's debt has continued to rise because the Oakland rent has not been paid, but simply added to the intracompany debt. According to Respondents, the price for the sale was negotiated by L. Papais, who represented both Ad-Art and EPC in the negotiations.

4. Common management

As indicated earlier, L. Papais, president, was the chief management official of both Companies. Although Respondent contends that Allen ran EPC and Papais had little to do with EPC, the evidence does not support this contention. L. Papais visited EPC's Oakland facility to confer with EPC's management staff once or twice a month. Further EPC's management staff would confer in Stockton with L. Papais once or twice a month. In May 1982, Allen went to Saudi Arabia to supervise a major Ad-Art project. Thereafter, L. Papais' visits with EPC's management in Oakland increased.

L. Papais also made personnel decisions for both companies. In 1979, L. Papais transferred employees from another of his companies to EPC's Oakland office. In 1982, L. Papais transferred Allen to Ad-Art's project in Saudi Arabia and transferred Terry Long, an Ad-Art manager, to replace Allen as EPC's general manager.[22] L. Papais replaced Long at Ad-Art by transferring an EPC employee to Ad-Art. In 1983, L. Papais moved an EPC plant manager from Cucamonga to Stockton to head the "Central Control Department."[23] When that manager subsequently left Ad-Art, L. Papais replaced him by transferring a manager from EPC's Oakland plant to Ad-Art in Stockton.

L. Papais purchased insurance for both Ad-Art and EPC under a master policy. The purpose of such a joint purchase was to reduce the insurance premiums. All billing and insurance premium payments were handled out of Ad-Art's Stockton office. This centralization of insurance matters resulted on one occasion in L. Papais using EPC's premium money, without the knowledge of Allen, EPC's general manager, to pay insurance obligations of Ad-Art. L. Papais also established policies and procedures regarding hiring that were applicable to both Companies. In 1980, L. Papais changed the lease commission payments for both Ad-Art and EPC salesmen and, in June 1983, changed the entire leasing system for both Companies. L. Papais approved any special financial arrangements for salesmen of both Companies.

In September 1983, L. Papais negotiated with Local 595 (Oakland) over EPC's intended closure and the possibility of an agreement with Ad-Art if Local 595 would agree to the Local 591 (Stockton) wage rate. L. Papais negotiated with Local 591 in October 1983 over modifications to the 1982–1984 collective-bargaining agreement covering Stockton employees.

John Papais was in charge of engineering production and installation. Although J. Papais testified that he "knew nothing" about the EPC operation, that testimony is overwhelmed by record evidence that J. Papais was regularly apprised of EPC's engineering, production, and installation. EPC salesmen would directly contact J. Papais to ascertain delivery dates for their signs. J. Papais was contacted whenever signs called for specialty parts. In 1981, Allen notified J. Papais of a change in expenditures and of a reorganization of the office. In 1982, J. Papais was notified of the changes in EPC department heads. In 1983, J. Papais issued a memo addressed to the art department at all Ad-Art and EPC locations dealing with specific instructions on "face replacements" on signs.

Ted Johnson, an installation foreman for EPC, testified that he reported to Dennis Livengood, Oakland's plant manager. Livengood in turn reported to J. Papais in Stockton approximately twice a month. On many occasions Johnson's supervisors would tell him that they had to check with J. Papais regarding a matter of scheduling or expenditures. J. Papais coordinated the purchase of trucks for both Ad-Art and EPC.

[22] It is unclear who paid Allen's salary while he worked on the project in Saudi Arabia. At one point Allen testified that he was still paid by EPC while working in Saudi Arabia and at apother point Allen testified that the Saudi Arabia joint venture paid his salary. There was no payment to EPC for the utilization of Allen's services.

[23] The Central Control Department was established in 1983 to centralize all job processes, activities, including estimations, engineering, job checking, and coordinating for both EPC and Ad-Art.

Prior to 1983, J. Papais visited the EPC facilities about once a month. Starting in mid-1983, J. Papais began visiting the EPC plants on a weekly basis. In mid-1983, J. Papais told Ted Johnson that Johnson was to call him in Stockton twice a week regarding service and installation. Ted Johnson did as he was instructed and directly reported to J. Papais on matters related to scheduling and expenditures.

Dan O'Leary was the general sales manager.[24] Allen reported to O'Leary regarding general sales matters, discipline of salesmen, and salesmen's expenses. In June 1979, O'Leary sent Allen a memo that stated, inter alia, "as General Manager you are doing an outstanding job in servicing the Sales Department and, fortunately for Ad-Art your 'sales oriented' approach permeates the environment at the Oakland operations."

In 1982, O'Leary hired Terry Long as executive vice president and general sales manager of Ad-Art. Long's responsibilities included overseeing the sales operations of both Ad-Art and EPC, including visits to the facilities, sales meetings, and sales training programs. O'Leary was notified by Ramsey, EPC's sales manager, of all hires and terminations in the sales force. Allen reported to O'Leary on EPC's salesmen's expenses and their outstanding advances. O'Leary set the rules for EPC salesmen and on one occasion discharged an EPC salesman. O'Leary later informed Allen of this action. After being transferred from O'Leary's assistant sales manager to EPC's general manager, Long continued to consult with O'Leary regarding EPC's sales.

5. Control of labor relations

Stan Benz was employed by Ad-Art in 1981 as its personnel and insurance director. Benz' responsibility encompassed "all corporate activity pertaining to personnel and insurance matters." In this capacity, Benz prepared common vacation and holiday personnel policies for both EPC and Ad-Art. Benz administered the corporate health, life, and disability insurance policies that covered employees of EPC and Ad-Art. In 1982, Benz accompanied Ron Johnson, attorney for EPC and Ad-Art,[25] in negotiations with Local 332 (San Jose). Benz observed while Johnson negotiated the agreement that was subsequently signed by J. Papais.

In November 1983, James Meyland, a successor to Benz as personnel director, sent notice of EPC's closure to Local 595 (Oakland) and Local 332 (San Jose) and sent termination letters to EPC employees. Meyland signed these letters as EPC's "Personnel Director." In this proceeding, Respondents contended that Benz and Meyland had no authority to act on behalf of EPC. Meyland testified that he was not EPC's personnel director, but only Ad-Art's personnel director. Meyland is not credited on this point. Meyland attended a meeting with Johnson on November 17, 1983, at which they allegedly negotiated with Local 332 over the intended closure of EPC's San Jose facility. Meyland also attended with Johnson a bargaining session on November 22, 1983, at Local 595's office in Oakland. At this meeting Johnson, although claiming he was only representing EPC, stated that Ad-Art would sign an agreement with the Oakland local if it would agree to the same wage rate provided for in the Ad-Art collective-bargaining agreement with the Stockton local. As previously stated, L. Papais has participated in negotiations for both EPC and Ad-Art and J. Papais has signed bargaining agreements for both Companies.

During the period from 1979 to 1983, EPC used employment application forms that bore the Ad-Art logo and indicated the Company as Ad-Art Electrical Products Corporation. Further, EPC employees were evaluated on performance review forms that bore the Ad-Art logo and identified the employer as Ad-Art. As indicated earlier, employees of EPC received checks with the Ad-Art logo in the background until May 1983 when they began receiving checks drawn on an Ad-Art account.

In January 1983, Benz drafted a holiday pay policy covering both Ad-Art and EPC employees. After some comments by L. Papais, Benz signed a holiday pay policy in February 1983 that was distributed to both Ad-Art and EPC offices. In April 1983 Benz worked on a maternity leave policy for EPC employees. Benz also prepared a memo on safety policies for Ad-Art and EPC employees in 1983. A memo announcing a policy regarding expense money for installation foremen was issued by J. Papais in August 1983 and was directed to both Ad-Art and EPC employees. Although directed to both Ad-Art and EPC employees, J. Papais' memo identified the Company as Ad-Art.

Ad-Art's Stockton personnel office and L. Papais reviewed recommendations for employee raises made by EPC supervisors. One employee at EPC's Oakland facility was twice denied a recommended raise by L. Papais. As indicated earlier, Ad-Art had master policies for health, life, disability, workman's compensation, and comprehensive general liability insurance, which policies covered both Ad-Art and EPC employees.

C. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

1. Events in Oakland prior to the alleged sale

Prior to the July 1, 1983 expiration of its collective-bargaining agreement with EPC, Local 595 (Oakland) wrote a reopener letter to EPC with proper notices to the Federal Mediation and State Conciliation Services. On June 9, Thomas Sweeney, Local 595's business manager, and Sanford Nathan, the Union's attorney, met with Ron Johnson, attorney, and Jim Herman, then Ad-

[24] O'Leary was not called to testify in this proceeding.

[25] Johnson testified that he was general counsel for Ad-Art. According to Johnson, he has an outside service arrangement as well as an administrative arrangement with Ad-Art: "I get paid on a retainer basis for practicing law over the labor relations, and I get a salary in reference to administrative function, prime, is the credit area, because I have experience in there." Johnson testified that he is both an employee of Ad-Art and an independent contractor. His office is maintained at Ad-Art's Stockton facility and Ad-Art pays for his secretarial support. Johnson claimed to be on retainer to EPC. However, he received payment from Ad-Art and not EPC. Presumably, the amount of services to EPC was charged to the intracompany debt.

Art's personnel manager, at Local 595's office to discuss a succeeding agreement. Sweeney asked if Johnson had something in writing authorizing him to represent EPC. Johnson said he was not there to negotiate, but simply to inform the Union that EPC was considering closing its plant. Johnson said the Company would soon close so that it made no sense to enter into a new agreement. Sweeney asked Johnson why EPC was closing and asked for the Company's position in writing. Johnson promised to give a position in writing but never did.[26] Sweeney asked what would happen to the sign installation work if EPC closed its Oakland facility. Sweeney said if the plant closed and Ad-Art tried to use its installers from outside Alameda County, the employees would still have to be paid the local wage rate.[27] Nathan took the position that Ad-Art and EPC were one and the same. Johnson said he was there only on behalf of EPC. If the Union would agree to a wage rate similar to that paid in Stockton, however, Ad-Art would consider signing an agreement with the Union.[28]

On August 8 or 11, the same parties met again to discuss EPC's intentions. Johnson said he was meeting with the Union because it had filed unfair labor practice charges. Johnson said the company was closing in a few weeks and therefore there was no reason to negotiate an agreement. Nathan and Sweeney asked what would happen to the installation work. Johnson said that "Ad-Art has the customers and that Ad-Art just subcontracted the work to the EPC people." Johnson said he was there on behalf of EPC but would think about Ad-Art if a favorable wage rate could be worked out. At the end of the meeting, Nathan asked Johnson what the problem was and Johnson answered that it was the wage rate. Nathan said that if the Company sent employees from Stockton it would not save money because under the Stockton agreement the employees would be paid the higher rate. Johnson answered that the Company could send nonunion people or subcontract the work. Nathan proposed that the parties attempt to negotiate a new wage rate to make it cost effective for the Company to operate in Oakland. Johnson said he would not negotiate, but Ad-Art would agree to a contract with the Stockton wage rate.

On September 12, Sweeney and Nathan met with Johnson and L. Papais in Oakland. The Company took the position that it was about to go out of business in 60 days or less and would agree to a contract for 60 days. The Union asked for a 1-year agreement and an understanding about what was going to happen to the installation work. Nathan attempted, without success, to get a commitment that the Company would honor the agreement if either EPC or Ad-Art continued to operate in the Oakland local's jurisdiction. No agreement was reached at this meeting.

On September 14, Nathan spoke on the telephone with L. Papais and Johnson but no agreement was reached. A few days later, Nathan called Johnson and said that the Union accepted the Company's offer of a 1-year contract and a 50-cent-an-hour increase in fringe benefits. The Union would forgo a commitment on Ad-Art's part and leave open the question of whether Ad-Art and EPC were a single employer. According to Nathan, "We agreed to disagree" over whether the two Companies were a single employer.[29] Johnson said he would have to talk the matter over with L. Papais. On September 17, Johnson told Nathan that the Company would no longer agree to the 50-cent-an-hour increase.

On September 20, the Oakland employees went on strike. The next day the Union and EPC agreed to a 1-year contract extension and the 50-cent-a-hour increase in fringes. The agreement was signed on behalf of EPC by L. Papais. Respondent did not contact Local 595 about the closure again until November 1983.

2. Events in Stockton prior to the alleged sale

On October 18, Wayne Livingston, business agent for Local 591 (Stockton), received a call from Nick Amo, Ad-Art's installation supervisor, telling him that the Company was going to hire "some non-union sign hangers to work outside the area."[30] Amo told Livingston that L. Papais was attempting to reach an agreement with the IBEW International Union that would allow less expensive movement of sign hangers. Three days later, Amo called Livingston and told him that "Papais had hired two non-union hangers and intended to keep them non-union." On October 25, Local 595 filed a grievance with Ad-Art, protesting the use of the non-union installers.

On October 18, Respondents sent the Stockton local a letter requesting a meeting to discuss article V, section 11 of the collective-bargaining agreement. That section provided that the employees working outside the geographic areas of the Stockton local would be paid the local wage rate if that rate was higher than the Stockton wage rate.[31] The Union did not reply to this letter. On [26] During this meeting Sweeney advised Johnson of some fringe benefit delinquencies. Johnson claimed to know nothing about the delinquencies and said he would look into the matter.

[27] The collective-bargaining agreements in Stockton, Oakland, and San Jose all provided that if employees worked outside the geographic jurisdiction of their local union they would be paid the local rate or their own contract rate, whichever was higher.

[28] The Stockton wage rate was substantially lower than the wage rate paid under the Oakland and San Jose bargaining agreements.

[29] Johnson did not deny this testimony by Nathan.

[30] The following described employees of Respondents (the Stockton unit) constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice production and maintenance employees, including, but not limited to, aluminum fabricators, assemblymen, loaders, haulers, painters, plastic fabricators, layout and pattern workers, metal fabricators, glass workers, plant and equipment maintenance workers, die makers, warehouse shipping and receiving workers, janitors, and journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including but not limited to, sign installers and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their Stockton, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[31] Art. V, sec. 11 of the Stockton bargaining agreement provides:

On electrical sign work outside the jurisdiction as set forth in this Agreement, employees must conform and abide with the working conditions and shall receive the wage scales as set forth in that jurisdiction. Men shall not, however, be required to accept a lower rate of pay when covered in this Agreement, while working in another

Continued

October 26, L. Papais called a meeting of Ad-Art's Stockton installation employees. Don Howe, Local 595's shop steward, attempted to obtain Livingston's attendance at the meeting, but Livingston was unable to attend on such short notice. Present at the meeting were Howe, three or four sign installers, Ron Johnson, Meyland, Amo, and L. Papais. Although Johnson stated that negotiations should not take place without Livingston, L. Papais told the installers that he could not afford to pay the higher wage rates for work out of their geographic jurisdiction and that some sort of resolution had to be reached. Another meeting was scheduled for a time when Livingston and the other sign installers could be present.

On October 28, Livingston, Howe, and seven installers met with L. Papais, Meyland, and Amo. L. Papais told the employees that there was not much work in Stockton and offered the employees 25 cents an hour more when performing work outside of Local 591's jurisdiction. Papais said that if the employees did not accept his offer they would be looking for another job because their work would be done by others. One installation employee responded that Ad-Art had offered a $1.50 increase in negotiations the previous summer. Papais replied that he could not give them $1.50. The employer representatives left the room and the employees caucused. The employees were told by Livingston and Howe that the contract could not be changed. The employees proposed accepting 50 cents an hour presumably for meal money while on the road, although they had no intention of giving the Company anything in return. When the employer representatives returned, an employee told L. Papais that the employees would take the 50 cents an hour if something could be done. L. Papais replied he would pay 50 cents an hour. As the meeting was ending, L. Papais told Livingston that he wanted a letter of understanding. Livingston replied that he "wasn't changing the agreement . . . . I'm not going to pull the security clause or anything else." L. Papais said then there was no deal. Livingston answered that there was no deal. L. Papais said that the employees better be looking for another job. Livingston reiterated that there was no deal.

L. Papais instructed Meyland to send a letter of understanding to Livingston. The letter, dated October 31, stated that the Union had agreed to delete article V, section 11 from the collective-bargaining agreement in exchange for a wage increase of 50 cents an hour.[32] Livingston did not sign the agreement and protested the implementation of the agreement to Ron Johnson when Livingston first learned of it in early November. Johnson said that if there was no deal, the employees would have to return the extra 50 cents an hour and Livingston agreed that something would have to be done. Livingston then told the employees to put aside some money since they would likely have to return the extra 50 cents an hour.

In early November, L. Papais approached Howe and said that there had been an agreement. Howe replied that the 50-cent-an-hour increase had been discussed but no agreement had been reached. Respondents implemented the 50-cent-an-hour increase on October 31 and had been paying that wage rate at least to the time of the unfair labor practice hearing.

On October 25, 1983, Local 591 filed a grievance against Ad-Art based on the presence of nonunion sign hangers at Ad-Art's Stockton facility. On December 5, 1983, Local 591 filed another grievance against Ad-Art, based on Ad-Art's October 26 meeting with employees at the Stockton plant and its October 31 deletion of article V, section 11 from the collective-bargaining agreement.

On April 2 and June 5, 1984, Respondents and Local 591 arbitrated the two grievances. The issues before the arbitrator were (1) whether Ad-Art violated the union-security clause, article II, section 3, by hiring nonunion employees without giving Local 591 the opportunity to refer them, failing to inform these new nonunion employees of their obligation to join Local 591, and failing to compensate them according to the Local 591 contract, including its article V, section 11; (2) whether Ad-Art violated the contract's union recognition clause, article II, section 3, and its grievance procedure, by conducting the October 26, 1983 meeting with the employees in the absence of a Local 591 business representative; and (3) whether the two grievances were properly before the arbitrator in accordance with section 2-A of the timeliness provision.

On April 12, 1985, Donald H. Wollett, arbitrator, issued his decision finding that Ad-Art violated the contract in several respects including article V, section 11. Regarding the October 26 meeting, the arbitrator found that the grievance was untimely and, therefore, he did not reach the merits of that issue.

3. The alleged close of business

a. Events in Oakland

On November 22, 1983, a meeting was held at Local 595's offices to discuss the imminent closing of EPC's Oakland office.[33] Present for the employer were Ron Johnson and Meyland. The Union was represented by Nathan and Sweeney. Livingston of Local 591 (Stockton) was also present. Johnson told the union representatives that EPC was closing its doors on November 30. Johnson said the Company was closing its doors in Oak-jurisdiction. Unless there is a reciprocal understanding between adjoining Local Unions on traveling sign crews, employees shall notify the Business Manager's office where work is to be performed, before going to work in such areas. When Local Union 591 sign men are available, outside shops shall not send more than one (1) man per truck, to work in Local 591 jurisdiction.

[32] The usual procedure was for the Union to prepare a letter of understanding if any addendum or modification was reached. I draw the inference that L. Papais varied from the usual procedure because he knew that Livingston had not agreed to deletion of art. V, sec. 11. In fact, art. V, sec. 11 had not been specifically mentioned at the meeting of October 28. Livingston was under the impression that L. Papais wanted him to delete the union-security provision.

[33] The Oakland manufacturing facility had already reached a closure agreement with the manufacturing local union.

land, San Jose, and San Diego, but would maintain the facility in Cucamonga. The Cucamonga facility would be an Ad-Art facility having a collective-bargaining agreement with IBEW Local 477. Nathan said that Local 595 was also willing to negotiate, but he requested to see the Company's books. Johnson offered EPC's books but Nathan said if EPC was closing down, it was Ad-Art's books that he needed to see.

On November 27, a help-wanted advertisement was run by Ad-Art in an Oakland newspaper, soliciting "sign installers/electricians" to apply for work at Respondent's Oakland facility. On November 30, Meyland sent letters to Local 595 and to the EPC employees informing them that the facility was closed and the employees were terminated. The sales and office personnel were transferred to Ad-Art's payroll.

Following the alleged closure of the Oakland facility, Ad-Art began utilizing nonunion installers from Stockton to perform work in the geographic area formerly serviced by the Oakland facility. These nonunion installers were given work orders each Monday morning by Amo, Ad-Art's installation supervisor, and assigned work for a week. Each Monday they would report the time spent and expenses for the preceding week and receive work orders for the following week. If the work was completed in less than a week, the employees called Amo in Stockton for additional orders.

Tom Reid, a former Ad-Art employee, testified that he was instructed by Amo to call Dick Robillard at the Oakland facility for his additional work orders. Robillard had been EPC's Oakland plant superintendent and had been transferred to the Ad-Art payroll on December 1. Reid picked up material and work orders from Robillard. While on jobs in the Bay Area, Reid received materials both from Stockton and Oakland. After his first 2 weeks of employment, Reid's only contact with the Stockton facility was his Monday morning dispatch. Thereafter he reported to Robillard on a daily basis by telephone and visited the Oakland office at least twice a week. Reid testified that he was told by Amo and Robillard that "it was illegal for him [Reid] to be at the Oakland plant and that he would be in trouble with 'the Union' if he were ever caught there." During the last week of January 1984, Reid was told by Robillard that he could no longer visit the Oakland facility and that Reid would have to telephone for orders and meet Robillard away from the Oakland office. Robillard then delivered materials to Reid at places other than the Oakland office. During the 10 months Reid worked for Respondent, he worked on over 100 jobs in the Bay Area. Those jobs were for customers for whom EPC's employees had previously performed work. Reid also performed work in the San Jose area for customers for whom EPC's employees had previously performed work.

Finally, Reid testified that after he was employed by Ad-Art for a month, and had been "hassled" by union employees in Stockton and in the field, he asked Amo if he were going to be allowed to join the Union. Amo answered that "John and Lou Papais would not allow a non-union sign hanger into the Union."[34]

Following the termination of EPC's Oakland employees, Ad-Art performed installation work in the geographic area previously serviced by Local 595 sign hangers. This work was performed by nonunion hangers such as Reid. The Oakland office staff—estimators, artists, coordinators, salesmen, and secretaries—were transferred to the Ad-Art payroll. Ramsey, first an Ad-Art salesman, then EPC's sales manager, and now again an Ad-Art salesman, testified that after EPC's closure he told all his clients that there would be no change in the operation and that it would be the "same location, just a different name." Although Respondents contend in this proceeding that they have no installation service at the Oakland facility, they advertised in January 1984 in a trade journal that Ad-Art had eight such locations that of necessity includes two former EPC facilities (Oakland and San Jose). As late as February 1984, Respondents were advertising for sign service personnel to apply for work at the Oakland facility.

b. Events in San Jose

On November 4, 1983, Meyland sent a letter to Jerry Cooper, Local 332's business agent, identifying himself as EPC's personnel manager and informing Local 332 that EPC was going to "cease operations in San Jose." Cooper called Meyland and arranged a meeting for November 17 at San Jose. On that date, Meyland, Ron Johnson, Cooper, and Dick Conway, a business agent for Local 332, met to discuss the intended closure. Johnson said that EPC would close its doors effective November 30. Cooper asked how that affected the San Jose operation because Local 332's contract was with Ad-Art. Johnson questioned that fact and Cooper produced the contract showing the employer as Ad-Art. Johnson said he was not negotiating on behalf of Ad-Art. Johnson told Cooper that Ad-Art intended to keep the San Jose sales office in operation, but would not need installation employees. He said installation would probably be performed by employees brought in from Ad-Art's Stockton plant. Johnson said that the San Jose employees should apply for work at the Stockton location. The meeting ended with Cooper saying he would contact the Union's lawyer to determine how to proceed with this matter.

On November 30, Meyland sent a letter to Local 332 and EPC's San Jose employees advising them that the San Jose facility was closed and the employees terminated. The sales and office personnel were transferred to the Ad-Art payroll and continued to work at the same location.

Notwithstanding Respondents' contention that it had no longer maintained a service and installation facility in San Jose, but only a sales office, the evidence shows that following the alleged closure, Respondents performed sign service and installation work on almost a daily basis.

[34] Amo denied saying that the Papaises would not allow a nonunion sign hanger into the Union. Amo testified that he told Reid that there were not any openings and that he told Reid that he could probably be a union member one day. I find Reid to be a much more credible witness than Amo and, therefore, I credit Reid's testimony over Amo's denials.

This work was performed by nonunion personnel and an alleged subcontractor who utilized the same equipment previously used by the terminated EPC employees.[35] In their posttrial brief, Respondents allege that the San Jose facility was closed after the instant hearing ended.

c. Events in San Diego

As previously indicated, Local 569 (San Diego) had a contract with the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry of San Diego (the Association) that covered, inter alia, EPC's sign hangers at San Diego. The contract indicated that the employer was Ad-Art. On May 8, 1983, Local 569 sent a notice to EPC's San Diego facility of the termination of the 1980–1983 agreement and requesting negotiations for a successor agreement. Neither Ad-Art nor EPC responded.

On June 10, the Union sent a letter to Ad-Art at the San Diego facility notifying it that the Association negotiations were commencing on June 16. Neither Ad-Art nor EPC responded to this notice. The negotiations between the Union and the Association commenced on June 16 and resulted in an agreement between the Union and the Association for a collective-bargaining agreement effective by its terms from July 11, 1983, until July 1986. The Union notified Ad-Art of this agreement on September 19. Thereafter, on November 4, Meyland wrote the Union stating that EPC was ceasing operation in San Diego and for that reason there was no need to enter "into a collective bargaining relationship with IBEW Local 569." Neither Ad-Art nor EPC ever withdrew from the multiemployer association.

James Chufo, employed by Respondent since the purchase from Federal in 1978, was called at his home on November 11 by Earl Scudder, then superintendent at the San Diego facility. Scudder told Chufo that Respondents were going "non-union" and closing the plant. Scudder told Chufo to come into the facility on November 14 to pick up his final check. Chufo went to see Scudder on November 14 and received his final paycheck and a termination slip which read, "Ad-Art is no longer union." Scudder told Chufo that if he wanted a job he would be rehired but his pay would be substantially reduced. Chufo declined the offer.

Claud Rider was employed by Respondent for only 3 days.[36] On November 14, Rider reported for work and was told by Scudder that Respondents were going nonunion and that Scudder had received orders from "up North" to fire everybody and then hire them back in a week as non-union employees. Rider was also given a termination slip stating, "Ad-Art is no longer union."

Scudder testified that after Chufo and Rider were fired, he finished the jobs in progress with employees from the Cucamonga facility. Scudder later hired two workers as Ad-Art employees to do the work previously done by Chufo and Rider. Scudder testified that he had been told to fire Chufo and Rider by Roger Wilkerson (then manager of Central Control-Stockton). Wilkerson also told Scudder that Scudder was no longer employed by Ad-Art/Electrical Products Corporation, but by Ad-Art. In February or March 1984, Wilkerson instructed Scudder to close down the San Diego facility. Scudder was transferred to the Cucamonga facility.[37] Since March 1984, the installation and service work in the San Diego area has been performed by employees from the Cucamonga facility.

Scudder admitted that from November 14, 1983, until the closure in March 1984, aside from the discharge of the two Local 569 members, the only change was in the name of the business.

4. The request for information

On December 15, 1983, Local 332 (San Jose) filed a grievance alleging that Respondents violated the contract by terminating its sign hangers and installers and performing the work with nonunion personnel.

On January 4, 1984, Local 332, by letter, requested Respondents to furnish it with certain information relating to the business relationship between Ad-Art and EPC. The San Jose local cited its belief that the Companies were interrelated and the fact that the employees had received wages and fringe benefits from both Companies. In this same letter Local 332 grieved the failure of Ad-Art to follow the recognition clause, union-security clause, hiring procedure, and wage and fringe benefit provisions of the 1982–1984 collective-bargaining agreement.

Local 332 alleged that the requested information was necessary to determine whether Ad-Art and EPC were both bound to the 1982–1984 collective-bargaining agreement. Respondents never replied to the request for information.

Analysis and Conclusions

A. The Relationship Between the Companies

"A company which has not agreed to be bound by the collective-bargaining contract of another company may nevertheless be held to that contract if it is an alter ego of the signing company or if it may be said to constitute a single employer with that company." Kiewit Sons' Co., 206 NLRB 562 (1973), vacated on other grounds 518 F.2d 1040 (D.C. Cir. 1975), affd. in part, vacated in part, and remanded 425 U.S. 800 (1976). The Board and the courts have often used the terms alter ego and single employer interchangeably. The U.S. Supreme Court delineated what it meant by an alter ego in Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, 417 U.S. 249, 259 fn. 5 (1974):

> It is important to emphasize that this is not a case where the successor corporation is the "alter ego" of the predecessor, where it is "merely a disguised continuance of the old employer." Southport Petroleum Co. v. NLRB, 315 U.S. 100, 106 (1942). Such [35] Whether this alleged subcontractor was in fact an employee of Respondents has no effect on the conclusions.

[36] Scudder did not deny Rider's testimony that he (Rider) was told that he was being hired as a permanent employee. Rider had been hired to replace an employee who had failed to report for work for several days.

[37] The record does not disclose whether Respondents closed only its service operations or closed the entire San Diego facility.

> cases involve a mere technical change in the structure or identity of the employing entity, frequently to avoid the effect of the labor laws, without any substantial change in its ownership or management.[38]

The legal principles to be applied in determining whether two factually separate employers are in fact alter egos are well settled. The Board has found alter ego status when two enterprises have "substantially identical' management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership." Denzil S. Alkire, 259 NLRB 1323, 1324 (1982); Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976).

Similarly, in determining whether enterprises constitute a single employer the controlling criteria are (1) interrelation of operations; (2) common management; (3) centralized control of labor relations; and (4) common ownership. Bacchus Wine Cooperative, 251 NLRB 1552 (1980); NLRB v. Don Burgess Construction Corp., supra; Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service, 380 U.S. 255 (1965); Sakrete of Northern California, 137 NLRB 1220 (1962), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 (1965). The Board has stressed the first three factors, as well as the presence of control of labor relations. Sakrete, supra, 332 F.2d at 905 fn. 5. No one of the factors is controlling, however, nor need all the "controlling criteria" be present. Burgess, supra at 384; NLRB v. Welcome-American Fertilizer Co., 443 F.2d 19, 21 (9th Cir. 1971). Single employer status, for purposes of the Act, depends on all the circumstances of the case and is characterized as an absence of an "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies." Shellmaker, Inc., 265 NLRB 749, 753–754 (1982); Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 215 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980).

The ownership of both corporations is identical. L. Papais owns 50 percent, J. Papais owns 25 percent, and O'Leary owns 25 percent of the stock of each corporation. These three individuals also hold the same offices with each corporation. Although EPC had a general manager with responsibility for day-to-day operations, it is clear that L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary had the ultimate responsibility in their repective areas of management. Thus, L. Papais had the ultimate responsibility for personnel and labor relations matters such as company-wide insurance, collective bargaining, hiring, pay raises, and sales commissions. J. Papais had the ultimate responsibility for scheduling, production, and cash expenditures for both Companies. O'Leary had the ultimate responsibility for sales and sales personnel for both Companies. The weakness of Respondents' contention that the Companies were separate is highlighted by Allen's testimony that prior to working for Ad-Art he worked for Federal Signs. Allen saw EPC and Ad-Art as the same Company. Further, Allen admitted that EPC Sales Manager Ramsey acted as if he worked for Ad-Art in Stockton. In fact, L. Papais, J. Papais, and O'Leary all used the name Ad-Art to encompass all Ad-Art and EPC facilities in intracompany documents. If such high level managers viewed the two companies as one, there can be no doubt that employees, customers, and other third parties were led to believe that the Companies were a single business enterprise.

Management and supervisors such as Allen, Long, Wilkerson, Toschak, and Ramsey were transferred through the Companies without a break in service. Allen, allegedly the top management official of EPC, was transferred to Ad-Art when that Company needed his services for a job in Saudi Arabia. EPC received no compensation for Allen's services. Long was transferred to EPC to replace Allen, and another EPC official was transferred to Ad-Art to replace Long. The exchange of management officials simply does not take place within unintegrated companies. Similarly wholesale transfers of employees such as the transfer from Ad-Art Emeryville to EPC Oakland, and the transfer of Ad-Art's San Jose employees to EPC San Jose do not take place within unintegrated companies.

During the period prior to the May 1983 consolidation, EPC utilized the Ad-Art name and logo on its buildings, trucks, rolling stock, business cards, contracts, drawings, blueprints, advertising, and paychecks. Moreover, EPC utilized the Ad-Art name on filings with governmental agencies. Following the consolidation in May 1983 only Ad-Art's name was used on contracts and on the payroll checks. Notwithstanding Respondents' contention that EPC and Ad-Art simply entered into a contract for accounting services, employees were notified of a consolidation, of a Central Control Department, and of the new procedure for contracts. Further, the employees began receiving their paychecks from Ad-Art rather than EPC.

Although the Companies billed each other for services, no payment was ever made, not even for the alleged sale. Both the service contract between Ad-Art and EPC in May 1983 and the sales agreement in November 1983 were negotiated by L. Papais on behalf of both Companies—hardly arm's-length transactions.

Regarding labor relations, the evidence leads one to conclude that no bargaining agreement could be reached by either Company without the approval of L. Papais. L. Papais signed agreements on behalf of both Companies and in 1983 engaged in critical negotiations on behalf of both Companies. Further, Ron Johnson, accompanied by Ad-Art personnel directors, negotiated on behalf of both entities. In prior years, J. Papais signed collective-bargaining agreements on behalf of both Companies. Both J. Papais and Allen signed labor agreements for EPC facilities that recited that Ad-Art was the Employer.

Personnel directors of Ad-Art worked on insurance and personnel policies for both Companies. Further, Meyland, then calling himself EPC's personnel director and now claiming only to have authority for Ad-Art, notified the Unions and employees of the closures in Oakland and San Jose.

Under all the circumstances there can be no doubt that EPC and Ad-Art were a single employer. Further, since May 1983 there can be no doubt that Ad-Art became the employer of the employees at the Oakland, San Jose, and [38] See also Burgess Construction, 596 F.2d 378 (9th Cir. 1979), enfg. 227 NLRB 765 (1977).

San Diego facilities by consolidating with EPC and removing the "name only" distinction between the Companies. Ad-Art, after the consolidation, employed and paid the employees in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreements then in effect. It entered into an agreement on behalf of EPC with the Oakland local in September 1983. It reported to the Government, via the W-2 forms, that it was the employer of those employees in 1983. Thus, for the period from May 1983 until November 1983, Ad-Art had adopted the EPC collective-bargaining agreements and had assumed EPC's obligation under the agreements.

As can be readily seen, prior to May 1983, EPC was a subsidiary of Ad-Art, which was so controlled by Ad-Art as to constitute a single employer under the applicable case law. Between May and November 1983, Ad-Art's control over EPC increased. The distinctions between the Companies all but disappeared. Thus, there can be no doubt that Respondents constituted a single employer just prior to the alleged sale from EPC to Ad-Art in November 1983.

There also can be no doubt that since November 1983 Respondent Ad-Art has been an alter ego of Respondent EPC. See Howard Johnson Co. v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees, supra, 417 U.S. at 259 fn. 5 (1974).

By November 1983 Respondent EPC was no more than a corporate name for all practical purposes. Respondent Ad-Art had taken over the administration of EPC's business and was the only one of the two Companies selling or leasing signs. Further only Ad-Art was paying the wages and fringe benefits of the employees performing work for both Companies. The only change that took place in November 1983 was the name change from Ad-Art/EPC to Ad-Art. Respondents' supervisors, Scudder and Ramsey, admitted that the only change was in the name.

Respondents were simply attempting to avoid EPC's union contracts, and the financial obligations thereunder, by changing the name of the Ad-Art/EPC operations to Ad-Art, Inc. The employees discharged in San Diego were told that "Ad-Art is no longer Union"[39] but that they could be rehired for lower wages on a nonunion basis. Ron Johnson, in negotiations, stated wages were the problem and that he would not negotiate, but would sign a contract on behalf of Ad-Art if the Oakland employees agreed to the lower wage rate of the Stockton agreement. If the employees did not agree, Ad-Art would subcontract or perform the work nonunion. Prior to the sale, Ad-Art advertised for employees to perform the work of the Oakland employees. These nonunion employees worked out of Stockton. Amo told one employee, Reid, that the Papaises would not let nonunion sign hangers into the Union. Robillard told Reid that it was illegal for the employee to be at the Oakland facility and that Reid would be in trouble with the Union if he was seen at the Oakland facility. These statements by Respondents illustrate the clear intent, obvious from the entire record, that Respondents' purpose was to rid itself of the Unions and the unwanted wage provisions of their collective-bargaining agreements with the Unions. Respondents hoped to free themselves from the contracts by claiming only EPC and not Ad-Art was bound to these agreements. Collective-bargaining agreements cannot be so easily avoided.

The management and supervisors of the Companies remained the same. There was no change in the business purpose and the Companies continued to perform the same service for the same customers in the same geographic areas, using the same equipment. Ad-Art completed jobs that had been started by Ad-Art/EPC. Labor relations and personnel continued to be managed and controlled by L. Papais with the assistance of Ron Johnson and Meyland.[40]

More importantly, the alleged sale from EPC to Ad-Art cannot be viewed as a bona fide transaction. First, Ad-Art, the alleged purchaser, was merely a continuation of the selling corporation. Second, the transaction was entered into for the purpose of avoiding the contractual and statutory obligations to the Unions. See Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 at 182 (1973). As noted earlier, Ad-Art never did pay the alleged consideration for its purchase.

Under the circumstances, I am persuaded that since November 1983, Respondent Ad-Art has been operating as a disguised continuance and alter ego of the former Ad-Art/EPC operations with the intention of avoiding its contractual and statutory obligations to the Unions.[41]

B. The Unfair Labor Practices in Stockton

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representative of his employees." Section 8(d) of the Act defines the duty to bargain collectively, in relevant part, as prohibiting either party to a collective-bargaining agreement from unilaterally terminating or modifying the agreement during its effective term. Section 8(d) also grants each party to the agreement the right to refuse "to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract." Accordingly, an employer acts in derogation of its bargaining obligations under Section 8(d), and thereby violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by modifying a collective-bargaining agreement during the effective period of the agreement without the consent of the union. Chemical Workers Local 1 v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass, 404 U.S. 157, 185–186 (1971); Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973), enfd. 505 F.2d 1302 (5th Cir. 1974), cert. denied 423 U.S. 826 (1975).

[39] These statements were made prior to the alleged transfer from EPC to Ad-Art.

[40] In November 1983, Johnson, with Meyland at his side, negotiated with the Oakland and San Jose locals on behalf of both Ad-Art and EPC.

[41] Respondents contend that Ad-Art cannot be an alter ego because it was a long-established business rather than a newly created entity used as a disguised continuance. I find no merit in that argument. An employer may not avoid its collective-bargaining agreement by simply doing business under another name. This result is not altered by the employer's originality, or lack thereof, in choosing a name.

As discussed earlier, Respondents' attempt to avoid its obligations under its collective-bargaining agreement with the Oakland local included an attempt to delete article V, section 11 of the Local 591 (Stockton) collective-bargaining agreement. The General Counsel alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by directly bargaining with the sign hangers and bypassing Local 591 as their exclusive-bargaining representative.

Respondent attempted to renegotiate article V, section 11 during the term of the agreement. Local 591, having no obligation to bargain regarding that provision during the contract term, resisted Respondents' efforts. Thereafter, on October 26, in the absence of Business Agent Livingston, L. Papais told the employees that he could not afford to pay the higher pay for work outside the Stockton geographic area mandated by the bargaining agreement. At a second meeting, on October 28, in Livingston's presence, L. Papais attempted to negotiate a higher wage rate in return for relief from the provisions of the contract. Livingston did not protest this bargaining. At the conclusion of the meeting, however, Livingston told L. Papais that he would not agree to change the contract and that there was no deal.

Section 8(a)(5) creates an obligation on the part of an employer to bargain with an incumbent union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the matter of wages, hours, terms, and conditions of employment. It may not attempt to circumvent the exclusive status of the bargaining agent by attempting to deal directly with its represented employees. Medo Photo Supply Corp. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 678 (1944). An employer must deal in bargaining negotiations with the statutory representative and cannot bargain directly or indirectly with the employees. NLRB v. Insurance Workers, 361 U.S. 477 at 484–485 (1960). "The employer's statutory obligation is to deal with the employees through the union, and not with the union through the employees." General Electric Co., 150 NLRB 192, 195 (1964).

In the instant case, Respondents, unable to obtain relief from their contract with the Stockton local, sought to exert pressure on the Union by offering a wage increase to the employees and by threatening the employees with a loss of work opportunities if the Respondents' offer was not accepted. The Stockton local was under no obligation to change or bargain about the contract, during the term of the contract, and Respondents' attempts on October 26 and 28 to bypass the Union are inconsistent with their obligations under Section 8(a)(5). I, therefore, find that by this conduct Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Under the facts of this case, I find Respondents' conduct was not privileged by Livingston's presence at the October 28 meeting. Respondents' unlawful conduct had required Livingston's presence at the meeting. Livingston made it clear. first, to the employees and later, to L. Papais, that he would not agree to change the existing contract. Under Section 8(d) of the Act, Livingston was privileged to refuse to bargain or change the agreement.

The arbitrator found that there was no agreement by Local 591 to change the contract and that Respondents violated article V, section 11 by working employees from Stockton in the jurisdiction of Local 595, without paying the Local 595 rate. Respondents were ordered to make the Stockton employees whole for such hours worked in the Bay Area after November 30, 1983. The arbitrator did not reach the direct dealing issue finding that the grievance was untimely under the contract.[42]

Respondents contended, prior to the award, that the unfair labor practices regarding the Stockton bargaining unit should be deferred to the grievance and arbitration procedure. The arbitrator has now ruled on the matter and Respondents now argue against deferral. Local 591 initially argued against deferral but now argues in favor of deferral. The General Counsel consistently argued against deferral.

In Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), the Board held it would defer to an arbitration award when the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties have agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the purposes of the Act. More recently in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573, 574 (1984), the Board clarified its Spielberg standards by stating it would find that an arbitrator has adequately considered the unfair labor practice if (1) the contractual issue is factually parallel to the unfair labor practice issue, and (2) the arbitrator was presented generally with the facts relevant to resolving the unfair labor practice. Further, in Olin, the Board stated that it would require that the party seeking to have the Board reject deferral and consider the merits of a given case affirmatively show that the above standards for deferral have not been met.

In applying the Spielberg and Olin standards to the instant case, I cannot defer regarding the direct dealing allegation because the arbitrator failed to reach the merits on that issue. The arbitrator dismissed the grievance on timeliness grounds. On the other hand, the alleged unilateral change was decided by the arbitrator.

The arbitrator's award meets the Spielberg standards. The proceedings were fair and regular, all parties agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitrator is not clearly repugnant to the purposes of the Act. Based on the facts presented, the arbitrator found that there was no agreement to modify the contract and, therefore, Respondents' deletion of article V, section 11 was a breach of the contract. The remedy was to apply the bargaining agreement including article V, section 11 to the employees that performed the work. There has been no valid reason shown why the Board should reject deferral to the award and consider the merits of that dispute.

Respondents contend that the arbitrator found that the work of installation and maintenance in Oakland and San Jose belonged to the Stockton unit and that the award would be "invalid" if I find that work belonged to the Oakland and San Jose units. I find no such conflict exists between the arbitrator's decision and my decision herein. I find below that Respondents unlawfully assigned the work of the Oakland and San Jose unit employees to nonunion employees in Stockton. The arbitrator simply found that while the work was being performed out of [42] The time limitations under the contract are much shorter than the 6-month statute of limitations under Sec. 10(b) of the Act.

Stockton, the Stockton agreement, calling for the Oakland wage rate, should be applied. The arbitrator's remedy, calling for backpay for the employees performing the work is not inconsistent with the remedy calling for backpay for the employees that would have performed the work but for Respondents' unfair labor practices.

Finally, the possibility that Respondents might not comply with the arbitrator's award is not a deterrent to deferral. In Malrite, Inc., 198 NLRB 241 (1972), enfd. in relevant part 494 F.2d 1136 (D.C. Cir. 1974), the Board stated:

> If the Board's deference to arbitration is to be meaningful it must encompass the entire arbitration process, including the enforcement of arbitral awards [through judicial procedures].

In J & H Rainwear, 273 NLRB 497 (1984), the Board reaffirmed the Malrite principles.

Accordingly, I shall defer to the arbitration regarding the alleged unilateral deletion of article V, section 11 of the Ad-Art–Local 591 collective-bargaining agreement. Accordingly, that allegation of the complaint will be dismissed.

C. The Unfair Labor Practices in San Diego

Both Respondents as a single employer were bound by the 1980–1983 multiemployer Association agreement covering the sign hangers and installers at San Diego. The Board, with court approval, has held that an employer may not withdraw from multiemployer bargaining once negotiations for either an initial or a successor agreement have commenced, absent unusual circumstances. Bonanno Linen Service v. NLRB, 454 U.S. 404 (1982); Retail Associates, 120 NLRB 388 (1958). In this case, Respondents never withdrew from the Association. The Respondents were bound by the multiemployer agreement negotiated by the Association in 1983 which, by its terms, is retroactive to July 11, 1983. By refusing to execute and abide by the association agreement, Respondents have violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

In order to obtain more favorable wage rates in the San Diego area. Respondents discharged their two bargaining unit employees because "Ad-Art is no longer union." Respondents offered these two employees future work under nonunion conditions. Thus, I find Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by discharging employees Chufo and Rider because they were members of and were represented by Local 569. Island Typographers, 252 NLRB 9 (1980); G & M Lath & Plaster Co., 252 NLRB 969 (1980).

The complaint alleges that Respondents unlawfully reassigned the work of the bargaining unit employees without prior notice to or bargaining with Local 569. As discussed above, I have found that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging the bargaining unit employees and replacing them with nonunion employees. The discharge of all bargaining unit employees to avoid the bargaining obligation also violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Helrose Bindery, 204 NLRB 499, 504 (1973). The reassignment of the work to nonunion personnel and later to employees from the Cucamonga facility was a further violation of the 8(a)(5) obligation to recognize and bargain with the San Diego local.

D. The Unfair Labor Practices in Oakland and San Jose

In terminating their Oakland employees, represented by Local 595, and San Jose employees, represented by Local 332, Respondents similarly violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act. Rather than bargain with Local 595, Ad-Art/EPC simply discharged all the unit employees and began operating as the alter ego of Ad-Art. The use of an alter ego or "disguised continuance" to rid oneself of a union, even though motivated by economic considerations, is unlawful. NLRB v. Lewis, 245 F.2d 886, 887–889 (9th Cir. 1957); G & M Lath & Plaster Co., supra. Further, when an employer discharges its employees to escape the obligations of its collective-bargaining agreements, these discharges violate Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1). Rushton & Mercier Woodworking Co., 203 NLRB 123, 124 (1973); Helrose Bindery, above.

The General Counsel further argues that Respondents, by reassigning the work of the unlawfully discharged Oakland and San Jose unit employees, also violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act by making a midterm modification of its contracts with the San Jose and Oakland Local Unions. Both contracts at issue contained the following work preservation clause, which states, in relevant part:

> The Employer further agrees that he will not sublet, assign or transfer any work covered by this Agreement to any other person, firm or corporation if such subletting, assigning or transfer will cause the loss of work opportunities to employees in the Employer's establishment covered by this Agreement. Any such subletting, assigning or transfer shall be allowable after a mutual determination has been made by the representatives of the parties hereto that such action is not in conflict with the preceding sentence.

In the instant case, rather than bargain with the Unions over more favorable wage rates or the transfer of work to their Stockton location, Respondents unlawfully terminated all bargaining unit employees. In addition to the violations of Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1), found above, I find that Respondents unilaterally transferred work in violation of the contract and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 8(d) of the Act.

The recent Board decisions of Milwaukee Spring Division, 268 NLRB 601 (1984),[43] and Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984),[44] do not aid Respondents' case here.

In Milwaukee Spring Division, the Board stated that before it would conclude that an employer violated Section 8(d), it first must identify a specific term "contained in" the contract that the employer's decision modified.

[43] Reversing Milwaukee Spring Division, 265 NLRB 206 (1982).
[44] Reversing Otis Elevator Co., 255 NLRB 235 (1981).

The Board would not infer a provision not to relocate a facility during the term of a contract. In the instant case, the contracts contained express provisions prohibiting the reassignment or transfer of work without the Unions' consent. Rather than bargain with the Oakland and San Jose Locals, who had no obligation to modify their existing contracts, Respondents simply discharged the employees and found other ways to perform the work. Thus, under Milwaukee Spring Division, Respondents violated Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

In Otis Elevator II, the Board stated that "the critical factor to a determination whether the decision is subject to mandatory bargaining is the essence of the decision itself, i.e., whether it turns on a change in the nature or direction of the business, or turns on labor costs; not its effect on employees nor a union's ability to offer alternatives." See Clinton's Ditch Co., 274 NLRB 728 (1985). In the instant case, the evidence is clear that Respondents' sole motivation in the transfer and reassignment of work was to avoid the labor costs of its contracts with the Oakland and San Jose locals. Aside from the name change, the only change in the operations was the performance of the work, covered by the contract, with cheaper nonunion personnel. In any event, whether Respondents' reassignment or transfer of the work was a mandatory subject of bargaining, since Respondents agreed not to reassign and transfer the work during the term of the contracts, their midterm modification of the contracts violated Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(d) of the Act. Otis Elevator Co., like Milwaukee Spring Division, only applies when there is no provision contained in the contract prohibiting the employer's conduct.

Finally, Respondents contend that the Oakland local waived its rights to seek liability against Respondent Ad-Art by executing an agreement only with EPC in September 1983. That contention has no merit. First, waiver must be clear and unmistakeable. See, e.g., NLRB v. Item Co., 220 F.2d 956, 958–959 (5th Cir. 1955), cert. denied 350 U.S. 905 (1955); C & C Plywood Corp., 148 NLRB 414, 416–417 (1964), enf. denied 351 F.2d 224 (9th Cir. 1965), revd. 385 U.S. 421 (1967). Silence in the bargaining agreement does not meet that test. See, e.g., Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. NLRB, 325 F.2d 746, 750–754 (6th Cir. 1963), cert. denied 376 U.S. 971 (1964); Sun Oil Co., 232 NLRB 7 (1977). Second, the undenied testimony of Nathan establishes that the Oakland local reserved its position that Respondents were a single employer, although dropping its demand for a written provision to that effect. The Oakland local did not waive its statutory right. It simply agreed with Respondents to resolve that dispute at another time and place. In light of such evidence, a waiver by Local 595 of its statutory rights cannot be inferred from its failure to name Ad-Art in the September 1983 agreement.

E. The Refusal to Furnish Information

It is well settled that an employer has a statutory obligation to provide a union, on request, with relevant information the union needs for the proper performance of its duties as a collective-bargaining representative. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 435–436 (1967); Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301 (1979). In determining whether an employer is obligated to supply particular information, the question is only whether there is a "probability that the desired information [is] relevant, and that it would be of use to the union in carrying out its statutory duties and responsibilities." NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., above at 437. As the Supreme Court has stated, the disclosure obligation is measured by a liberal "discovery-type standard," not a trial-type standard, of relevance. Ibid. Where the requested information deals with information pertaining to employees in the unit, which goes to the core of the employer-employee relationship, said information is "presumptively relevant." Shell Oil Co., 441 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1971). Where the information is presumptively relevant, the employer has the burden of proving the lack of relevance. Prudential Insurance Co., 412 F.2d 77 (2d Cir. 1969). "[B]ut where the request is for information with respect to matters occurring outside the unit, the standard is somewhat narrower . . . and relevance is required to be somewhat more precise. . . . The obligation is not unlimited. Thus where the information is plainly irrelevant to any dispute there is no duty to provide it." Ohio Power Co., 216 NLRB 987, 991 (1975); Doubarn Sheet Metal, 243 NLRB 821, 823 (1979). Thus, when the requested information deals with matters outside the bargaining unit, the union must establish the relevancy and necessity of its request for information. San Diego Newspaper Guild Local 95 v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863 (9th Cir. 1977).

In cases when the employer, party to a collective-bargaining agreement, appears to be operating another company that might be so interrelated as to constitute a single employer or alter ego, the union party to that agreement is entitled to information from the employer regarding the nature of and relationship between the two operations, which may be relevant and useful to the union representing the employees in negotiating terms and conditions of employment with the employer, or administering and enforcing the collective-bargaining agreement. See, e.g., Walter N. Yoder & Sons, Inc., 270 NLRB 652 (1984); Associated General Contractors, 242 NLRB 891 (1979), enfd. as modified 633 F.2d 766 (9th Cir. 1980); Leonard B. Hebert, Jr. & Co., 259 NLRB 881 (1981), enfd. 696 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1983). The union must demonstrate reasonable or probable relevance whenever the requested information ostensibly relates to employees outside the represented bargaining unit even though the information may show ultimately that the employees are part of the bargaining unit because of the existence of a single employer or an alter ego relationship. Walter N. Yoder & Sons, above.

In the instant case, the failure of Ad-Art and EPC to observe corporate lines, the fact that the bargaining agreement recited that Ad-Art was the employer, and the payment of the EPC employees by Ad-Art from May 1983 until the alleged close of business more than amply demonstrated the relevance of Local 332's request for information. The request for information was clearly necessary to determine whether Ad-Art was bound by the 1982–1984 agreement it was seeking to avoid by claiming only EPC was bound to the agreement, and was relevant and necessary to the grievance by Local 332 concerning the termination of bargaining unit employees and the transfer of bargaining unit work. Thus, Respondents' failure and refusal to provide the information violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents Ad-Art, Inc. and Electrical Products Corporation are each employers within the meaning of Section 2(2), engaged in commerce and in business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and collectively constitute a single employing enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 591, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 595, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 332, and Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers are all labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging the sign hangers and installers represented by Local 595 (Oakland), Local 332 (San Jose), and Local 569 (San Diego), Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

4. At all times material, IBEW Local Union No. 591 (Stockton) has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice production and maintenance employees, including but not limited to, aluminum fabricators, assemblymen, loaders, haulers, painters, plastic fabricators, layout and pattern workers, metal fabricators, glass workers, plant and equipment maintenance workers, die makers, warehouse shipping and receiving workers, janitors, and journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including, but not limited to, sign installers and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their Stockton, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

5. At all times material, IBEW Local Union No. 595 (Oakland) has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including but not limited to sign installers and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their Oakland, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

6. At all times material, IBEW Local Union No. 332 (San Jose) has been the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice electrician sign hangers, including but not limited to tube benders, shopmen, cleaners and servicemen, employed by Respondents at their San Jose, California facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

7. At all times material, Local Union 569, IBEW (San Diego) has been the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All employees employed by employer-members of the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry Association of San Diego County who do the manufacturing, installing, alteration, dismantling and connecting of all electrical and luminous tube displays and neon illumination, including its auxiliary equipment and structures for the support thereof, including footings, as well as the wiring, assembly, service and cleaning of all such displays; also those employees who bend, repair and pump luminous tubes used as a conductor of electricity; also those who do the handling and installing of all glass, plastic fabrication and including all assembly of signs, and electrical material during fabrication including the loading of signs on trucks, operation of trucks, including any equipment necessary to the erection, installation and maintenance of signs, tying of tubing on racks and the blocking out of tubing; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

8. By transferring and reassigning the work of the employees in the bargaining unit represented by Local 595 with the object of avoiding its contractual and statutory obligations to IBEW Local 595 and by withdrawing recognition of the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees, Respondents unlawfully modified the terms and conditions of the contract before the contract could be reopened pursuant to its provisions, thereby violating Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

9. By transferring and reassigning the work of the employees in the bargaining unit represented by Local 332 with the object of avoiding its contractual and statutory obligations to IBEW Local 332 and by withdrawing recognition of the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees, Respondents unlawfully modified the terms and conditions of the contract before the contract could be reopened pursuant to its provisions, thereby violating Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

10. By refusing to furnish Local 332 with the requested information relevant and necessary to the Union's administration of its collective-bargaining agreement with Respondents, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

11. The allegation that Respondents unilaterally deleted article V, section 11 of their collective-bargaining agreement with IBEW Local 591 shall be deferred to the decision of the arbitrator.

12. By attempting to bypass Local 591 and bargain directly or indirectly with the employees in the Stockton unit, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

13. By refusing to execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry of San Diego County and Local 569 (San Diego) and by refusing to apply its terms to Respondents' employees in the bargaining unit, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

14. By transferring and reassigning the work of the employees in the bargaining unit represented by Local 569 with the object of avoiding its contractual and statutory obligations to Local 569, IBEW and by withdrawing recognition of the Union as the collective bargaining representative of the employees, Respondents unlawfully modified the terms and conditions of the contract before the contract could be reopened pursuant to its provisions, thereby violating Section 8(d) and Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

15. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents Ad-Art, Inc. and Electrical Products Corporation engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that they take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I will recommend that Respondents be ordered to offer immediate reinstatement to all sign hangers and installers terminated at the San Diego facility, all sign hangers and installers terminated at the Oakland facility, and all sign hangers and installers terminated at the San Jose facility to their former position of employment, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, anyone who may have been assigned or hired to perform the work that the employees had been performing prior to their unlawful terminations in November 1983. Further, Respondents will be required to make the employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful terminations, with backpay to be computed on a quarterly basis, making deductions for interim earnings, F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be paid on the amounts owing and to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Regarding the San Diego bargaining unit, Respondents will be ordered to immediately execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry of San Diego and Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and to apply the terms and conditions of that agreement retroactively to all the employees in the bargaining unit.[45]

As to the San Jose bargaining unit, Respondents will be ordered to provide Local 332 (San Jose), on demand, with the requested information concerning the relationship between Respondents Ad-Art and EPC.

Because the unfair labor practices were widespread and involved four of Respondents' locations, it can be inferred that the employees at Respondents' four other locations acquired knowledge of and were affected by these unfair labor practices. Accordingly, I shall recommend an order requiring Respondents to post notices at all their offices and facilities. See Texas Gulf Sulphur Co., 195 NLRB 13 (1972), enfd. 463 F.2d 778 (5th Cir. 1972). Based on the nature and extent of the unfair labor practices, I will order a broad cease-and-desist order in accordance with the guidelines of Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[46]

ORDER

The Respondents, Ad-Art, Inc. and Electrical Products Corporation, Stockton, California, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 591 as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 4, above.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 595 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 5, above.

(c) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 332 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 6, above.

(d) Refusing to bargain collectively with Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all employees in the bargaining unit found appropriate in Conclusion of Law 7, above.

[45] The record indicates that Respondents ceased installation and maintenance work in San Diego in March 1984. However, it is not clear if Respondents still maintain a sales office and facility in San Diego. I leave to the compliance stage of this proceeding the determination of the extent to which Respondents are able to comply with the remedial order. See, e.g., Engineered Control Systems, 274 NLRB 1308 (1985); G & M Lath & Plaster Co., supra, 252 NLRB at 980. Similarly, I leave to the compliance stage the determination of the extent to which Respondents are able to comply with the remedial order regarding their San Jose facility.

[46] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) Discharging employees and relocating sign hanging, installation, maintenance, and service work or any other work encompassed within the Oakland, San Jose, or San Diego bargaining units with the object of escaping the obligations imposed by a collective-bargaining agreement.

(f) Failing and refusing to apply to all employees in the Oakland and San Jose bargaining units all terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreements.

(g) Failing and refusing to execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Electric Sign and Luminous Tube Industry of San Diego County and Local Union 569, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

(h) Failing and refusing to apply to all their employees in the San Diego bargaining unit all the terms and conditions the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569.

(i) Failing and refusing to supply Local 332 with necessary and relevant information on request.

(j) Bypassing Local 591 and attempting to bargain directly or indirectly with the employees in the Stockton unit.

(k) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees regarding hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment for engaging in activities on behalf of a labor organization or for engaging in activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(l) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of any rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively with IBEW Local 591 as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the Stockton appropriate bargaining unit.

(b) On request, bargain collectively with IBEW Local 595 as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the Oakland appropriate bargaining unit.

(c) On request, bargain collectively with IBEW Local 332 as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees employed in the San Jose appropriate bargaining unit.

(d) On request, bargain collectively with Local 569, IBEW as the exclusive bargaining representative of all Respondents' employees employed in the San Diego appropriate bargaining unit.

(e) Apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all employees employed in the Oakland bargaining unit.

(f) Apply the terms and conditions of the current collective-bargaining agreement to all employees in the San Jose bargaining unit.

(g) Execute a copy of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569.

(h) Apply the terms and conditions of the 1983–1986 agreement between the Association and Local 569 to all Respondents' employees in the San Diego bargaining unit.

(i) Furnish, on request, to Local 332 the requested information necessary and relevant for its duties as exclusive bargaining representative.

(j) Offer all sign hanger and installer employees terminated at the San Diego, Oakland, and San Jose facilities in November 1983 immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if their former positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

(k) Make these employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of Respondents' discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(l) Remove from their files any reference to the termination of the sign hangers and installers at San Diego, Oakland, and San Jose in November 1983, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

(m) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(n) Post at all their facilities in Nevada and California copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[47] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(o) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed December 1, 1987, by Central Hardware Company (Central Hardware or the Employer), alleging that the Respondent, Teamsters Local 600, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by UFCW Local 655.[1] The hearing was held January 22, 1988, before Hearing Officer Lynette K. Zuch. Thereafter, Teamsters Local 600 and Central Hardware filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, Central Hardware, a wholly owned subsidiary of Interco, Incorporated, a Delaware corporation with its principal offices and a warehouse facility located in Bridgeton, Missouri, and nine hardware stores located in St. Louis, Missouri, and stores located in Alton, Fairview Heights, and Granite City, Illinois, is engaged in the retail sale of hardware and building materials. Central Hardware annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 from the operation of its hardware stores, and purchases and receives goods valued in excess of $50,000, which are shipped directly to its St. Louis, Missouri and Illinois facilities from points located outside the States of Missouri and Illinois respectively. Accordingly, we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. We also find that Teamsters Local 600 and UFCW Local 655 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Central Hardware has participated in the annual Tinker Show at the Cervantes Convention Center since 1975. The Tinker Show is a consumer show designed to inform customers how to perform repairs around their homes. Since 1977, Central Hardware has assigned to its own employees, represented by UFCW Local 655, the tasks of unloading merchandise from trailers at the Convention Center and loading the trailers at the close of the Tinker Show. The most recent show was held September 11–13, 1987.

Central Hardware and Teamsters Local 600 stipulated that the Teamsters made demands on Central Hardware to assign the disputed work to Teamsters-represented employees at the September 1987 Tinker Show, that the Teamsters threatened to picket and picketed during the September 1987 show, and that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated.

On December 11 and 15, 1987, about a month before the hearing, the NLRB received two letters from UFCW Local 655. The first letter said in part:

> It is the understanding of Local 655 that Local 600 has jurisdiction for the unloading of trucks to transport cargo directly to the exhibition floor or to a storage area. Local 655 has jurisdiction over the moving, handling, stocking and returning to storage of any materials whose unloading to the exhibition floor or to a storage area has already been completed by Local 600. We understand Local 600 has no claim to this work. Accordingly, it is the position of Local 655 that there is no jurisdictional dispute.

The second letter said:

> UFCW 655 disclaims any jurisdiction over the unloading of trucks to transfer cargo directly to the exhibition floor or to a storage area which is the jurisdiction of Teamsters Local 600.

[1] At the hearing, the Employer, Teamsters Local 600, and the Carpenters District Council of Greater St. Louis (Carpenters) stipulated that there was no dispute with respect to the Carpenters, whereupon the Carpenters left the hearing.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work consists of the unloading and loading of trucks for Central Hardware at the Cervantes Convention Center during the annual Tinker Show.

C. Contentions of the Parties

Central Hardware contends that the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by UFCW Local 655 based on the fact that it has a collective-bargaining agreement with UFCW Local 655 and no contract with Teamsters Local 600, employer preference, past practice, and economy and efficiency.

Teamsters Local 600 contends that there is no jurisdictional dispute because UFCW Local 655 has disclaimed an interest in the work. In the event the Board determines to the contrary, Teamsters Local 600 argues the disputed work should be awarded to Teamsters-represented employees based on a number of factors, including area and industry practice and relative skill.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

Teamsters Local 600 and Central Hardware stipulated that the Teamsters demanded the Employer assign the disputed work to Teamsters-represented employees, that the Teamsters threatened to picket and did picket when the Employer did not assign the work to Teamsters-represented employees, and that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated. Teamsters Local 600 and Central Hardware also stipulated there is no agreed-on method for the adjustment of this dispute to which the parties are bound.

Regarding the purported disclaimer by UFCW Local 655, it is well established that when a party to a jurisdictional dispute effectively renounces its claim to the work in question, the Board considers the dispute to be at an end and quashes the notice of hearing. Operating Engineers Local 369 (Sustin Co.), 255 NLRB 476, 478 fn. 1 (1981). It is also well established that the party raising such an issue "has the burden to satisfy the Board's requirements of a clear, unequivocal, and unqualified disclaimer of all interest in the work in dispute." Operating Engineers Local 77 (C. J. Coakley Co.), 257 NLRB 436, 438–439 (1981). Teamsters Local 600 argues that the two letters that UFCW Local 655 sent to the Board constitute an effective disclaimer of the work in dispute. Based on the particular circumstances presented, we disagree.

First, we think it important to observe that the party which purportedly disclaimed the work is not the party asserting there was a disclaimer. UFCW Local 655 may, of course, show there was a disclaimer by another union, but merely introducing letters from another union, which, for reasons stated below, are best ambiguous, without presenting agents of the other union to testify in order to explain the ambiguous communications falls far short of establishing an effective disclaimer.[2] Further, although UFCW Local 655 sent letters to the Board in December 1987, it did not send these letters to the Employer. During roughly the same time period it was allegedly disclaiming the work in its letters to the Region, UFCW Local 655 was negotiating a new collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer. Despite the fact that it had been performing the disputed work for over 11 years and that it concurrently was sending letters to the Region allegedly disclaiming the work, UFCW Local 655 did not discuss the work in question during such negotiations, nor did it seek to clarify the work UFCW Local 655-represented employees were to perform at future Tinker Shows to exclude the disputed work. The failure of UFCW Local 655 to raise these matters during the negotiations in light of its long-existing practice of performing the work is conduct inconsistent with its disclaiming the loading and unloading work.

Under all the circumstances presented, therefore, we cannot conclude that Teamsters Local Union No. 600 has established that there was an effective disclaimer and that UFCW Local 655 has clearly, unequivocally, and unqualifiedly renounced interest in having the disputed work assigned to employees it represents.[3]

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

[2] Although served with notice of the 10(k) hearing, UFCW Local 655 was not present at the hearing.

[3] Operating Enginners Local 825 (Patock Construction), 285 NLRB 1211 (1987), is distinguishable. In that case a disclaimer was found effective where, unlike here, the disclaiming union renewed its disclaimer to the Region at the hearing and in its briefs to the Board. Further, there was no evidence in Patock that the allegedly disclaiming union engaged in conduct inconsistent with the existence of a disclaimer.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

There was no evidence presented that either union has been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative of any of the employees involved. Accordingly, this factor is not helpful in determining the dispute.

Teamsters Local 600 and Central Hardware have no collective-bargaining agreement. Central Hardware and UFCW Local 655 have a collective-bargaining agreement which does not contain a description of unit work. Accordingly, we find that this factor does not favor either group of the employees involved.

2. Company preference and past practice

Central Hardware has assigned the work in dispute to its own employees represented by UFCW Local 655 since 1977. Central Hardware prefers to continue assigning this work to employees represented by UFCW Local 655. This factor favors an assignment of the work to employees represented by UFCW Local 655.

3. Area and industry practice

Robert Ramshaw, the Teamsters Local 600 business agent responsible for the Convention Center and the Teamsters' hiring hall, testified that Teamsters-represented employees have historically unloaded and loaded freight at the Cervantes Convention Center for all the shows and exhibitions that are held there. At the same convention center, UFCW Local 655-represented employees have performed the disputed work for Central Hardware for over 11 years. No evidence was presented as to which Unions represent employees performing freight handling for other exhibitions in the St. Louis area.

We find the record inconclusive regarding area and industry practice. Accordingly, these factors do not favor an award of the disputed work to individuals represented by Teamsters Local 600 or UFCW Local 655.[4]

4. Relative skills

Teamsters Local 600 claims that employees it represents are more skilled in performing the work in dispute because of familiarity with the unusual safety considerations of the Cervantes Convention Center. After reviewing the evidence pertaining to the skills of the two groups, we find that both are equally capable of performing the work.

Accordingly, we find that this factor does not favor either group.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

We find, based on the testimony of Stephen East, the executive vice president of Central Hardware, that utilizing UFCW Local 655-represented employees is more efficient. East's testimony establishes that because of Central Hardware's employees' familiarity with the merchandise, it is not necessary to label the boxes to be loaded and unloaded and the employees require less supervision. Additionally, the Employer would need its employees at the Convention Center to set up the display booths even if it assigned the unloading and loading of the trailers to Teamsters-represented employees. Thus Central Hardware would have to compensate and manage its employees as well as Teamsters-represented employees for work currently satisfactorily performed by only one group of employees.

Accordingly, we conclude the record establishes that the factors of efficiency and economy of operations favor awarding the work to employees represented by UFCW Local 655.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by UFCW Local 655 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on employer preference and past practice and economy and efficiency of operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by UFCW Local 655, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

[4] Member Babson notes that, were the factor of "area practice" limited to the Convention Center, it is clear, as the Employer itself implicitly concedes, that this factor would favor employees represented by Teamsters Local 600 but he further notes the lack of evidence regarding the practice in the St. Louis area generally. Moreover, he notes Teamsters' contention that an agreement between it and certain other unions whose members perform work at the Convention Center gives it jurisdiction over loading and unloading freight at the Center, but he notes also that UFCW Local 655 is not a signatory to this agreement. He gives this agreement little weight, at the least because of the Employer's longstanding contrary past practice. Cf. Operating Engineers Local 150 (Components, Inc.), 197 NLRB 569 (1972).

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Central Hardware represented by United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 655, affiliated with United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, are entitled to unload and load trucks for Central Hardware Company at the Cervantes Convention Center during its annual Tinker Show.

2. Highway, City and Air Freight Drivers, Dockmen, Marine Officers Association and Helpers, Teamsters Local Union No. 600, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Central Hardware Company to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Teamsters Local 600 shall notify the Regional Director for Region 14 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Central Hardware Company, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On August 17, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued the attached decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed a brief in reply to the Respondents' exceptions and in support of the judge's decision. The Respondents then filed a motion to strike certain portions of the Charging Party's brief or, in the alternative, to file a supplemental brief.[2] The Charging Party filed a reply to the Respondent's motion.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions, as modified below, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified, and set forth in full below.[4]

The facts are set forth fully in the judge's decision. The judge found, and we agree, that Respondent Local 13 violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) when its agent, Lomelli, threatened a work stoppage if employees represented by the Teamsters were permitted to perform the disputed work. Contrary to the judge, however, we do not find that Lomelli's threat can be attributed to Respondent Local 63. Evidence is lacking that Respondent Local 63 authorized Lomelli to act on its behalf, or that it ratified the threat either expressly or by its conduct. These circumstances distinguish this case from cases in which the Board has concluded that an agency relationship existed between sister locals. See, e.g., Plumbers Local 119 (Kamtech), 264 NLRB 688, 690–691 (1982).

However, we agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondents violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) by filing time-in-lieu grievances. In doing so, we rely on the fact that the grievances sought payments for work that was explicitly included in the Board's prior 10(k) award to Teamsters-represented employees or, as the judge found, "clear[ly]" incident to that work.[5] The Respondents therefore unlawfully sought to undermine the Board's award. Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser), 271 NLRB 759 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser) v. Pacific Maritime Assn., 773 F.2d 1012 (9th Cir. 1985), cert. denied 476 U.S. 1158 (1986).[6]

For the reasons set forth in the Weyerhaeuser decisions, supra, we reject the Respondents' contention that the Board is precluded from enjoining the grievances by Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731 (1983). In Bill Johnson's, the Supreme Court held that "the Board may not halt prosecution of a state-court lawsuit, regardless of the plaintiff's motive, unless the suit lacks a reasonable basis in fact and law." 461 U.S. at 748.

In Weyerhaeuser, the Board applied the Bill Johnson's rationale to consider the Board's authority to enjoin a Section 301 lawsuit. The Board in Weyerhaeuser found that Bill Johnson's did not compel staying Board proceedings while the Section 301

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] We deny the Respondents' motion because, with one exception, we have not relied on those portions of the Charging Party's brief that the Respondents seek to strike. We note that the Respondents objected, inter alia, to the Charging Party's reliance on Longshoremen ILWU Local 32 (Weyerhaeuser), 271 NLRB 759 (1984), in support of its argument that the Respondents have a "coast-wide policy" of misconduct. At the time of the Charging Party's brief and the Respondents' motion, Weyerhaeuser was still pending before the Board. Of course, we may now rely on Weyerhaeuser because it has issued, but we find it unnecessary to consider the Charging Party's argument that the Respondents have a coast-wide policy of misconduct.

[3] In sec. III,B, par. 3 of his decision, the judge erroneously referred to January 10, 1987, rather than to 1983. We correct this inadvertent error.

[4] We shall modify the judge's recommended Order to accord with our findings below, and we shall also order that Sea-Land, Container Stevedoring Company, Inc., and Pacific Maritime Association be reimbursed for the time-in-lieu payments that they made to the Respondents. Cf. United Marine Division Local 333 (MOTC Acquisitions), 226 NLRB 1214 (1976).

The judge ordered the Respondents to cease and desist from failing and refusing to comply with the Board's previous Decision and Determination of Dispute, 258 NLRB 412 (1981). Noncompliance with a determination of the Board under Sec. 10(k) is not itself a violation of Sec. 8(b)(4)(D); it serves, instead, to trigger the issuance of a complaint. Longshoremen ILWU Local 6 (Golden Grain), 289 NLRB 1 fn. 3 (1988). We shall modify the recommended Order and notice accordingly.

[5] Contrast Broadcast Employees NABET (Metromedia), 255 NLRB 372 (1981), petition for review dismissed as moot 676 F.2d 711 (9th Cir. 1982), in which the 10(k) award's interpretation was open to reasonable doubt. The Board thus found lawful the union's Sec. 301 suit to arbitrate the employer's failure to assign work arguably not covered by the award.

[6] With respect to Local 63, we do not base our findings on the fact that its grievances sought payments for employees performing clerks' work. That work was not within the 10(k) award. Clerks' work arises, however, only when the disputed work is assigned to Local 13, contrary to the 10(k) award. Thus, Local 63's grievances undermine the award in the same manner as Local 13's.

In finding Respondent Local 63 violated the Act, we find it unnecessary to rely on Detroit Building Trades Council (Chatham Supermarkets), 259 NLRB 970 (1982), cited by the judge.

suit was pending in a case in which the General Counsel alleged the respondent union unlawfully filed work-assignment grievances and the lawsuit despite a contrary 10(k) award. The Board relied in part on Carey v. Westinghouse Electric Corp., 375 U.S. 261, 272 (1964), in which the Court held that Board's rulings under Section 10(k) "take precedence" over contrary arbitration awards, and that an employer who acts in accordance with a Board ruling will not be liable for damages under Section 301. Thus, the Board found Carey deprived the Section 301 suit of a reasonable basis in fact and law.

Like the respondents in Weyerhaeuser, the Respondents here filed grievances contrary to a 10(k) award. The grievances thus lacked a reasonable basis in fact and law, and Bill Johnson's therefore does not preclude the Board from enjoining the Respondent's grievances.

Accordingly, we conclude that by filing grievances with an unlawful motive and without a reasonable basis in fact or law, the Respondents violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13, Long Beach, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Filing time-in-lieu claims for work performed by members of General Truck Drivers, Chauffeurs and Helpers Union, Local No. 692, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (Local 692), with an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division) (Sea-Land) and/or Container Stevedoring Company, Inc. (Container), to assign, contrary to the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 258 NLRB 412, the work described below to employees represented by International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13 (Local 13), rather than to employees represented by Local 692. The work consists of:

> The transportation and grounding of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the temporary staging of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, and the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, at the Long Beach, California, facility of Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division), and at the nearby Pelican Pond area.

(b) Threatening to engage in a work stoppage with an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land and/or Container to assign the work described above to employees represented by Local 13, rather than to employees represented by Local 692.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw and cease filing time-in-lieu claims that have an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land and/or Container to assign, contrary to the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 258 NLRB 412, the work described above to employees represented by Local 13, rather than to employees represented by Local 692.

(b) Reimburse Sea-Land, Container, and the Pacific Maritime Association for any time-in-lieu payments made to it pursuant to claims filed on January 10, 11, and 18, and on March 29, 1983.[7]

(c) Post at its office and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and mail sufficient copies of the notice to the Regional Director for posting by Sea-Land and Container, if they are willing, at all locations on the jobsite where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondent International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 63, Long Beach, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from filing time-in-lieu claims with an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land and/or Container to assign, contrary to the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at [7] The record does not clearly establish which of the Employers made the time-in-lieu payments. Of course, we intend that reimbursement be made only to the Employer that actually made the payments.

---

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

258 NLRB 412, the work described below to employees represented by Local 13, rather than to employees represented by Local 692. The work consists of:

> The transportation and grounding of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the temporary staging of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, and the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, at the Long Beach, California, facility of Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division), and at the nearby Pelican Pond area.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Withdraw and cease filing time-in-lieu claims that have an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land and/or Container to assign, contrary to the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported at 258 NLRB 412, the work described above to employees represented by Local 13, rather than to employees represented by Local 692.

(b) Reimburse Sea-Land, Container, and the Pacific Maritime Association for any time-in-lieu payments made to it pursuant to claims filed on January 10, 11, and 18, and on March 29, 1983.[9]

(c) Post at its office and meeting halls copies copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[10] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Sign and mail sufficient copies of the notice to the Regional Director for posting by Sea-Land and Container, if they are willing, at all locations on the jobsite where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[9] As we noted above in fn. 7, we intend that reimbursement be made only to the Employer that actually made the payments.

[10] See fn. 8, above.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GERALD A. WACKNOV, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to notice, a hearing with respect to this matter was held before me in Los Angeles, California, on May 17 and 18, 1983. The charge was filed on January 28, 1983, by Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division) (Sea-Land).

Thereafter, on March 14, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing alleging a violation by International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13, and International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 63 (Respondents) of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

The parties were afforded a full opportunity to be heard, to call, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to introduce relevant evidence. Since the close of the hearing, briefs have been received from the General Counsel, counsel for Respondent, and counsel for the Charging Party.

On the entire record, and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Sea-Land is a Delaware corporation engaged in the business of transporting containerized freight, and operates a marine facility in Long Beach, California. Sea-Land annually provides services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers who, in turn, annually sell and ship goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. It is admitted, and I find, that Sea-Land is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act; an employer within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act; and a person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

It is admitted that the Respondents are, and have been at all times material, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act; and that General Truck Drivers, Chauffeurs & Helpers Union, Local No. 692, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Teamsters) is and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issue

The principal issue raised by the pleading is whether the Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by unlawfully attempting to cause Sea-Land to assign certain work to their members rather than to members of another labor organization, in violation of a prior Board Decision and Determination of Dispute.

B. The Facts

The facts are substantially as set forth in the Board's prior Decision and Determination of Dispute issued on September 30, 1981, involving the identical parties, and reported at 258 NLRB 412. In that case, the Board made the following determination at 415:

> Employees of Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division), who are represented by General Truck Drivers, Chauffeurs & Helpers Union, Local No. 692, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, are entitled to perform the work of the transportation and grounding of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the temporary staging of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, and the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, at the Long Beach, California, facility of Sea-Land Services, Inc. (Pacific Division), and at the nearby Pelican Pond area.

Thereafter, on October 14, 1981, Respondent International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13, filed a motion for reopening of record and reconsideration of decision, contending that the Board should reopen the record to consider relevant provisions of various contracts, which, as the original decision noted, were not admitted into evidence at the hearing. On January 28, 1982, the Board denied the motion as lacking in merit.

From the time of the 10(k) award until January 10, 1982, Sea-Land extensively continued the aforementioned work at Pelican Pond[1] utilizing Teamsters members, without incident. The work during this time included grounding and staging and also flipping, bundling, and unbundling of chassis (infra).

On January 10, 1983, Respondents submitted a grievance seeking time-in-lieu payments as provided by their contract with Container Stevedoring Company, which supplies Sea-Land with employees represented by Respondents for performing work related to the loading and unloading of ships at Sea-Land's marine yard. The grievance claim was that Respondents should have been given the work that was performed at Pelican Pond that very day by Teamsters members employed by Sea-Land. An immediate arbitration proceeding was held, in which the Teamsters were not a party, and on January 13, 1983, the arbitrator determined the issue in favor of the Respondents. Despite this arbitrator's award, and a prior arbitration award,[2] Sea-Land continued to use Teamsters employees to perform whatever work was required at Pelican Pond.

Gene Borg, a manager for Container Stevedoring Company, testified that on January 24, 1983, he received a call from Richard Lomelli, a relief business agent with Local 13. Lomelli stated he was calling to investigate a rumor that Sea-Land was doing work in Pelican Pond. Borg said he would investigate and call back. Thereafter, Borg called Lomelli and indicated that the "top handler," a large piece of equipment that lifts containers from the top four corners,[3] had been used by Teamsters employees at Pelican Pond. Lomelli said, "Lou [Louis Loveridge, president of Local 13] told me to go down to the Sea-Land facility, and if the Teamsters were using the top handler in the Pelican Pond, to walk the gang if they're working a ship." Borg's testimony stands unrebutted in the record.

As a result, to avoid a work stoppage that would interrupt the schedules of the sea-going vessels Sea-Land has discontinued using Pelican Pond. Respondents have claimed time-in-lieu payments for all work performed by the Teamsters at Pelican Pond on January 10, 11, and 18 and March 29, when Sea-Land removed the remaining empty grounded containers, and time-in-lieu claims in the amount of about $4300 have been paid.

Louis W. Rios is secretary-treasurer of Local 13. Rios testified that regarding the current dispute the officers of Respondent were instructed by officers of the International Union to follow the Board's Section 10(k) ruling, but to also follow the contractual grievance procedure and continue to file time-in-lieu claims because the work in dispute is work belonging to Respondents. Rios testified that it is Local 13's position that it is entitled to perform the work of the transportation and grounding of containers outside the container yard at the Pelican Pond; the temporary staging of containers at Pelican Pond and the work incident thereto; and the return of [1] Pelican Pond is the name given to an unenclosed 1-acre paved area across the street from Sea-Land's marine yard.

[2] As noted in the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute, in an earlier 1980 arbitration proceeding in which the Teamsters were not a party, the work at Pelican Pond was awarded to Respondents.

[3] The record shows that Teamsters members performed the same work at Pelican Pond with the top handlers as they had performed with forklifts, but that the characteristics of the top handler enable the various functions to be performed more safely and efficiently.

such containers from the Pelican Pond to the marine yard and the work incident thereto. In summary, Rios admitted that the Union is continuing to claim all the work that was the subject of the 10(k) hearing.

Respondents take the position that the more recent work performed by Teamsters at Pelican Pond in January 1983 was not work specifically covered by the 10(k) award. Rather, the work included not only grounding or staging, but also flipping of containers, and bundling and unbundling of chassis. As noted in the prior Board decision, "grounding" is defined as the removal of the container from the chassis and setting it on the ground; "staging" is the parking of the chassis and container as a single unit. "Flipping" is the removal of a container from a chassis and substituting another chassis; "bundling" is the stacking of chassis on top of each other for the purpose of transporting them elsewhere or simply to conserve space; "unbundling" is the removal of the stacked chassis as they are needed. The record shows that all the work, when performed in the marine yard, was typically performed by members of Respondents with whatever available equipment could get the job done. Similar work outside the marine yard has typically been performed by members of the Teamsters with whatever available equipment was necesary to perform the work. Moreover, it is crystal clear that the flipping, bundling, and unbundling of chassis at Pelican Pond is work incident to the transportation of containers. This is true simply because it is necessary to have chassis available to move the containers, and sometimes the containers need to be flipped from one chassis to another in the event that a particular chassis, for various reasons, may not be appropriate.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

Respondent Local 13 fully participated in the aforementioned 10(k) proceeding and is bound by the award notwithstanding it was not the charged party therein. National Assn. of Broadcast Employees (NABET), 230 NLRB 75 (1977). In the instant matter, the record shows that the position of both Respondents are identical. Moreover, they must necessarily work together at Sea-Land's marine yard, Local 13 members performing longshoremen's work and Local 63 members performing the related clerks work in connection therewith. Therefore, I find that Local 63 is properly a party here, and is also bound by the aforementioned award. See Detroit Building Trades Council (Chatham Supermarkets), 259 NLRB 970 (1982).

It is clear, and I find, that Lomelli specifically threatened Borg with a work stoppage if the Teamsters were using the top handler to perform work at the Pelican Pond. The fact that Lomelli singled out the top handler does not diminish the clear record evidence that Respondent's threat was calculated to secure the work awarded to the Teamsters, as the top handler is merely a piece of equipment that was substituted for forklifts, to perform the identical work the Board determined properly belonged to the Teamsters.

Respondents contend that the time-in-lieu claims are not violative of the 10(k) award. In National Assn. of Broadcast Employees, 255 NLRB 372 (1981), the Board stated at 374:

> [W]hen, as here, a respondent pursues its legal remedies for an arguably meritorious claim under a properly negotiated collective-bargaining agreement and the record fails to disclose extrinsic evidence of threats, restraint, or coercion of the employer, we are unable to conclude that it has done more than its status as employee representative authorizes.

In the instant case, however, Respondents' time-in-lieu claims cannot be viewed in isolation, but must be perceived as related to the Lomelli's threat, thus providing extrinsic evidence of the Respondents' unlawful intent in filing the time-in-lieu claims.

Further, contrary to the cases cited by Respondents, the instant factual situation is not one that may be characterized on "work preservation." In dismissing a 10(k) notice of hearing because the controversy legitimately involved work preservation rather than a jurisdictional dispute, the Board stated in Seattle Building & Trades Council (Seattle Olympic Hotel), 204 NLRB 1126, 1127 (1973), cited by Respondent:

> Before the Board may proceed to a determination of dispute under Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act has been violated. On the record before us, we are not satisfied that any such violation has occurred in this case.
> The present dispute is in significant respects similar to those cases in which the Board has found that a union was attempting to protect and preserve work which had traditionally been performed by its members and that such disputes are not the type of controversy Congress intended the Board to resolve pursuant to Section 8(b)(4)(D) and Section 10(k) of the Act. Further, the record herein fails to establish competing claims between classes of employees or any dispute over the assignment of particular work. Our conclusion is that Respondent picketed for a lawful objective, i.e., to regain work for four employee craftsmen who were members of the crafts which had traditionally performed the work for Olympic for many years along with Olympic's maintenance staff. Accordingly, we find that no jurisdictional dispute exists and we shall therefore quash the notice of hearing.

In the instant case the work that Respondents allegedly are attempting to "preserve" is the very work, and work incidental thereto as found which has been determined by the Board to belong to the Teamsters, following a threat by the Teamsters, as noted by the Board's decision, in the event the work was given to Respondents. Such work, outside the marine yard, has never been performed by Respondents' members but has always been performed by members of the Teamsters at various locations, even prior to Sea-Land's acquisition of Pelican Pond. The competing claims and disputes by the two labor organizations over the assignment of the work are crystal clear. Thus, I find Respondents' work-preservation claim to be without merit, as the dispute is singularly jurisdictional in nature.

On the basis of the foregoing, I find that the Respondents have failed to comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute, and by threats and the filing of time-in-lieu claims, have violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act, as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 13 and International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 63 are Labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division) is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act by failing and refusing to honor and comply with the Board's Decision and Determination of Dispute reported in 258 NLRB 412 by threatening a work stoppage to force or require Sea-Land Service Inc. (Pacific Division), and/or Container Stevedoring Company, to assign particular work to its members, and by filing "time-in-lieu" claims for work performed by members of the Teamsters, with an object of forcing or requiring Sea-Land Service, Inc. (Pacific Division), and/or Container Stevedoring Company, to assign the work described below to employees represented by Respondents rather than to employees represented by the Teamsters.

The work consists of:

> The transportation and grounding of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, the return of such containers to the container yard, and work incident thereto, the temporary staging of containers outside the container yard, and the work incident thereto, and the return of such containers to the container yard, and the work incident thereto, at the Long Beach, California facility of Sea-Land Services, Inc. (Pacific Division), and at the nearby Pelican Pond area.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent have engaged in unfair labor practices proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D) of the Act, I shall recommend that they cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

American Pacific Concrete Pipe Company, Inc. and General Truck Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Union 467, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO.[1] Case 31–CA–10098

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On February 22, 1985, Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and both parties filed answering briefs.[2]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions,[4] to modify the remedy,[5] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that although the Respondent paid Donald Roland $20,000 to settle his backpay claim, Roland is entitled to additional backpay because the General Counsel did not approve the settlement agreement. The Respondent argues that the settlement was an accord and satisfaction barring litigation on Roland's backpay issue. We agree with the Respondent.

On November 23, 1983, a month before the present backpay specification proceedings began, Roland, the Respondent, and the Union signed an agreement waiving Roland's backpay claim against the Respondent in return for $20,000 from the Respondent. The judge expressly found in footnote 14 of his decision that the circumstances surrounding the backpay waiver were not coercive and Roland freely entered into the settlement. The General Counsel, who was apparently unaware that Roland had relinquished his backpay claim, subsequently refused to approve the settlement agreement.

In rejecting the Respondent's accord-and-satisfaction defense, the judge relied on Michael M. Schaefer, 261 NLRB 272 (1982), enfd. 697 F.2d 558 (3d Cir. 1983), which held that backpay is a public, not a private right, which only the Board or the Regional Director may settle.[6] In Independent Stave Co., 287 NLRB 740 (1987), however, we recently held that in evaluating non-Board settlements the Board would examine all the surrounding circumstances including whether the charging party, the respondent, and the discriminatee had agreed to be bound, and the General Counsel's position regarding the settlement; whether the settlement was reasonable in light of the alleged violation, the risks of litigating the issue, and the stage of litigation; whether fraud, coercion, or duress were present; and whether the respondent has a history of violations or has breached previous settlement agreements.

At the outset, we recognize that the Independent Stave settlement occurred shortly after the complaint issued and before adjudication of the issues, and that the present case arose after Roland's dis-

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[4] We agree with the judge that it is impossible to reconstruct Robert Craig's interim earnings because of his testimonial inconsistencies, the commingling of his personal and business affairs, and the lack of sufficient credible evidence to establish or even reasonably approximate income received during the interim periods. The judge concluded that Craig received substantial income that the record does not address. In addition, the record shows that Craig received interim income in the form of cash payments, the amount of which we are unable to determine with certainty.

We agree with the judge's treatment of Boothby's supplementary income, including the vacations Boothby took that the judge failed to mention in his decision. We find NLRB v. Mercy Peninsula Ambulance Service, 589 F.2d 1014 (9th Cir. 1979), on which the Respondent relies, distinguishable. Boothby's backpay period extended almost 39 months. He was employed in various jobs for 20 months during the period. In addition to Boothby's 59 specific attempts to find work, the judge credited Boothby's statement that the compliance forms did not reflect all the employers he contacted. We agree with the judge's finding that Boothby's search easily meets the Board's due-diligence standards and that the Respondent did not establish that he failed to mitigate his losses.

Moreover, in Mercy, the court relied on several factors to deny enforcement of the Board's backpay order, including the claimant's statement that he could have obtained employment after his discharge but chose not to do so. The court was unimpressed with "the quantity and the quality of (the claimant's) efforts and the fact that they were executed with such disinterest." Mercy, supra at 1019 fn. 6. Unlike the Mercy claimant, who had no interim employment, Boothby was employed for over half his backpay period, and there is no evidence that his attempts to find work were disinterested or insincere.

[5] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[6] In enforcing the Board's Order in Schaefer, the court held only that, under the facts of that case, the Board did not abuse its discretion in refusing to defer to two private settlement agreements. The court acknowledged that the Board and court authority exists approving "private settlement agreements negotiated in good faith involving mutual concessions and benefits." 697 F.2d at 561.

The judge observed that in Stevens Ford, 271 NLRB 628, 632 (1984), an administrative law judge, with Board approval, cited Schaefer. The factors in Stevens Ford, however, reveal that no private settlement agreement was ever negotiated. 271 NLRB at 630, 632. Therefore, reliance on the Schaefer doctrine was unnecessary to support the result the Board reached.

charge had been fully adjudicated and found to be an unfair labor practice. Although liability is established and the only issue now before us is the backpay amount due Roland, backpay litigation also entails risks and uncertainties that must be considered in evaluating the appropriateness of accepting a settlement agreement in lieu of pursuing further litigation. For example, a backpay claim cannot be perfected if it is shown that the discriminatee failed to mitigate losses, or the discriminatee's testimony about his interim employment is discredited. Further, issues regarding the validity of reinstatement offers or the discriminatee's fitness for re-employment can be and often are resolved against discriminatees in backpay litigation. Even if the discriminatee prevails at every step of the process, and in every particular of his backpay claim, he often must wait years to receive any backpay. If, in the interim, the employer's business has declined, the discriminatee may receive less than he won through litigation. These hazards are present to varying extents in all backpay litigation.

Here, the General Counsel contended that the Respondent owed Roland $41,502, but the Respondent countered that it owed him nothing because he allegedly failed to diligently seek interim employment and misrepresented his interim earnings. The record does not disclose precisely why Roland agreed to settle for $20,000, but the credited testimony of Union Business Agent Norman Holman establishes that in the settlement discussions, inter alia, the Respondent asserted that the interim employment list Roland submitted to the unemployment office was inconsistent with the list Roland submitted to the General Counsel; Roland ascertained that the judge's decision was subject to appeal by the Respondent; and Holman asserted, in response to a question from Roland, that the Repondent had lost money in 1983. Consequently, when Roland agreed to accept about half the backpay the Respondent owed him in theory, he was aware that the Respondent was prepared to challenge his evidence, the outcome before the judge was not necessarily final, and the Respondent's financial condition could make a future award problematic. Thus, Roland was informed of the full range of possibilities that could result from further litigation of his backpay claim. On the one hand, he knew that the General Counsel claimed that he was owed $41,602 and, on the other hand, he knew of the potential risks posed by the Respondent to actually obtaining a full backpay award.

We conclude that the settlement agreement meets the standard set forth in Independent Stave. First, the Charging Party, the Respondent, and the discriminatee have agreed to be bound. Further, the parties most directly interested in assuring that Roland's rights be vindicated—Roland and his Union—voluntarily agreed to release Roland's backpay claim in exchange for $20,000.[7] Second, the parties executed the settlement agreement about a month before the backpay hearing began, and the settlement was reasonable considering the uncertainties inherent in litigation. Third, the judge expressly found that there was no coercion exerted in obtaining Roland's backpay waiver. Finally, there are no additional circumstances that might lead us to question the settlement, such as alleged history of violations or breaching of prior settlement agreements. Under all the circumstances, we conclude that honoring the parties' agreement advances the Act's purpose of encouraging dispute resolution and that, conversely, no overriding public-policy interest would be served by addressing the backpay issue's merits. We overrule such cases as Michael M. Schaefer, supra, and Stevens Ford, supra, to the extent they are inconsistent with this ruling.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, American Pacific Concrete Pipe Company, Inc., Los Angeles, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete the following from the second paragraph.

"Donald Roland $20,375.97"

2. Substitute the following for the third paragraph.

"IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the backpay specification as to Robert Craig and Donald Roland is dismissed."

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring.

I concur in the result.

[7] The General Counsel's position is that because the settlement amount was less than the backpay specification, the Board must refuse to honor the parties' settlement agreement in order to fulfill the Board's public obligation. The amount of recovery, however, is only one of many factors to be considered in determining whether to honor the parties' private agreement.

Rachel D. Young, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Carlos Bea and Robert W. Richardson, Esqs., of San Francisco, California, for the Respondent.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

CLIFFORD H. ANDERSON, Administrative Law Judge. On July 23, 1982, the Board issued its Decision and Order in the above-captioned case.[1] The Board's Decision and Order was enforced by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit on April 28, 1983.[2] The Decision and Order provided, inter alia:

> 3. All employees who may have suffered any loss of pay and benefits beginning on April 1, 1980, shall receive backpay, with interest and benefits, in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Company, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corporation, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). [Footnote omitted.] Because the record is not clear with respect to the particular employees who were recalled or rehired, or when they were recalled or rehired, we will defer such a determination to the compliance stage of the proceeding.
> 4. All employees who may have been required to pay dues, fees, and moneys pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement with United Brick and Clay Workers, Local No. 820, shall be reimbursed, with interest, by Respondent.

A dispute having arisen, inter alia, over the amount of backpay due certain individuals under the Order's provision "number 3," supra, and the amount of money due certain individuals in recompense for dues paid under the Order's provision "number 4," supra, on September 23, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing, which was subsequently amended both at the hearing and after its close.[3] Respondent filed a timely answer, which answer was also amended at the hearing. The matter was heard by me in Los Angeles, California, on various dates in December 1983 and January, February, June, and October 1984.[4]

On the entire record, including posthearing briefs submitted by the General Counsel and Respondent, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. DUES REIMBURSEMENT

The amounts of dues reimbursement alleged in the backpay specification as amended are essentially admitted by Respondent. Based on the stipulations of the parties, I make the following findings regarding amounts of money due the listed individuals, without interest:

William Martin[5]	$368.38
Robert Bornemann	428.26
Bobby Record	368.38
Ezell Record	378.28
Selvie Cole	15.00
Dennis Lilly	90.00
Robert Delgado	130.00
Jess Fernandez	80.00

II. BACKPAY

A. Gross Backpay Determination

There were three backpay claimants at issue: Charles Boothby Jr., Robert E. Craig, and Donald E. Roland. There was no dispute that their backpay period commenced on April 1, 1980, and extended through June 18, 1983. The General Counsel established, and Respondent does not dispute, the propriety of the backpay specification's backpay formula and the application of that formula to the three individuals involved here to produce gross backpay calculated on a quarterly basis. Accordingly, the gross backpay calculations as alleged in the backpay specification, as amended, are found to be correct.

B. Deductions from Gross Backpay

The parties closely litigated a variety of issues concerning each of the backpay claimants.[6] The complexity of the legal and factual arguments as well as the differing situations and circumstances of the claimants make it appropriate to discuss the contentions regarding each claimant separately.

1. Charles Boothby Jr.

a. Argument and evidence

Respondent challenges the General Counsel's backpay claim for Charles Boothby on several grounds. Initially Respondent asserts Boothby failed to mitigate his damages by actively seeking employment. Respondent further contends that Boothby's income during the backpay period as a housekeeper and as a beekeeper and as a member of the United States Air Force Reserve should be offset against any backpay due. Respondent argues that the failure to report such income in the proper manner requires that Boothby be penalized by denying him additional moneys otherwise due. Finally, Respond-

[4] Unfortunately the trial was posponed on several occasions because of the unavailability of relevant documentary evidence and the emergency unavailability of necessary witnesses.

[5] The parties stipulated the amount due and owing William Martin, with the following disagreement. The General Counsel contended that the noted sum alleged in the backpay specification is correct. Respondent argued that the General Counsel's amount was $10 too high because of an arithmetic error. There is no evident arithmetic error in the backpay specification regarding Martin. Inasmuch as Bobby Record's period of employment was identical to Martin, who was stipulated to be entitled to $368.38, I conclude that the larger amount is correct.

[6] In addition to the disputed amounts discussed, infra, the parties did not dispute the existence of certain interim earnings and expenses. Where not separately discussed, the earnings and expenses used here were admitted, stipulated, or supported by unchallenged, credible evidence.

ent raises a variety of additional defenses as will be discussed infra.

Concerning Respondent's claim that Boothby failed to mitigate his damages, Respondent argues that Boothby did not actively seek employment during the period. Boothby testified that he sought work from various employers during the backpay period, which efforts were at least in part reflected on the Regional Office compliance forms he prepared pursuant to the instructions of the Regional compliance officer. Respondent adduced evidence from certain agents of the employers that Boothby testified he contracted his employment search. In some cases, Respondent established that particular employers maintained a policy requiring all job seekers to file written applications but that no Boothby application could be found in the files. Concerning the Riverside Transit Agency, an employer Boothby asserted he contacted regarding employment, Respondent adduced evidence that at the relevant time Riverside Transit had a position available and that its practice was to list all job applicants on a log, which log contained no entry of Boothby's having ever applied for the position. Respondent further adduced evidence that with respect to at least one job application submitted by Boothby to Riverside Community Hospital, Boothby indicated he would not accept night or weekend work.

In rebuttal, Boothby testified that in his employment search he did not in each case submit an application or physically visit the employer's premises. Thus, for example, with respect to Riverside Transit, Boothby testified he had a telephone conversation with an employer's agent in which he identified himself as a job seeker with truckdriving experience and was told that he need not apply for the available position because busdriving was required.

Boothby received income through the backpay period associated with his activities as a beekeeper from the sale of beekeeping equipment, honey, the lease of bees, and receipt of pollination fees. The General Counsel contends that these revenues were supplementary income resulting from a longstanding hobby that had been maintained before the commencement of the backpay period, including the period of Boothby's employment with Respondent. Thus, the General Counsel alleges the income should not be considered as an offset to Respondent's backpay liability. Respondent contends first that the income should be deducted from any backpay obligation and, second, that Boothby's failure to disclose this income should be a factor in evaluating his credibility and should result in a penality being assessed for the wrongful withholding of such information. The General Counsel rejoins that the beekeeper income was not concealed but rather was not deemed by the General Counsel to be an offset to backpay.

Respondent argues that Boothby's annual 2-week active tour-of-duty with the United States Air Force Reserve constitutes a withdrawal from the job market for the period served. Respondent makes a similar argument with respect to a 2-week vacation undertaken by Boothby in August 1980. The General Counsel contends that service with the United States Air Force Reserve, even if not mandatory in the sense that application could be made for alternative means of serving, was undertaken during Boothby's employment with Respondent and hence could properly be continued during the backpay period without penalty to backpay recovery.

Further Respondent contends that the fact that Boothby sought medical care during what would have been working days if he was employed by Respondent removed him from being available to work on those days, thus justifying a proportional reduction in backpay. So too, Respondent contends that the backpay specification wrongfully includes health maintenance organization medical insurance premiums for the first two quarters of 1983 because Boothby's interim employers during that time maintained their own medical plans.

b. Analysis and conclusions

(1) Boothby's search for employment

It has long been clear that an employer may mitigate its backpay liability by establishing that the backpay claimant "will fully incurred" losses by a "clearly unjustifiable refusal to take desirable new employment." Phelps Dodge v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 199–200 (1941). To establish such mitigation the employer's burden is to show that the individual "neglected to make reasonable efforts to find interim work." NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 360 F.2d 569, 575–576 (5th Cir. 1966). Success is not the measure of sufficiency of the discriminatee's search for interim employment; the law "only requires honest good faith effort." NLRB v. Cashman Auto Co., 223 F.2d 832, 836 (1st Cir. 1955). "While the evidence may leave a question whether [the backpay claimant] could have been more diligent in seeking other employment, the highest standard of diligence is not required and doubts must be resolved against Respondent." Otis Hospital, 240 NLRB 173, 174 (1979).

In determining if the backpay claimant made a reasonable search for employment, the entire record must be considered in the context of the claimant's search over the entire backpay period. Highview, Inc., 250 NLRB 549 (1980); Saginaw Aggregates, 198 NLRB 598 (1972); Nickey Chevrolet Sales, 195 NLRB 395, 398 (1972). Uncertainty in the evidence is to be resolved against the wrongdoer. NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., supra.

Boothby's testimony with respect to his job search was credible and not effectively challenged by Respondent's evidence. Respondent contended that Boothby's outside income and his domestic circumstances should justify an inference of lack of motivation and diligence in seeking work. The Board has explicitly rejected such an argument in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp., 180 NLRB 142, 148 (1969). Respondent further argues that its unchallenged evidence that in some cases Boothby did not actually receive or submit completed job applications to employers and, on at least one occasion, limited his job search to positions requiring work only during normal business hours and weekdays, impugns his credibility, and reveals a less-than-efficient job search.

I find Boothby's testimony consistent with Respondent's evidence for Boothby did not testify that he in each case left an employment application. Rather he testified that he inquired of employers regarding availability of work and, when satisfied that no reasonable employment opportunity existed, he pursued the matter no further. Respondent's attempt to impeach Boothby here accordingly fails. (See, e.g., Inland Empire Meat Co., 255 NLRB 1306 (1981); Neely's Car Clinic, 255 NLRB 1420 (1981).)

With repect to Boothby's job application on which he limited his employment availability to business hours and days, the record does not reflect that Boothby placed such a limitation on any other job application nor does it suggest that work would have been available had he not done so. Further even had Boothby placed such a limitation on each job application, it was not unreasonable for Boothby to try to obtain employment on the same basis he had experienced with Respondent. Respondent, who bears the burden in this area, has failed to establish that Boothby behaved unreasonably or with sufficient lack of diligence so as to toll backpay.

Considering the entire backpay period as a whole, including the periods in which interim employment was obtained at a wage rate in excess of that received from Respondent, and further noting that Boothby could not recall all the individual employers whom he contacted, but rather limited his itemization to the employers reported to the Board on its compliance forms, I find that Boothby's search for employment during the period easily meets the Board's standards for due diligence and that Respondent's efforts to prove failure of mitigation have failed.[7]

(2) The issues of supplementary income

The beekeeper income Boothby received presents issues of fact rather then law. The parties do not disagree with respect to to the law regarding additional income. Supplementary income received while employed by Respondent and continued during the backpay period is not treated as interim earnings deductible from backpay. Cumberland Farms Dairy, 266 NLRB 855 (1983); Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156 (1980). Earnings from self-employment are however deductible from gross backpay. The issue then is whether the beekeeping revenues received by Boothby during the backpay period constituted a continuation of the supplementary income he had previously enjoyed or was rather and expansion of former supplementary income into part-time work of a type different from that undertaken during his employment with Respondent.

Considering the record testimony concerning the origin and amounts of the beekeeper moneys received by Boothby during the backpay period, I conclude that his beekeeping revenues did not constitute income of a kind different from that received during the period previous to the backpay period. Hence, I do not find that the revenues constitute an offset or diminution of Respondent's backpay obligation.[8] The revenues Boothby received derived from sales of honey, sales of equipment,[9] and the letting of bees for rent and other services. The supplying of these services did not occupy Boothby on a full-time basis nor would it have prevented him from accepting any employment offered. Disregarding the sales of equipment, which were in the nature of a divesture, the revenues received from Bootheby's beekeeping business during the backpay period, in the context of the record as a whole, convinces me that his beekeeper business remained supplementary and did not rise to the level of self-employment as argued by Respondent.

I also conclude that Boothby's active duty service in the United States Air Force Reserve during the backpay period does not rise to the level of a dereliction of his duty to search for employment or a withdrawal from the job market sufficient to reduce Respondent's liability. Nor would I find that the moneys received therefrom reduces Respondent's obligations. It is clear Boothby served his country during his employment with Respondent and that he continued to do so on an apparently unchanged basis during the backpay period. The fact that by request his duty time could have been avoided[10] is immaterial. Had Boothby continued in Respondent's employ he would not have varied his service pattern. Respondent's wrongful action in terminating him should not, under threat of diminution of backpay recovery, require him to abandon his regular course of conduct with respect to military service. Accordingly, I find Boothby's military service during the backpay period does not reduce Respondent's backpay claim in any way. I reach the same conclusion, given the paucity of evidence on the issue and the burden Respondent bears, on the issue of Boothby's August 1980 2-week vacation.

(3) Medical issues

With respect to the various days Boothby received medical treatment during the backpay period, I reject Respondent's argument that the mere fact that Boothby obtained such treatments during normal working hours would have precluded him from accepting work during those days, and thus should reduce backpay. The General Counsel argues, and I agree, that there is no record evidence that Boothby either would have been unable to work on particular days because of his ailments or that, had he been employed, he could not have obtained treatment during off-hours or in any other manner not inconsistent with continued employment. Accordingly, I shall not reduce Boothby's backpay claim as a result of his seeking medical treatments on various days during the backpay period.

[7] In reaching this decision, I have considered the additional arguments Respondent makes as discussed further, infra.

[8] With respect to beekeeper revenues received by Boothby, I accept the General Counsel's argument that Boothby's failure in some cases to report the bee income was not the result of a wrongful intention to withhold information that might reduce any ultimate backpay award, but was rather based on a conviction, shared by the General Counsel, that beekeeper revenues had been supplementary to his income during his employment with Respondent, remained supplementary during the backpay period, and hence did not affect Respondent's backpay obligation. Thus, I do not find the argued failure to report the income to be an adverse factor in evaluating Boothby's credibility or to justify any penalty of Boothby for withholding information relevant to the backpay specification.

[9] Boothby credibly testified that his need for revenue caused him to sell some of his beekeeping equipment.

[10] Apparently through the undertaking of correspondence studies or some other substitute for active service.

At relevant times Respondent maintained a health plan that provided, given certain deductibles, payment for covered medical services. Boothby during the backpay period maintained his own medical insurance through a health maintenance organization. Respondent does not contest recovery of policy premiums for the period when Boothby was not covered by an interim employer's health plan but argues that, because Boothby's employer in the first and second quarters of 1983 had a medical plan, Boothby need not have carried his own plan, thus obtaining double coverage, and hence Respondent should not be obligated for the premiums during that period. I reject Respondent's claim here. Continuity of health care coverage is a matter of concern to all. A backpay claimant need not self-insure or purchase individual health insurance coverage only for the period(s) of time during which he or she is unemployed and then be forced to drop such coverage during interim employments. Rather, a backpay claimant may, in my view, maintain equivalent health care coverage to that which the discharging employer provided and maintain that coverage through various interim employments even if interim employers offer health care packages of similar coverage. Not to allow such continuous coverage would be to require backpay claimants to change insurance coverage numerous times during the course of each year with the concommitant risk of supervening uninsurability through changes in health status. Assigning such an obligation and risk to a backpay claimant, given the loss of original health care coverage, which resulted from the discriminating employer's original termination, is unjust and unreasonable.

(4) Boothby's financial transactions and credibility

Considering the testimony of the backpay claimant in light of the arguments of Respondent, and relying on demeanor as well as the substantial and unchallenged testimony of Boothby as to the bulk of his activity, I find Boothby to be a credible witness who was not effectively impeached by Respondent's effort to show a failure of memory or suspicious circumstances regarding his bank accounts and other financial transactions during the backpay period. Having considered the record evidence of these varied transactions and Boothby's admitted confusion, mistakes, and omissions, I am convinced that such fallibilities were the product of a mind not attuned to financial detail as well as the result of the simple passage of time. On this record I reject Respondent's contention that Boothby was: (1) engaging in off-record transactions, or (2) attempting to withhold or conceal imterim earnings, or (3) transmitting interim earnings into other forms of revenues. Thus, in those situations where Boothby answered that he simply could not explain certain deposits to his bank account, I find no hidden agenda and insufficient evidence to find misconduct. During pretrial preparation by the General Counsel, Boothby recalled additional income that was included in the backpay specification on the opening day of trial. I find these events to have been caused by simple error or failure or recollection rather than willful withholding by Boothby. I reject Respondent's argument that the backpay claimant should be penalized in any way for that initial failure to disclose or for other inconsistencies in the record. In making this credibility resolution and associated findings of fact, I have considered that Boothby, in preparing loan applications, engaged in puffery in overstating his income from beekeeping. Given the record as a whole, and my evaluation of the demeanor of the witness, I do not find those statements undermine the credibility of Boothby's testimony at the hearing. See Pat Izzi Trucking Co., 162 NLRB 242 (1966).

(5) Summary

Having found Boothby to be a credible witness, and having rejected Respondent's arguments that the backpay specification as to Boothby should be reduced as discussed, supra, I sustain the General Counsel's amended backpay specification and shall recommend that Boothby be recompensed consistent therewith.

2. Donald E. Roland

a. Respondent's defense of accord and satisfaction

The General Counsel's amended backpay specification seeks $41,602.52 plus interest on behalf of Roland.[11] On November 23, 1983, approximately 1 month before the commencement of the hearing in this matter, Roland and Respondent, with the presence and participation of the Charging Party, General Truck Drivers, Warehouse and Helpers Union Local 467, although without the participation or apparent knowledge of counsel for the General Counsel, entered into an agreement by which Roland waived all of his claims against Respondent in this matter in exchange for a payment of $20,000. The written agreement was entered into and the moneys paid on that date. Roland has not attempted to return the money or rescind the settlement transaction. Respondent claims this settlement is an accord and satisfaction barring further proceeding on the Roland claim.[12] The General Counsel argues that becuase the General Counsel did not enter into or approve of his private settlement, it is without force to limit the General Counsel's claims here other than as an offset against moneys ultimately received by Roland.

The General Counsel cites the recent Board decision of Michael M. Schaefer, 261 NLRB 272 (1982), in which the Board approved the following statement of the administrative law judge at 273:

> It is well settled that an individual may not waive, bargain away, or compromise any backpay which might be due him (or her) since it is not a private [11] Interest charges, calculated pursuant to formulas referred to in the cited cases in the original decision in this matter, are not liquidated in a backpay proceeding. It may fairly be anticipated, however, that inclusion of interest in the claim as of 1985 would substantially increase the dollar amount sought.

[12] Independent of this matter and of no relevance save as background, Respondent brought suit against Roland based on the agreement and that litigation in turn became the subject of a Board unfair labor practice. Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued a decision in the matter on Jan. 31, 1985, which as of the issuance of this decision was susceptible to appeal. [See American Pacific Concrete Pipe, 292 NLRB No. 133 (Feb. 21, 1989).]

right which attaches to the discriminatee, but is, indeed a public right which only the Board or the Regional Director may settle.

This Board decision was enforced by the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, 697 F.2d 558 (1983). The Board's decision in Schaefer has been cited by an administrative law judge with Board approval as recently as July 31, 1984, in Stevens Ford, 271 NLRB 628.

Respondent citing Roadway Express v. NLRB, 647 F.2d 415 (4th Cir. 1981), argues that it is elementary law that a release and settlement, if otherwise valid, bars a backpay claim. Respondent acknowledged the holding of the Schaefer case in colloquy during the hearing and did not address its holding on brief. Rather, Respondent emphasizes the Board's recent evolution of the deferral doctrine case, i.e., Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), and its progeny, for the proposition that the agreement of the parties here should be deferred to and hence Roland's claim not further pursued. Respondent's argument is weakened by the language of the Third Circuit's decision enforcing Schaefer in which the court points out that, unlike deferral to an arbitratorial forum, Schaefer involved a simple settlement in liquidation of a disputed sum. Further, Respondent's arguments are weakened by the fact that both Schaefer and Stevens Ford, supra, are as recent or more recent than the Board's reinstitution of the deferral doctrine.[13] I conclude it is not necessarily certain that the Board would extend its deferral doctrine to private settlements in liquidation of disputed monetary amounts during backpay proceedings. More importantly, however, no Board case since Schaefer purports to specifically overrule Schaefer's holding or to modify its terms. Accordingly, and irrespective of any opinions I may or may not have regarding what the Board may do in futuro to the Schaefer doctrine, I am bound to follow Schaefer unless and until it is overruled by the Board or the United States Supreme Court. Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1963). Accordingly, I decline to accept the agreement between Roland and Respondent as a limitation on the General Counsel's backpay specification regarding Roland save as an offset regarding moneys received by Roland.[14]

[13] A very recent case Texaco, Inc., 273 NLRB 1335 (1985), seems to lend support to Respondent's arguments regarding the evolution of the Board's deferral doctrine. In that case, the Board, reversing an administrative law judge, held that a strike settlement agreement, which contained provisions that the union withdraw an underlying unfair labor practice charge, should be accepted despite the contrary view of the Regional Director acting on behalf of the General Counsel in his interpretation of his public rights. See also Alpha Beta Co., 273 NLRB 1546 (1985).

[14] To avoid a remand, should reviewing authority differ with respect to this holding, I make the following alternative credibility resolutions with respect to the meeting between Roland, Respondent's agent, and the Charging Party's agent. I credit the testimony of Norman Holman, president business agent, and chief executive of the Charging Party, where his testimony differs from Roland and Robert Musser, Respondent's agent. Further, I find that the circumstances of the meeting were noncoercive and that, were the Schaefer doctrine not a bar, I would find the settlement agreement entered into by the parties was a freely entered into settlement that would prevent any further proceedings against Respondent concerning Roland's backpay.

b. Roland's search for employment

The backpay specification alleges that Roland found various jobs at least partially mitigating Respondent's backpay obligation through the third quarter of 1981 but that from the fourth quarter of 1981 through the second quarter of 1983[15] Roland was unable to find employment. Respondent attacks Roland's assertions that he made good-faith efforts to seek employment during the backpay period. Respondent's argument is based at least in part on a comparison of Roland's reports of his employment search to the State of California with his reports of employment search to the NLRB for the last quarter of 1982 and the first two quarters of 1983.

The Rolands testified that at the end of every 2-week period, Roland, with the assistance of Mrs. Roland, would fill out the State of California forms, which provided space for listing employers who were contacted during efforts to find employment.[16] The Rolands did not retain copies of the reports submitted to the State. The NLRB compliance form prepared by the Rolands as filled out much later. For example, the NLRB report on the last quarter of 1982 was completed by the Rolands in May 1983, as was the report for the first quarter of 1983; the report for the second quarter of 1983 was completed in July 1983.[17]

Respondent notes correctly that a comparison of the entries between the two forms on a day-by-day basis produces essentially complete disparity between the listings of employers contacted on given dates.[18] Further, each form identifies job searches as occurring on Saturdays or Sundays. Yet Roland testified at the hearing that he did not seek work on Saturdays or Sundays—most truck-driver employers being closed. Thus, these entries were clearly in error. Further Respondent submitted affidavits from certain of the companies that Roland reported contacting in his employment search in 1983,[19] which affidavits said variously that no job applications had been received from Roland in calendar 1983.

The General Counsel adduced testimony from at least two trucking concerns that Roland had in fact submitted applications to them consistent with his representations on his employment search reporting forms. Further, Roland testified credibly and in significant detail concerning the physical description of the employers' premises where he sought employment and described in detail

[15] With the exception noted and discussed infra.

[16] The documents in evidence make it clear that the information to be reported on the forms changed at least twice in the last quarter of 1982 and the first two quarters of 1983. Thus, certain forms provided the applicant an opportunity to indicate whether he left a job application, other forms did not provide space for making such entries; some forms asked the employment applicant to put down the names of specific individuals contacted during the job search, others did not.

[17] Respondent argues, relying in part on portions of Roland's testimony, that the NLRB compliance forms were filled out on a day-to-day basis. A close examination of the testimony of the Rolands convinces me this is incorrect. To the extent Roland testified in that manner, he was simply confused.

[18] There is much greater overlap when week-by-week comparisons are made and increasing correspondence the greater the time period compared.

[19] The General Counsel stipulated these affidavits would be receivable as substantive evidence.

the persons with whom he spoke and the conversations engaged in.

I have carefully considered the arguments of Respondent with respect to Roland's job search. Initially, I do not find the variation, which is often substantial, but in many cases is simply a matter of a day or two difference in the reported visiting dates of particular employers between the state and Board forms, to be of conclusive significance in evaluating the credibility of Roland. Roland testified that he did not in every case list the employers that he visited on each form and, further, that the Board forms were prepared from memory and at a time significantly after the state reporting forms.

Regarding the evidence from employers that Roland claimed he had contacted, (1) that the employers generally had the practice of accepting written job applications even if no employment was then available and (2) that Roland had not submitted an application in calendar 1983, this apparent contradiction is largely explained on examination of the record as a whole. Roland testified, for example, in the case of Kelly Moore Paints, that he had in calendar 1982 submitted an application to the employer and on subsequent visits did not submit an additional application but merely made sure the original was on file. Kelly Moore's agent's affidavit indicates that Roland did not physically submit an application in 1983. This is not inconsistent with Roland's testimony and Roland's testimony is corroborated by his job search report to the state on which he indicates he physically left an application with Kelly Moore on October 4, 1982.

The Board and the state reports do not indicate if applications were left at employers before September 1983. Thus, there is no way to ascertain whether Roland submitted job applications to other employers before that time and, like Kelly Moore, subsequently failed to submit a new application because of the existence of the prior application. The job reports indicated that Roland visited Sunshine Foods in November 1982, Ryder Rentals in September and October 1982, Dupont in December 1982, and Brockway Glass in December 1982. Regarding each of these employers, the affifavits submitted by Respondent merely assert that no application was physically submitted in 1983. This is not in contradiction with Roland's testimony or Roland's reports to the state.

Further Roland testified, and his reports to the State in some cases confirm this fact, although the state reports are not sufficiently complete as to be conclusive in other cases, that in his job search he would often contact the receptionist or other employees on the premises of an employer and. on learning that jobs were not currently available or foreseeable, would not submit a written application. Roland's reports to the state indicate that in the great majority of job search visits he did not submit written applications. Mrs. Roland corroborated the testimony of her husband with respect to his job search. Given all the above, and considering the record as a whole, I conclude that Roland's job searches were as reported and Respondent's effort to impeach or discredit Roland with respect to his efforts to find employment did not succeed.

c. Roland's credibility and unreported income

Respondent argues strenuously that the Rolands are in essence engaging in a scheme to defraud the Board and Respondent by falsifying their evidence in an effort to improperly increase any recovery in this matter. Respondent points to evidence that the Rolands have a habit of avoiding obligations, i.e., Roland's suggestion during settlement negotiations to Respondent that the $20,000 settlement check should be broken into smaller units to avoid certain banking law reporting requirements, and Mrs. Roland's admission that on one occasion she arranged for her employer to issue checks to her husband for her wages to conceal income properly paid to her that might be inconsistent with an insurance disability claim. Further, Respondent attacks the late admission of Roland that he had additional previously unreported income in the second quarter of 1983. Respondent also placed in evidence two checks to Roland from a West Valley Trucking Company dated May 1980 for $277.09 and $39.46, respectively, which were not explained by Roland. Further, Respondent points out that in completing certain forms such as an account card with the Chino Bank and in a job application to Guily Transportation, Roland asserted that he was working for an employer during periods of time for which Roland at the hearing claimed no employment.

I have considered these admitted misstatements by Roland and the remaining arguments with respect to the Rolands in evaluating their credibility. I have also considered the documentary evidence submitted by Respondent. I have determined the West Valley Trucking checks were not sufficiently explained by the General Counsel and therefore should be regarded as interim earnings and an offset to gross backpay in the appropriate quarter. Further I find that the unreported earnings estimated by Roland in the second quarter of 1980 to be "around $4,000.00" should also be an offset to gross backpay for the appropriate quarter. Based on my evaluation of the witnesses' demeanor and the record as a whole, I do not find that the West Valley Trucking income should be regarded as income that was concealed or intentionally withheld to penalize Roland beyond its deductions from gross backpay.[20] Because Roland's income in the second quarter of 1983 now exceeds gross backpay, it is unnecessary to determine if a penalty should be assessed against him in that quarter. I conclude that no greater penalty could be assessed this record. I further find that no other interim employment or earnings have been established by Respondent and the backpay specification sums, as modified, are sustained.

d. Summary

In summary I have found that over the entire backpay period, during which Roland found a variety of employment, Roland made a good-faith effort to seek employment. In reaching this conclusion I found the evidence adduced by Respondent was largely explained by Roland or is otherwise not inconsistent with his testimony. Further, as noted previously, the Board regards testimony of the type submitted by Respondent here to be of relatively little value in challenging otherwise credible testimony regarding employment search. Neely's Car Clinic, 255 NLRB 1420 (1981). Accordingly, with the adjustments to backpay noted above, I sustain the General Counsel's backpay specification with respect to good-faith search for interim employment. I also rejected Respondent's argument that the Rolands generally concealed earnings and should be penalized as a consequence. I found, however, that additional earnings, as noted above, should be counted against gross backpay.

[20] I am simply convinced that the West Valley Trucking income was simply forgotten by Roland. There is insufficient evidence in the record concerning these two checks to conclude otherwise.

3. Robert Craig

a. Argument and evidence

At all relevant times Robert Craig was self-employed, initially working as an employee of a wholly owned corporation, Gunite Development, from November 1979 to May 31, 1983, from June 1–18, 1983, for R. Craig Trucking, a sole proprietorship. Craig reported on his Board disclosure forms and testified at the hearing to certain amounts he received as "wages" during the period. The General Counsel argues that amounts constitute interim earnings that should be deducted from gross backpay due to Craig but that no other sums should be so deducted.

Respondent argues initially that because Craig sought no work other than self-employment during the period, he should be barred from receiving any backpay at all. Second, Respondent argues that the sums identified by Craig as interim earnings are not accurate and, rather, Craig manipulated his business enterprises in such a way as to conceal earnings, prevent investigation and determination of actual amounts earned, and mislabeled expenditures as business expenses and other costs when they were in fact properly attributed to Craig as interim earnings.

Substantial and detailed evidence was adduced by Respondent by examination of Craig regarding many of his business transactions during the period. This evidence showed that Craig maintained less than rigorous or complete business records. Further, Respondent's examination revealed (1) that there was a substantial and ongoing commingling of corporate and other business transactions with the Craigs' personal finances, (2) that income statements and profit-and-loss statements were submitted to lending institutions that were at great variance from his oral testimony regarding his and his business entities' financial status during the backpay period, (3) that records offered into evidence did not allow clear identification of the nature and extent of certain transactions, and (4) that it was impossible to recreate the financial status of either Craig or his enterprises from the record evidence. Craig testified that his business efforts were financially unsuccessful and that he filed for personal bankruptcy under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act in mid-1983, but that the bankruptcy action was later voluntarily dismissed on his own motion.

b. Analysis and conclusions

As the General Counsel argues on brief, the Board and the courts have accepted self-employment as a proper way for a backpay claimant to attempt to mitigate his wage loss. These cases hold that self-employment should be treated like any other interim employment in evaluating backpay issues. Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156 (1980); Heinrich Motors v. NLRB, 403 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1968). Accordingly, I reject Respondent's initial argument that simply because Craig did not seek other than self-employment he should be denied backpay. Rather, I shall consider Craig's self-employment and his employment by his wholly owned corporation to determine the amount and extent of interim earnings under normal Board standards.

The issue of interim earnings concerning Craig evolved into an issue of accounting and recordkeeping. The General Counsel characterizes the evidence with respect to Craig's maintenance of business records on brief as follows:

> The record indicates some expenses, other than strictly business expenses, were paid out of the income of Gunite Development of R. Craig Trucking. Craig testified that he had obtained several loans, at times using his home as collateral to finance Gunite or used his personal funds to keep Gunite operating, so he treated payment of nonbusiness expenses by Gunite as a way of recouping the funds that he had put into Gunite. Gunite paid the expense on vehicles and credit cards of Robert Craig's son Rick (who also drove for Gunite) in lieu of wages, because Gunite could not afford to pay Rick wages due. Craig was admittedly unsophisticated and a novice at operating a business and therefore some errors in bookkeeping may have been made. But it is not clear that payment of such expenses was in exchange for services Craig performed for the business, in fact some of them were substitutes of wages going to someone else.

The determination of the amount of interim earning by a backpay claimant is relatively simple when the backpay claimant and the backpay period employer(s) involved are separate entities who maintain normal records of wages and salaries paid. When the backpay claimant and the employer are the same entity, as in the case of R. Craig Enterprises, or backpay claimant is an employee and sole owner of a closely held corporation, as in the case of Gunite, sometimes difficult questions of bookkeeping, tax, and accounting rules must be analyzed to determine the correct amounts to apply to interim earnings as opposed to other nonearning categories such as business expenses. So too, difficulties may be caused when recordkeeping is informal and tax and other regulatory reporting forms are not prepared and submitted. An example of the close item-by-item scrutiny of transactions as part of the calculation of interim earnings is found in Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156 (1980). In that case, specific expenses, indeed often individual receipts or disbursements on a check-by-check basis were examined, applicable Internal Revenue Service decisional law considered, and testimony of an accountant received. Ultimately a detailed decision issued deciding a myriad of self-employment interim earning issues.

In the instant case the General Counsel did not contest the bulk of the lengthy and detailed examination by Respondent of Craig's irregularities in accounting and in recording the various transactions of the corporation, the sole proprietorship, and his personal affairs. So too on brief, the General Counsel makes no attempt, as Respondent did in detail, to address the specifics of particular business transactions and their accounting effects on profit and loss. Rather, the General Counsel made a general broad-brush equitable argument on Craig's behalf. The argument is essentially that while uncertainty exists whether Craig had certain interim earnings that should be deducted from his backpay claim, all uncertainties should be resolved against Respondent, the original wrongdoer in this case. Further, while the General Counsel expressly avoided condoning the irregularites of Craig, she argued his conduct should not be condemned and that Respondent should not be allowed to escape its backpay liability because of Craig's conduct for that would in her judgment be a penalty not consistent with the Board's policy of remedial as opposed to punitive action. She argues:

> To find that Craig is not entitled to backpay would provide Respondent with a windfall which it does not deserve, as it is at least partially responsible for the predicament Craig found himself in and for his response to that predicament and it would not serve to deter future violations of the Act by this and other Respondents. For these reasons Craig should not be denied backpay based on the evidence elicited by Respondent.

It is clear that regarding interim earnings "the burden is upon the employer to furnish facts which would . . . mitigate the liability." NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447, 454 (8th Cir. 1963). It is also true that the finding of an unfair labor practice is presumptive proof that some backpay is owed a backpay claimant. NLRB v. Mastro Plastics Corp., 354 F.2d 170, 178 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied 384 U.S. 972 (1966).

Craig testified concerning the receipt of limited interim earnings. Respondent through a lengthy examination of Craig and by the submission of a variety of documents from Craig's businesses, established that Craig's unsubstantiated testimony regarding his interim earnings during the period could not be relied on standing alone. The record is clear and I find that the lengthy and detailed record of the accounting irregularities, reporting inconsistencies, and profit-and-loss statements prepared by Craig's accountant at Craig's direction, which indicates substantial earnings of the corporation, amply meets Respondent's burden of proof in refuting Craig's testimony concerning his interim earnings.

Respondent, having successfully impeached Craig through his business records, I find the burden of going forward shifted to the General Counsel to adduce other record evidence that could sustain the General Counsel's position that Craig's earnings were less than the amount of gross backpay.

Such a burden is not impossible to meet. What was required was to put into evidence records of the profit and loss of the commercial entities involved beyond the simple, discredited, oral testimony of Craig or to make efforts to rehabilitate Roland by making the transactions understandable and susceptible to supporting specific findings regarding earnings. In Kansas City Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156 (1980), the administrative law judge, with Board approval, stated at 1159:

> I have considered Respondent's argument that [the backpay claimant] should be denied all backpay, and reject it. The Board has long recognized the value of utilizing social security records and income tax records in determining interim income, and has found that "poor recordkeeping, uncertainty as to memory, and perhaps exaggeration" do not automatically disqualify an employee from receiving backpay. Patrick F. Izzi, d/b/a Pat Izzi Trucking Company, 162 NLRB 242, 245 (1966), enfd. F.2d 241 (1st Cir. 1968). Through the use of the social security records, the [backpay claimant's] income tax returns, and additional evidence adduced at the hearing, it is possible to arrive at a "reasonable approximation" of interim earnings, which is all that the Board and the Courts require.

Because the dispositive aspect of the litigation of the Craig portion of the backpay specification is that the General Counsel made no effort to provide evidence that, as in the above-quoted case, could be examined by the judge to determine the interim earnings of Craig with even a "reasonable approximation," it is immaterial whether the General Counsel simply abandoned Craig and chose not to put on tax returns or other credible evidence that would buttress the General Counsel's claim regarding Craig, or whether not the evidence simply did not exist.[21] The record evidence as it stands sustains Respondent's argument that it is impossible to determine what earnings of the business entities should be attributed to Craig as interim earnings during the backpay period. Indeed, it is impossible to ascertain from the record what the profit and loss of either entity was during relevant periods. Thus it is not simply a matter of resolving uncertainty, as the General Counsel would frame the argument, with such uncertainties being resolved against Respondent in favor of the backpay claimant. The records introduced into evidence make it clear that the testimony of Craig regarding interim earnings, unbuttressed by any documentation whatsoever, cannot be sustained. Examining the documentary evidence taken from Craig's records, as submitted by Respondent, it is clear that it is absolutely impossible, even giving Craig's testimony regarding those records, that benefits of the doubt in all situations, to establish the profitability of the corporation under any accounting system or what revenues should be counted as interim earnings in offset to the gross backpay found, supra. It is clear, however, and I find, that substantial income was received by Craig that was not addressed in any fashion by the General Counsel and that the confusion regarding specific amounts arises because of Craig and the General Counsel's failure to go foward after the initial impeachment of Craig by Respondent. This being so Craig must be assumed to have had interim earnings at least equal to gross backpay and hence no net recovery.

[21] An adverse inference is permissible under the circumstances that, since the General Counsel did not offer business records that would sustain Craig's position, such records would not have in fact supported him.

In summary I find that even though the burden of proof is explicitly on Respondent to all aspects of interim earnings of the backpay claimant, as Respondent had successfully proved that the uncorroborated testimony of Craig regarding interim earnings during the period may not be relied on. I further find that the General Counsel failed to adduce any evidence by which such interim earnings could be ultimately ascertained. That being so, I find that the record concerning Craig will not sustain a finding that his interim earnings can be ascertained with any certainty. This being so, and despite the burden on Respondent and the presumptions cited above, I conclude albeit with some reluctance,[22] that on the present record Craig is not eligible for any backpay whatsoever during the period.

Robert Delgado	130.00
Jess Fernandez	80.00
Charles Boothby	40,345.64
Donald Roland	20,375.97

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that backpay specification concerning Robert Craig be dismissed.

[26] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[27] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). The specification of earnings by calendar quarter as set forth, supra, shall be used for purposes of interest calculated. Interest calculations for Roland shall take account of the date on which he received the offsetting $20,000 discussed supra.

Energy Cooperative, Inc. and Julius Sako. Case 13–CA–19985

July 29, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On April 24, 1981, Administrative Law Judge Wallace H. Nations issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The alleged violations in this case are based on the Respondent's withholding from sick or disabled employees benefits under its sickness and accident (S & A) benefit plan during a lawful economic strike at the Respondent's East Chicago refinery.

Local 7–210 of the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union (the Union) for many years represented Arco-Sinclair employees, including those at the East Chicago refinery. The Respondent purchased the East Chicago refinery in 1976 and agreed to honor the then-existing contract. In 1979 the Respondent entered into a contract with the Union containing a reopener clause permitting the Union to strike after January 8, 1980,[1] if the parties failed to reach agreement.

On January 8, the Union commenced an economic strike. Immediately, the Respondent ceased paying S & A benefits to 11 employees who had been receiving benefits before the strike began.

On April 15, the Respondent and the Union settled the strike and executed a memorandum of agreement. According to the agreement's terms, all unit employees received increases in wages and benefits. Further, in consideration of certain benefits not paid as a result of the strike, the Respondent agreed to pay the company portion of the employees' health insurance premiums, which the employees had assumed during the strike. The memorandum of agreement also expressly provided that payment of the insurance premium was in full settlement of any pending or future grievance or NLRB charge related to benefits.[2]

The judge found that during the economic strike the Respondent withheld S & A benefits from the 11 employees based on the fact that the remaining work force engaged in strike activities in violation of the Act. The judge rejected the Respondent's contention that the strike settlement agreement required dismissal of the complaint. The judge, relying on the Board's decision in Emerson Electric Co.,[3] held that the settlement agreement did not affect the Board's power to prevent unfair labor practices or warrant the Board's abdication of its jurisdiction or its obligation to enforce public rights.

In its exceptions, the Respondent argues that the complaint should be dismissed based on the parties' settlement agreement. For the reasons set forth below, we agree.[4]

The Board held in Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 241, 243 (1987), that the withholding of contractual accident and sick benefits to disabled employees during a strike can be a violation of Section 8(a)(3).[5] The Board went on to note, however, that an employer may successfully defend against an allegation of discrimination or coercion in the denial of employee benefits by proving, inter alia, "that a collective-bargaining representative has clearly and unmistakably waived its employees' statutory right to be free of such discrimination or coercion."[6]

[1] All dates are in 1980 unless otherwise specified.

[2] The full text of the pertinent provisions of the memorandum of agreement is as follows:

6. It is agreed that in consideration of certain benefits not paid as a result of the strike for each employee represented by Local 7–210, OCAW, as of January 8, 1980, and continuing on the active payroll as of the termination of the strike, the Company shall pay any Company contribution to the Medical, Life and Accidental Death & Dismemberment Plan owed or paid by the employee during the strike. It is further agreed by the parties that such payment is in full settlement of any grievance, NLRB charges or action pending or in the future related to the handling of all benefits during the strike.

8. The parties agree that they will not file any legal or National Labor Relations Board actions as a result of this strike and that any such action filed or pending will be withdrawn and become null and void.

It is understood and agreed that the Acceptance of this Memorandum of Agreement constitutes a full, final and complete resolution of all outstanding issues existing between the parties and the contract reopen provision is hereby cancelled in its entirety; and that this Memorandum of Agreement amends the Labor Agreement between the parties signed January 19, 1979, accordingly.

[4] The Respondent also argues as a threshold matter that this case should be deferred to arbitration. Based on our finding below that the Union relinquished all pending and future claims with regard to the nonpayment of benefits during the strike, we find deferral to be inappropriate. We further find it unnecessary to address the Respondent's defense that the withholding of benefits was lawful under the collective-bargaining agreement.

[5] In Texaco the Board expressly overruled the Emerson Electric Co. theory of violation and held that whether an employer's witholding of accident and sick benefits to disabled employees during a strike violates Sec. 8(a)(3) will be resolved by application of the Great Dane test for alleged unlawful conduct. Texaco, 285 NLRB 241 citing NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1976).

[6] In Texaco, at 246, however, and Texaco, Inc., 287 NLRB 903 (1987), the issue of whether similar strike settlement agreements waived such statutory rights was not before us. Thus, in neither case was it contended that the agreements applied to the charges filed by individual employees.

In Texaco, the Board cited Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983), and Conoco, Inc. v. NLRB, 740 F.2d 811, 815 (10th Cir. 1984), for the proposition that an employee's statutorily protected right to receive such benefits free of discrimination can be waived.[7] In Metropolitan Edison, supra at 705, the Court noted that it "long has recognized that a union may waive a member's statutorily protected rights." In this regard, it stated:

> Such waivers are valid because they "rest on 'the premise of fair representation' and presuppose that the selection of the bargaining representative 'remains free,'" NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 322, 325, (1974) (quoting Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 280 (1956)); cf. NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. [388 U.S. 175], at 180–181. Waiver should not undermine these premises. Thus a union may bargain away its members' economic rights, but it may not surrender rights that impair the employees' choice of their bargaining representative. See NLRB v. Magnavox Co. [415 U.S. at 325].[8]

The Court went on to reject a union argument that although a union may waive collective rights it may not waive individual ones. It noted that in Ford Motor Co. v. Huffman, 345 U.S. 330 (1953), "the Court recognized that in securing the good of the entire bargaining unit, some differences in the treatment of individual union members might occur . . . ."[9] Waiver of an employee's statutorily protected right to receive benefits free of discrimination imposes no constraints on the employee's ability to choose a representative. It is directly analogous to a union's bargaining away its member's economic rights. Therefore, the right to receive contractual S & A benefits is clearly waivable by the Union subject to the duty of fair representation.

Assessing the clarity with which a statutory right must be waived, according to Metropolitan Edison, requires consideration of the circumstances of each case.[10] Thus, determining whether such a waiver has occurred depends crucially on context and the specific circumstances presented. A clear and unmistakable waiver can occur in any of three ways: by express contract language, by the parties' conduct including bargaining history and past practices, or by a combination of both.[11] In light of the entire record, we find such a clear and unmistakable waiver here.

The language of the parties' strike settlement agreement evinces a clear intent to give up certain benefits in exchange for other payments. In this regard, the pertinent provision of the memorandum of agreement states that, in consideration of benefits not paid during the strike, the Respondent agreed to pay its portion of the employees' health insurance premiums, which the employees had assumed during the strike. Immediately following this language is the further agreement by the parties that this payment is in "full settlement of any grievance, NLRB charges or action pending or in the future related to the handling of all benefits during the strike." Thus, it was expressly in return for the Union's relinquishment of all pending and future claims with regard to all benefits not paid during the strike that the Respondent agreed to provide a limited payment to all employees, including those who were sick or disabled during the strike. Finally, the strike settlement agreement states that acceptance of the agreement "constitutes a full, final and and complete resolution of all outstanding issues between the parties." This provision leaves no doubt about the parties' intent to finally and completely resolve all issues, including those related to the administration of employee benefits during the strike.

That this language clearly contemplates within the term "benefits not paid as a result of the strike" the contractual S & A benefits withheld from sick or disabled employees at issue here is reinforced by the relevant bargaining history. The strike settlement bargainers recognized the S & A benefit issue and explicitly dealt with the issue during negotiations. The Respondent's manager of industrial relations testified that, during negotiations leading up to the strike settlement agreement, the Union's representative asked that employees disabled prior to the strike be paid the S & A benefits that they had been denied during the strike. His unrebutted testimony reveals that he responded that the settlement package was all management could offer. Thus, the parties' conduct in negotiations additionally indicates that they understood that the settlement, which was ultimately agreed on, did not include S & A benefits payments.[12]

[12] Moreover, our finding that the Union knowingly waived employee entitlement to S & A benefits is further bolstered by testimony that affected employees were aware of that fact when the settlement agreement was presented for ratification.

Based on all the above, we conclude that the parties' settlement agreement establishes that the Union clearly and unmistakably waived its sick and disabled employees' right to receive contractual S & A benefits for the duration of the strike.

Regarding whether to give effect to the private agreement between the Union and the Respondent with respect to the individual employee claim here, we emphasize that we adhere to the principle that the Board acts in the public interest to enforce public, not private, rights. Consistent with that view, however, we look favorably on private strike settlements that result in the amicable resolution of labor disputes and thus serve the public interest as well as that of the parties.[13] We must not disregard, therefore, a lawful and voluntary strike settlement agreement, but must determine whether giving full effect to the settlement agreement will effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.[14]

Our analysis of the substance of the agreement and the circumstances in which it was reached convinces us that giving full effect to the Union's waiver of the employees' right to receive contractual benefits will effectuate the purpose and policies of the Act. We recognize that a statutory right, the employees' right to receive these benefits free from discrimination, is involved. It is for that reason that the clear and unmistakable waiver standard is applicable here. See discussion of Metropolitan Edison and Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 242, supra at fns. 5–10, and accompanying text. But just as we apply that demanding standard when it is applicable and has been met, there are sound reasons for honoring the results of the collective bargaining that has produced the waiver of the statutory right.[15]

The employee rights involved here are the same rights the Board found to have been lawfully and effectively waived in its 1985 Texaco decision; see footnote 13 above. As the Board said in that decision concerning the policy reason for giving effect to the similar strike settlement agreement in that case:

> In order to promote the parties' desire to resolve their dispute voluntarily, we should provide every reasonable encouragement that their disputes be resolved on as comprehensive a basis as their strike settlement agreement would indicate. [273 NLRB at 1337.]

We note that in that Texaco case, the Union was the sole charging party, and no individual employee sought to litigate his rights, as distinguished from the instant case. We, however, do not find that this changes the result. The Union here is authorized as the exclusive bargaining representative to bargain on behalf of the employees regarding the receipt of the employee benefits. It did so here, and the Respondent was entitled to rely on the authority of the bargaining representative to establish employee entitlement to contractual benefits, and, further, to fully and completely settle all issues in dispute, subject to the duty of fair representation. To hold otherwise would frustrate the goal of achieving amicable resolution of labor disputes. In this regard, as we discussed at footnote 9 and accompanying text, the Supreme Court expressly recognized in Metropolitian Edison, supra, that a union may choose to waive individual rights, in securing the good of the entire unit.[16]

In short, we find that the Union has clearly and unmistakably waived employee rights, which were waivable by the Union, and that giving effect to the agreement of which this waiver was a part will effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Accordingly, the complaint is dismissed.[17]

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring.

I join the majority opinion but write separately only to suggest that the facts of this case do not afford us an opportunity to plumb the limits of the rule that we announce today. In this case we are presented with the question of whether to give effect to a strike settlement agreement, negotiated between an employer and a union, that purports to compromise and waive the rights of unit members individually to seek redress from the Board for alleged violations under the Act, specifically discrimination prohibited by Section 8(a)(3). The issue is unique insofar as the individual charging parties here were not signatories to the settlement agree-

[13] Texaco, Inc., 273 NLRB 1335 (1985). In that case, the Board reevaluated and redefined the Emerson Electric approach toward settlement agreements relied on by the judge here.

[14] This policy is consistent with the one the Board articulated recently with respect to private settlements of unfair labor practice charges in Independent Stave Co., 287 NLRB 740 (1987), which cites, inter alia, Texaco, Inc., 273 NLRB 1335.

[15] Cf. NLRB v. Magnavox Co., cited in Metropolitan Edison, discussed supra at fn. 7, and accompanying text (a waiver in derogation of certain basic employee rights by a bargaining representative is not permitted, even if the bargaining representative clearly and unmistakably agrees to it). We additionally note that there has been no fraud, unlawful coercion, or duress by any of the parties in reaching the settlement, that the settlement was to the overall benefit of all unit employees, and that the individual charge was not pending at the time the settlement was entered into. See Independent Stave, discussed above at fn. 14.

[16] See also Mahon v. NLRB, 808 F.2d 1342 (9th Cir. 1987), affg. Alpha Beta Co., 273 NLRB 1546 (1985), in which the court noted that a union is empowered to bind employees it represents wholly apart from their separate consent.

[17] To the extent that the Board's affirmance of the judge's conclusions in Texaco, Inc., 259 NLRB 1217, 1218 fn. 2 (1982), enfd. 700 F.2d 1039 (5th Cir. 1983) (when the judge rejected a substantially identical employer contention about the effect of a similar settlement agreement with respect to charges filed by individual unit members) could be read as being inconsistent with the decision we reach today, that case is overruled.

ment, nor did the agreement itself expressly bar individual union members from filing future charges against the employer in connection with the strike; only the Union itself pledged to withdraw all pending charges and to refrain from filing any new, related charges, in consideration for which the Union obtained compensation that benefited both the unit employees as a whole and the alleged discriminatees who are the charging parties here.

A long line of Board and court decisions have firmly established the principle that a strike settlement agreement cannot oust the Board of jurisdiction to entertain statutory violations arising out of a strike.[1] Our decision today does not abandon these authorities, and indeed Section 10(a) would preclude a contrary holding that would give preclusive effect to all settlement agreements. Rather, in the exercise of our discretion, we give effect to the strike settlement here (by dismissing the complaint) because we conclude that to do so would comport with our basic mandate to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.

As the majority correctly observes, the Supreme Court's opinion in Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983), holds the key for identifying the relevant considerations. In that case, the Court faced the question of whether a union may waive the statutory protection afforded union officers against the imposition of more severe sanctions than those imposed on other employees for participating in an unlawful work stoppage. Relying on the collective-bargaining agreement, the employer had argued that the officers had failed to take affirmative steps to end the unit employees' unlawful work stoppage, and that that failure justified the imposition of harsher discipline. Although the Court ultimately held that the particular contract language involved did not support the employer's contention, the Court's mode of analysis and its observations regarding the power of a union as a bargaining representative to waive employee statutory rights is dispositive of the issues here. Initially, the Court analyzed the statutory right at stake. It sustained the Board's view that the union officers as individuals had a right to be free of discriminatory treatment, as prohibited by Section 8(a)(3), including matters relating to discipline. Looking beyond the impact of the employer's conduct on the particular union officers involved in the case, the Court identified the overarching statutory interest:

> Congress has sought to ensure the integrity of [the collective-bargaining] process by preventing both management and labor's representatives from being coerced in the performance of their duties. . . . If . . . an employer could define unilaterally the actions that a union official is required to take, it would give the employer considerable leverage over the manner in which the official performs his union duties. Failure to comply with the employer's directions would place the official's job in jeopardy. But compliance might cause him to take actions that would diminish the respect and authority necessary to perform his job as a union official. This is the dilemma Congress sought to avoid. [460 U.S. at 704–705.]

Having identified the statutory right not as an end in itself but as a means to protect the collective-bargaining process, the Court then turned to a consideration of the other factors that nevertheless supported the union's power to waive such a statutory right on behalf of an individual. The Court found that the imposition of additional affirmative duties on union officers to quell unlawful strikes (and the concomitant exposure to more severe discipline) did not impair the employees' basic choice of union representation. Id. at 706. Further, it found a vital link between these affirmative duties and the union's own prerogative to surrender a statutory right of considerable economic value—the right to strike. Ibid. The Court reasoned that the assumption of affirmative responsibilities by a union's officers may be something to which the union may agree in order to obtain something else of value that the union considers preferable for the unit as a whole. In that regard, the Court recalled the settled principle that in the negotiation of collective-bargaining agreements a union is to be allowed some latitude in agreeing to terms, which have a disparate impact among different classes of unit employees, subject to the the duty of fair representation. Id. at 707. Finally, the Court insisted, in agreement with a long tradition of Board and circuit court law, that the union could only effectuate a waiver of employees' statutory rights through clear and unmistakable manifestations of intent. Id. at 708.

In applying the foregoing mode of analysis to the instant case, I initially observe that the right being waived here actually consists of two interwoven strands: (a) the statutory right bestowed on individual employees to be free from discriminatory conduct that discourages (or encourages) union membership (Sec. 8(a)(3)); and (b) a nonstatutory entitlement to S & A benefits payable during periods of disability, which are granted to employees individually solely by virtue of the Union's having previously obtained such benefits at the bargaining table.[2] The majority is correct to recognize the latter aspect and to allow the Union the power to barter a portion of that contractual right away (that is, to allow suspension of payments during certain circumstances) in return for other economic considerations that the Union in its discretion subsequently deems to be more beneficial to the unit as a whole.

[1] See, e.g., Emerson Electric v. NLRB, 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981), enfg. 246 NLRB 1143, 1149 (1979); Electrical Workers IUE Local 613 (Erie Technological) v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 723 (3d Cir. 1964); Machinists Local 743 v. United Aircraft, 337 F.2d 5, 8–9 (2d Cir. 1964). Cf. NLRB v. C & C Plywood Corp., 385 U.S. 421 (1967) (NLRB has jurisdiction over unfair labor practice charge on employer's failure to rescind unilaterally instituted premium pay plan; employer's contractual defense that union waived right to bargain over pay plan does not divest Board of jurisdiction); Erie Resistor Corp., 132 NLRB 621, 631 fn. 31 (1961) (dictum), affd. on other grounds but noted in 373 U.S. 221, 237 fn. 14 (1963), on remand 328 F.2d 723 (3d Cir. 1964).

However, we must not lose sight of the statutory right involved. As is evident from the holding of Texaco, Inc., 285 NLRB 241 (1987), a decision that involved the same underlying labor dispute and strike as the instant one, it is prima facie unlawful discrimination for an employer to suspend payment of accrued S & A benefits to sick or disabled employees solely because unit employees engage in a protected strike. The vice of such conduct is that it "surely may have a discouraging effect on either present or future concerted activity."[3] Yet the fact that this discriminatory effect may occur does not necessarily foreclose the union from agreeing to tolerate it. The Court in Metropolitan Edison was willing to subject union officers to disparate punishment because such discrimination could be linked to the union's waiver of the right to strike. Similarly, in the instant case, there is a nexus between the discriminatory denial of the S & A benefits and the Union's decision regarding constraints it can accept on the employees' exercise of their right to strike. The Supreme Court has long recognized that a union does have the inherent authority as exclusive bargaining representative to agree to restraints on the statutory right to strike.[4] If a union can agree to waive the right to strike during a contract term or the right to refuse to cross a lawful picket line, the union can surely agree to tolerate a restraint such as the one in the instant case, which only burdens (in the sense of creating certain financial disincentives) rather than bans outright the exercise of the right to strike.

It is true that the waiver here was obtained under circumstances that were arguably different than the purported waiver that the employer in Metropolitan Edison thought it had obtained.[5] There the asserted waiver was part of a collective-bargaining contract that was presumably negotiated in a context free of unlawful coercion. Here, in contrast, there is antecedent unlawful conduct—the denial of S & A benefits—which normally triggers an obligation on the part of the Board to remedy and deter. However, this distinction should not necessarily limit the ability of the Union here to negotiate waivers of statutory rights. The unlawful discrimination was in direct response to the strike called by the Union, it ceased on termination of the strike, and it did not appear to have a lasting detriment to either the bargaining relationship or the ability of the employees to engage in protected concerted activity. Moreover, as noted above, the statutory violation was rooted in the contractual benefits that the Union itself had previously obtained. Under these circumstances, it was entirely appropriate for the Union to settle the statutory violations as part of a comprehensive overall agreement that restored labor peace, resolved the contract issues that gave rise to the dispute, and provided an overall improvement in the terms and conditions of the unit employees, including the discriminatees.

In sum, concerning the first branch of the Metropolitan Edison test, I conclude that the employees' statutory right to be free from discrimination is not simply an "economic" right, capable of union waiver because the union and the employer are able to assign a monetary value to the right and treat it like a bargaining chip. Because of the nexus here between the waiver of right against discrimination and the Union's privilege to waive the right to strike, I am satisfied that the Union had the power to enter into an agreement that might effectively lead to a dismissal of the discriminatees' charges against the Respondent. But whether a union, on behalf of particular employees and without their express individual consent, could waive other types of statutory violations in other contexts, in my view, would have to be carefully examined in future cases.[6]

[2] Without a contract, employees who are sick or disabled and cannot report to work would not have been entitled to compensation. See General Electric Co., 80 NLRB 510, 511 (1948) (employer is not required to finance an economic strike against it by remunerating strikers for work not performed).

[3] NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967).

[4] See NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175, 180 (1967).

[5] As noted above, a waiver of statutory rights was not found in Metropolitan Edison, but the Court reached this conclusion on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence of a clear and unmistakable waiver. As a threshold matter, however, the Court clearly sustained the power of the union to negotiate into the collective-bargaining agreement a limited waiver of its union officers' protection against discrimination.

[6] The record shows that at least some of the 11 discriminatees knew the terms of the settlement agreement, but it is uncertain whether all of them were so aware. Two of the discriminatees even participated in a ratification vote, although the record does not disclose how they voted. For purposes of establishing whether the Union clearly and unmistakably intended to waive the statutory rights of the charging party and other discriminatees, this evidence is certainly probative. However, I would not equate it with the evidence of individual express consent that the Board,

Continued

The remaining aspects of the Metropolitan Edison analysis—whether the Union's action comported with the duty of fair representation and whether the clear and unmistakable waiver standard was satisfied—do not require extended discussion. There is no evidence that the Union in reaching this settlement agreement engaged in any type of discriminatory conduct that might constitute a breach of the duty of fair representation.[7]

Furthermore, I agree with my colleagues' assessment that the Union did manifest a clear and unmistakable intent to compromise the charging parties' claims for relief under the Act.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring.

Like my colleagues, I would dismiss the complaint because the Union clearly and unmistakably waived disabled employees' rights to sickness and accident plan benefits (S & A benefits) in the strike settlement agreement executed between it and the Respondent.[1] In doing so, however, I rely only on the language of the agreement—specifically, the second sentence of clause 6—and the undisputed fact that S & A benefits were discussed during the negotiations leading to the agreement.

The second sentence of clause 6 of the strike settlement agreement provides: "It is further agreed by the parties that such payment is in full settlement of any grievance, NLRB charges or action pending or in the future related to the handling of all benefits during the strike" (emphasis added). I read this sentence to mean that the Union exchanged the right to grieve the Respondent's handling of all benefits during the strike for the payment specified. Thus, the Union clearly and unmistakably waived any possible contractual claim to S & A benefit entitlement during the strike. The bargaining history of the strike settlement agreement shows S & A benefits were discussed in relation to settling the strike, which bolsters the finding that S & A benefits are encompassed within the Respondent's "handling of all benefits during the strike."

In conclusion, because the Union has clearly and unmistakably waived disabled employees' entitlement to contractual S & A benefits by forgoing its right to contractually grieve the matter, the Respondent cannot have committed an unfair labor practice by withholding these benefits.

in other decisions, has found relevant. See Alpha Beta Co., 273 NLRB 1546, 1547 (1985) (settlement negotiated by union was subsequently approved by apparently all affected employees), petition for review denied 808 F.2d 1342 (9th Cir. 1987); Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 243 NLRB 501, 502 (1979); Central Cartage Co., 206 NLRB 337 (1973). See also Airport Parking Management Co., 264 NLRB 5, 13 (1982), enfd. 720 F.2d 610 (9th Cir. 1983) (Board decided not to defer to strike settlement agreement because, inter alia, no evidence that employees understood agreement to waive their right to pursue claims arising out of strike). Compare Lectromelt Casting Co., 269 NLRB 933, 934 (1984) (strike settlement agreement gave discriminatees the option of accepting settlement on an individual basis; those who accepted it waived statutory rights whereas those who rejected it could pursue remedy with the Board), with Hotel Holiday Inn De Isla Verde, 278 NLRB 1027, 1028 (1986) (complaint dismissed on grounds of union-negotiated strike settlement agreement which "[a]ll the affected discharged strikers were aware of," did not object to, and by conduct indicated acceptance of its terms).

[1] Except for the circumstances mentioned below, I would defer this proceeding to arbitration in light of the history and quality of the parties' bargaining relationship, the absence of union animus, the Respondent's willingness to resort to arbitration, the scope of the arbitration clause, and the fact that contract interpretation is central to resolution of this dispute. See Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971); United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984). Due to the length of time this case has been at the Board, however, deferral at this point would be inequitable as it would only further delay disposition of the matter at issue.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALLACE H. NATIONS, Administrative Law Judge. The original charge in this case was filed on June 3, 1980, and amended on June 17, 1980. The original complaint issued on June 30, 1980, and was amended July 1, 1980. Respondent's answer to the complaint is dated July 7, 1980, and was amended July 1, 1980. The complaint alleged that immediately on the commencement of an economic strike at its Indiana facility, and continuing until the end of the strike, Respondent ceased paying sickness and accident disability benefits (S and A Benefits) to named unit employees[1] previously receiving such benefits and, by such act, has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. In its answer, Respondent denies the commission of any unfair labor practices and affirmatively asserts that a memorandum of agreement between the Respondent and Local 7-210 of the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union acts as a bar to the filing of the complaint in this case. A hearing was held before me in Chicago, Illinois, on February 9 and 10, 1981. Briefs have been received from the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent, a Delaware corporation, is engaged in the business of petroleum refining and processing with an office and principal place of business located at 3500 Indianapolis Boulevard, East Chicago, Indiana. During the year preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent sold and shipped goods valued in excess of $50,000 from its East Chicago, Indiana facility directly to points located outside the State of Indiana. I find that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act and that it will effectuate the policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction in this case.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Local 7-210, Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Energy Cooperative, Inc. (ECI or Respondent) was formed in 1976 by nine agricultural cooperatives in response to the oil embargo of 1973–1974, during which these cooperatives lost their source of energy products, basically gasoline and diesel oil, to supply their farm member-owners. Seeking to find a secure source of such products, the cooperatives formed ECI and acquired an Arco-Sinclair refinery in East Chicago, Illinois. At the time ECI acquired the involved refinery in 1976, it agreed to honor the contract that existed between Arco, the previous owner, and the Union, as it pertained to the involved refinery. For many years prior to that purchase, and at all times material, Local 7-210 has been recognized as the bargaining representative of a unit of production and maintenance employees and a unit of clerical employees employed at the refinery. Successive collective-bargaining agreements between the Local and the respective owners of the refinery have historically conformed with an industrywide bargaining program or pattern developed by the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement entered into by Respondent, the Local, and the International Union went into effect on January 8, 1979. Article XXXI provided for the reopening of negotiations on wages, health care benefits, and vacations no earlier than November 1, 1979. The reopening provision provided that in the event the parties could not reach agreement the International and the Local had the right to engage in an economic strike subsequent to January 8, 1980.

Pursuant to appropriate notice, Respondent ECI and Local 7-210 commenced negotiations on the reopened subject. The two meetings and other communications between the parties during the period from November 1, 1979, through January 7, 1980, focused on efforts to exempt Respondent from any industrywide strike action called by the International, on Respondent's assurance to conform to any pattern established for the industry in negotiations to settle a strike. Neither of the parties anticipated the strike at Respondent's refinery even if the International called an industrywide strike on or after January 8, 1980.

At a meeting called by Local 7-210 Secretary-Treasurer Dean Bainbridge, on January 7, 1980, for the same afternoon, Bainbridge presented Respondent's manager of industrial relations, Barry Brock, with a copy of a notice from the International's president that Local 7-210 would strike Respondent on January 8, 1980. Brock testified that he announced to the Local in 1978 a company policy that S and A benefits, among others, would be cut off in the event of a strike. Brock reiterated the policy at the January 7 meeting with Bainbridge. Bainbridge had earlier opposed Respondent's stated policy and again at the meeting opposed Respondent's intention to cut off the S and A benefits for those employees on medical leave. He also questioned Brock about Respondent's handling of insurance premiums. Bainbridge was told by Brock that he would get back to him on the issue of premiums. On January 8, 1980, at 4:15 p.m., the strike commenced.

Prior to and on January 8, 1980, the 10 production and maintenance unit employees and the clerical employee named in the complaint were absent from work on medical leave due to physical disabilities. Each had been receiving contractual S and A benefits prior to that date. Immediately on commencement of the strike, as admitted by Respondent, it terminated payment of S and A benefits to these 11 employed.

During the strike, Mary Kasperek died, and Harry Wickhorst received medical certification of recovery. The other nine employees involved remained physically disabled and were unable to work for the duration of the strike. Throughout the negotiations to settle the strike, the Local urged Respondent to reinstate the S and A benefits to those employees who had been receiving them prior to the strike. Ultimately, the strike was settled on April 12, 1980, and Respondent resumed payment of S and A benefits to the nine employees who were still disabled. The Local, on behalf of its employees, including employees named in the complaint, entered into a memorandum of agreement in which Respondent was released of all liability for its actions in relation to the strike, including alleged and potential unfair labor practices. Employees Andrew Habzansky and Harry Wickhorst participated in the ratification vote for approval of the memorandum of agreement, which ended the strike.

B. Employer's Defenses

The General Counsel urges that the controlling case with respect to the subject matter involved in this proceeding is Emerson Electric Co., 246 NLRB 1143 (1979). The Board, in Emerson Electric, affirmed with modifications the recommended Order of an administrative law judge, holding that employees receiving sickness and disability benefits at the outset of the strike were, in general, entitled to continue to receive such benefits during the course of the strike unless such employees publicly declared their support for the strike. In the face of Emerson Electric, Respondent in this proceeding has raised a number of defenses, none of which I find valid. These defenses will be discussed below in the order that appears most logical, though not necessarily in the order of their importance.

1. Respondent contends that the Board should have deferred this proceeding for arbitration. Relying on General American Transportation, 228 NLRB 808 (1977), Respondent urged that the instant case be deferred under Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971). Respondent's reliance is misplaced. In General American Transportation, the Board clearly stated its opposition to deferral in cases alleging violations of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The instant case involves individual protected rights arising out of the Act and neither Respondent nor the Local had ever indicated willingness to arbitrate the issues raised here. The Board has affirmed an administrative law judge's decision that issues similiar to those raised in this proceeding are not appropriate for deferral. Kansas City Power & Light Co., 244 NLRB 620 (1979). I find that the issues involved should not be deferred for arbitration and find that they are properly before the Board.

2. Respondent asserts that Emerson Electric establishes an unconstitutional irrebutable presumption in violation of due process rights under the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution to the extent that the Board has established a presumption that an employer violates the Act when it terminates its payment of existing S and A benefits to disabled employees during a strike. This argument is apparently directed at another forum and will not be discussed at length. However, I do not believe that the Board established an irrebutable presumption in Emerson Electric. If it had proper proof, Respondent could have shown that it acquired information that indicated that the employees whose benefits are to be terminated had affirmatively acted to show public support for the strike and, having acquired this information, and acting on it, terminated the benefits. As will be demonstrated, the applicant has not made such a showing, and failure to do so does not demonstrate that it was denied its due process rights, only that it violated the Act.

3. Respondent raised as an affirmative defense and motion to dismiss paragraph 8 of the memorandum of agreement executed by Local 7-210 and Respondent in settlement of the strike. In pertinent part, paragraph 8 provides that neither party to the memorandum will file any charges with the National Labor Relations Board as a result of the strike. At the hearing, Respondent indicated that paragraph 8 directly related to paragraph 6 of the memorandum in which the parties agreed that Respondent would pay its portion of the insurance premiums on behalf of employees during the strike "in consideration of certain benefits not paid as a result of the strike, and that such payment was in full settlement of any grievances, NLRB charges or actions pending or in the future related to the handling of all benefits during the strike." It is clear that the Board's power to prevent unfair labor practices "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may established by agreement, law or otherwise," Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act. The memorandum of agreement is not binding on the Board and does not warrant the Board's abdication of its jurisdiction or its obligation to enforce public rights. Emerson Electric, supra, and cases cited therein; Lammert Industries Corp., 229 NLRB 895, 924 (1977). Respondent's motion is denied.

4. Respondent urges strenuously that Emerson Electric is not controlling and dispositive of the issues in this proceeding as the instant case may be distinguished on its facts from Emerson Electric. In Emerson Electric, supra at 3, the Board stated: "in rejecting this rationable, we conclude that an employer may not rely on such speculative grounds to justify the termination of existing disability benefits to employees which, as found here by the administrative law judge, had accrued to them as a result of past work performed." In the instant proceeding Respondent argues that the S and A benefits involved are not "accrued as a result of past work performed," within the meaning of Emerson Electric. Respondent urges that the collective-bargaining agreement provides that S and A benefits are wages, and that an employee is qualified so that the wages become due and owing if

(a) The employee is medically certified as being temporarily disabled and unable to work.

(b) The employee was normally scheduled to work during the period of disability.

The collective-bargaining agreement, article XI, states, inter alia

> 1. All regular employees shall receive wages during periods of physical disability by reason of sickness and injury, subject to the following rules and regulations.
> . . . .
>
> 8. Payments of wages during periods of physical disability shall be based on the employee's normal working schedule. In computing the number of days' pay an employee is entitled to receive under this Plan in any calendar year, pay allowance will be made for the actual number of normally scheduled working days within the period of such absence. Any pay for overtime work shall not be considered in determining rate of wages for the purpose of disability payment hereunder.
> . . . .
> 18. The Plan shall be subject to the Grievance and Arbitration Procedure of the Articles of Agreement.

Respondent contends that the S and A benefits plan set forth above is merely a wage continuation plan requiring that an employee actually be scheduled to work during the period of his or her disability to receive benefits. Respondent argues that because no union members were scheduled to work during the strike, none of the discriminatees were entitled to continue to receive benefits during the strike. In support of its position, Respondent argues that because paragraph 1 refers to benefits as "wages", and paragraph 8 refers to the employees "normal work schedule" and paragraph 1 denies payments of benefits to disabilities commencing during a vacation, leave of absence, or layoff, an employee must be actually scheduled to work to receive benefits under the plan.

I disagree. Paragraph 3, article XI, provides for greater benefits for more senior employees, demonstrating to me the benefits are paid to employees for work performed by them in the past, not in the present. When viewed in conjunction with paragraph 9, article XI, and the context of the entire contract, I find that the reference in paragraph 8, article XI, to an employee's normal work schedule describes the basis on which an employee's benefits are computed, rather than requiring an employee to actually be scheduled to work a particular day to receive benefits. Various other provisions of the contract contain similar language to establish norms for the employees' hours of work and rates of pay. Article VI of the contract defines the "regular schedule work hours" and the "regular" workweek for day employees and shift employees. Article VIII provides for pay differentials for shift employees "regularly assigned" to shift work. Article IV discusses the effect of a temporary assignment of an employee to a job classification other than "regularly assigned classification." It appears that an employee could become disabled while working in a classification or during hours other than those in which the employee normally works. In that event, article XI provides that benefits will be based on an employee's "normal work schedule." Moreover, article IX, on vacations, also sets out the basis for computation of the employees' vacation pay in substantially similar language to paragraph 8, article XI. It would be illogical to argue that to get vacation pay an employee must actually be scheduled to work at the time that employee is scheduled to take vacation because the amount of vacation pay is based on the "regularly scheduled workweek, exclusive of overtime."

As noted in the General Counsel's brief, the record is vague with respect to Respondent's operations to the extent that disabled employees are literally scheduled to work during their absence. It appears that while disabled employees are listed somewhere in order to retain their seniority in rank on a particular process crew or unit, another employee is temporarily transferred to that crew or unit to perform the scheduled work. Moreover, benefit checks are automatically prepared by the payroll department by computer from information about the employee's regularly scheduled workweek and rate of pay without regard for whether the employee is actually "scheduled" for work. Testimony of Respondent's employees establishes that the work schedule utilized during the course of the strike was prepared by Respondent in 1978 in anticipation of a strike and only contained the names of management personnel or personnel recruited from outside the refinery. No unit employees were included in that work schedule, even though Respondent admitted it had no idea how widespread support would be before the strike.[2] Moreover, there is no evidence in the record that failure to be "scheduled" to work during the strike affected unit employees' rights or benefits in respects any other than those at issue in this proceeding.

I believe the record clearly demonstrates that the sickness and disability benefits plan involved provides benefits to sick and disabled employees when they are phsically unable because of past work performed. An argument similar to that made above by Respondent in this case was rejected by the administrative law judge in Emerson Electric. In Emerson Electric, the administrative law judge found that S and A benefits which, as described in his decision appear very similar to those at issue in the instant case, accrue to employees who were receiving them at the start of a legitimate economic strike of other employees. As the administrative law judge's analysis and findings in this respect were upheld by the Board on review, I conclude that the S and A benefits here involved are "accrued" benefits within the meaning of Emerson Electric.

In a related defense, Respondent urges that it did not rely on speculative grounds to justify the termination of existing disability benefits to its employees and that it had a legitimate business reason for terminating such benefits. Respondent urges that the Board has failed to carry its burden of proof imposed in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967). It urges that Great Dane clearly holds that there must be proof that an employer's actions fall within one or two categories before an 8(a)(3) unfair labor practice can be sustained. There must be proof that the employers' conduct was "inherently destructive" of employees' rights, or that the harm resulting from the employer's action was "comparatively slight." Respondent argues that because the named discriminatees were not entitled to wages for S and A benefits under the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement for the reasons set out above, there was no adverse impact on employees that can in any way be held to be "inherently destructive." or to have a "comparatively slight" impact on those employees' rights.

Respondent states on brief that the Board in Emerson Electric, supra, found, by inference, that the employer's actions in that case were "inherently destructive" of employees' rights for several stated reasons. A review of the Board's decision in that proceeding will reveal that the reasons stated by Respondent were not mentioned by the Board, although they formed part of the reasoning underlying the decision reached by the administrative law judge. However, even if Respondent is correct that such reasons are necessarily implicit in the Board's decision, I believe all material aspects of Emerson Electric, which led to the Board's ultimate decision there, are also present in the instant case. The reason believed material by Respondent are

(a) Because the collective-bargaining agreement provided for payment of S and A benefits during the course of the strike due to the accrued and vested nature of those benefits.

(b) Because the employer had been notified prior to the strike by the Union that certain employees receiving S and A benefits would not be participating in the strike.

[2] In other testimony elicited by Respondent, it has taken the position that it believed the strike would be widespread because of the past history of strikers against the involved refinery. Based on research by some of its employees of earlier strikes, it appears that no refinery employee had ever crossed a picket line established by the Local. As noted earlier, however, none of the responsible personnel of Respondent had any actual strike experience with the Local.

(c) Because a number of employees receiving S and A benefits prior to the strike called the employer shortly after the strike and protested the denial of S and A benefits, specifically indicating to the Company that they were not in fact participating in the strike.

(d) Because the employer terminated S and A benefits before there was any showing of how widespread the strike would be.

(e) Because the employer relied on speculative grounds to justify the termination of those benefits to the employees.

Respondent urges that none of the facts are present in the record of this proceeding. I disagree. First, I have already found that the S and A benefits involved are accrued and vested benefits, at least within the meaning of Emerson Electric. Although Respondent may not have been notified specifically prior to the start of the strike that the involved discriminatees were excused from work by their sickness or injuries. Certainly, there is nothing in this record to indicate that at the outset of the strike Respondent had any positive knowledge that any of the discriminatees intended to participate in the strike.[3]

I believe that the Board's decision in Emerson Electric requires that an employer have some positive knowledge or proof that employees in the position of the discriminatees in this case actively intend to support a strike rather than placing a burden on the employees to expressly disavow the strike to the employer in order to continue to receive their benefits during the course of the strike.

Regarding Respondent's reason in paragraph (c), at least one discriminatee, Harry Wickhorst, notified a responsible management person on January 9 that he was not withholding his labor from the Respondent, but that he was off sick. This discriminatee was informed that his position made no difference whether he would get his benefits. As in Emerson Electric, the Employer Respondent in this proceeding did terminate the S and A benefits before there was any showing of how widespread the strike would be and, in my opinion, Respondent relied on speculative grounds to justify the termination of those benefits to the employees. It appears that the decision to terminate the benefits was made well prior to the actual institution of the involved strike or notification that a strike was imminent.

[3] Evidence was adduced that the Local prepared picket rosters from Respondent's seniority list, which included the names of all the discriminatees except Mary Kasperek. While it appears that these picket rosters were distributed among employees and/or posted at the refinery, there is no evidence that shows that management personnel of Respondent were aware of these rosters at the time that Respondent made or implemented its decision to terminate the disability benefits or that they played any role in the decision-making process. The picket rosters were amended shortly after the onset of the strike to reflect that the discriminatees were not participating in the picketing. Similarly, Respondent offered into evidence a copy of the Local's bylaws obtained from the Local pursuant to a pretrial subpoena to show that all union members were required to be supporters of any strike action. However, art. IV, sec. 4(8), of the bylaws merely permits the Local to take disciplinary action against members who engage in conduct that tends to render prosecution of a strike. There is no record evidence that Respondent's management was aware of the bylaws when a decision was made to terminate the disability benefits. Moreover, such provision is inadequate to prove that employees affirmatively acted to support the strike, especially in view of the Local's protest of the termination of the S and A benefits to employees who were disabled at the start of the strike.

Even if a legitimate business purpose for termination of existing S and A benefits rebuts a presumption of discriminatory motivation in accordance with the principles set forth in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, supra, I believe that Respondent acknowledges that the decision to terminate the S and A benefits during the strike had been grounded in a policy developed by the Respondent in 1978. The policy was implemented in the 1980 strike because of the following stated reasons:

> (1) Although the contract was reopened, the strike terminated Respondent's obligations under the contract.
> (2) S and A benefits are like wages and Respondent was not obligated by law to finance a strike against itself.
>
> (3) Respondent was obligated to conserve its resources.
> (4) It wanted to prevent fraud by preventing strikers from attempting to collect benefits by claiming they had suffered a disability during the strike. Respondent admitted that it had not distinguished between employees who were disabled prior to the strike and strikers may have attempted to make initial claims during the strike.

The S and A benefits issue is accrued benefits, and as found above, Respondent cannot claim any legitimate business purposes for its conduct on this ground (par. 2). The other stated "legitimate business purposes" urged by Respondent were considered by the administrative law judge and the Board in Emerson Electric, and rejected, and I do the same.

5. Respondent also argues that there is ample evidence in the record to prove that the employees showed public support for the strike within the meaning of Emerson Electric, and thus enmeshed themselves in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate their right to continue disability benefits. With respect to discriminatees Sako, Wickhorst, Farrentelli, Dowell, Habzansky, and Siokos, Respondent argues that they publicly supported the strike by applying for unemployment compensation benefits in March. In each of the instances in which these discriminatees applied for state benefits, they indicated on their application forms to the Indiana Employment Security Division that they were entitled to benefits for the reason that they were on strike or involved in a labor dispute as of January 8, 1980. However, the testimony of these six discriminatees about their experiences in applying for unemployment compensation benefits reveals that, in spite of their explanations why they were applying for benefits, the government officials who aided them in completing the forms insisted that they put down that Respondent was on strike as the reason that they were "unemployed," and that other reasons were unnecessary since all the applications of employees in the oil industry were being processed together. I do not believe that an application for unemployment compensation benefits constitutes public support for a strike, where, as here, the employees' benefits were in dire financial straits because of the discontinuance of their S and A benefits. Moreover, Respondent did not effectively acquire information about these benefits applications until sometime during the preparation for the instant proceeding.

Respondent also relies on the fact that none of the discriminatees were fined or otherwise disciplined by the Union for failing to ratify or participate in the strike. It urges that though employees are not required to declare their position on the strike to an employer there is nothing to prohibit them from doing so to the Union, and had they so indicated their position in opposition to the strike to the Union, disciplinary action would have taken place. It must be noted that several of the discriminatees when asked at the hearing whether they did support the strike replied in the negative. I believe this to be immaterial in any event. The discriminatees are not required by the Board's decision in Emerson Electric to publicly disavow the strike to continue to receive disability benefits, only to refrain from publicly supporting the strike. Again, knowledge of whether the Union did or did not discipline the discriminatees for failure to support the strike would not come into the hands of Respondent until after the end of the strike.

Lastly, Respondent notes that two of the employees participated in the ratification vote that concluded the strike, and that each of the employees named in the complaint testified at the hearing that they would not have crossed the picket line to go to work but for their disability. Again, such information did not come into the hands of Respondent until after the end of the strike, and in any event do not constitute public support for the strike. As held by the Board in Emerson Electric, a showing of participation in the strike does not justify post hoc Respondent's initial termination of benefits to the discriminatees. Any employee, disabled or sound, who affirmatively demonstrates his support of the strike by picketing or otherwise showing public support for the strike, has enmeshed himself in the ongoing strike activity to such an extent as to terminate his right to continue disability benefits. The employees' actions in support of the strike, however, may not be used to deprive them of any benefits for time away from work prior to their supportive action. Based on the evidence presented in this case, I find that none of the discriminatees participated in the strike or lent public support for the strike within the meaning of Emerson Electric.

IV. THE REMEDY

Based on these findings and conclusions, I ultimately find and conclude that Respondent did engage in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. It having been found that Respondent unlawfully withheld S and A benefit payments to the discriminatees named in the complaint, it must be ordered, in remedy, to pay them what money was due them, with interest. The period for which such reimbursement must be made is from January 8 to April 12, 1980. Mary Kasperek died and Harry Wickhorst was certified medically able to work during the period of the strike. They will be paid what S and A benefits were due to them to the day of their death or recovery.

On the basis of these findings of fact and on the entire record in this case, I make the following

CONCLUSION OF LAW

By withholding from January 8 to April 12, 1980, payment of S and A benefits to the employees named in the complaint, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On November 19, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Snyder issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed briefs in response to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining, we have strictly applied the principles set forth in Reichhold Chemicals, 288 NLRB 69 (1988). We therefore disavow any reliance on the judge's reasoning to the extent that it may suggest that we will scrutinize wage offers to see if they are sufficiently generous, that we would require some substantial explanation for every concession that an employer declines to make, or that we believe that an employer is bargaining in bad faith if it does not offer all the benefits to one bargaining unit that it has offered to another.

We agree, however, that it is reasonable to infer from the totality of the evidence that the Respondent had no real intent to reach a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Rather, it behaved as if it was counting on the chance that the slim majority by which the Union won the election (a fact the Respondent's negotiator commented on more than once) and the passage of the certification year without any real prospect of a contract would culminate in a sufficient expression of employee dissatisfaction to permit the Respondent to do what it finally did when the certification year ended—withdraw recognition on the basis of an asserted good-faith doubt of union majority.

It is important to recognize at the outset that the employees possess, by virtue of the Union's certification, the right to strike or negotiate or both over every workplace grievance and to demand that the Employer give advance notice and a meaningful opportunity to bargain over any change it makes in the working conditions of unit employees (other than those basic shifts in the shape or direction of the business that are not mandatory subjects of bargaining). An employer of course may seek waivers that will eliminate or restrict the exercise of these rights during the term of a contract, but the Respondent's demands for sweeping waivers—viewed in the light of what it was offering in exchange—simply are not the behavior of an employer who is trying to achieve a collective-bargaining agreement. In this connection, we agree with the judge that the combination of the Respondent's proposals on management rights, grievance and arbitration, "sole recourse," and prohibitions against strikes rendered substantial portions of the proposed contract virtually unenforceable.

Finally, our basis for inferring bad faith is strengthened by the Respondent's tactic of pretending to concede on some matter particularly objected to by the Union, while retaining essentially the same provision in another clause in the Respondent's overall contract proposal (or transferring the provision to another clause), e.g., its deletion from

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The judge's decision contained several minor errors which do not affect his analysis or our decision: (1) In sec. II,C, the judge erroneously stated that Michael Senick acted as the primary negotiator for the Union in its negotiations for a second LLSD contract. The record reflects that Bernice Krawczyk acted as the primary spokesperson in that negotiation. (2) In sec. II,D,9, the judge inadvertently identified an employer proposal as having been made on July 12 rather than August 12, as the record reflects. (3) In sec. II,D,10, the judge stated that the bargaining unit consisted of approximately 50 employees "when bargaining first began," although the record reflects that there were 50 employees in the bargaining unit at the time of the representation election and is silent with respect to the number in January 1981 when bargaining commenced. (4) In sec. II,D,13, the judge stated that the second LLSD contract had been signed "even as the CSD negotiations continued." The record reflects that the second LLSD contract was reached some 6-1/2 months after the CSD negotiations had been broken off. (5) In sec. II,E, fn. 83, the judge inadvertently used October 18 rather than November 18 as the date on which the Respondent filed its RM petition.

[2] We disavow the judge's statement in fn. 27 of his decision that as early as June 11, 1981, the parties reached impasse on the management-rights issue, and his statement in fn. 93 that the Respondent's alleged delay in scheduling or attending bargaining meetings reflects on its motivation. Further, we disavow the judge's reliance on the manner in which the Respondent's counsel conducted direct and cross-examination of witnesses during the hearing either as a basis for discrediting Joseph Kelly's testimony or as evidence of the Respondent's bad faith bargaining.

In addition, although we adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent had asked the Union to poll employees on the issue of the waiver of certain Sec. 7 rights, we find it unnecessary, in view of our disposition of the case, to address this matter. Accordingly, we do not rely on the judge's discussion of NLRB v. Magnavox, 415 U.S. 322 (1974), and Romo Paper Products, 220 NLRB 519 (1975), as it relates to this waiver issue.

the seniority article of disciplinary action as a ground for loss of seniority while effectively retaining it in the Rules and Corrective Discipline article. This method of bargaining tended to stretch out the negotiations because it produced renewed controversies over old ground.

In sum, we acknowledge that the Respondent's negotiators appeared regularly at the bargaining table and that the negotiations resulted in movement and agreement on some subjects, but we are persuaded by the totality of the record evidence that the Respondent was not negotiating in good faith with a view to trying to reach a complete agreement with the Union.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

William F. Grant, Esq., for the General Counsel.
James D. Madigan III and John D. Canoni, Esqs. (Townley & Updike), of New York, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT T. SNYDER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me in Newark, New Jersey, on September 13, 14, 16, 22, 23, and 28, 1982. The complaint, which issued on January 13, 1982,[1] alleges that Prentice-Hall, Inc. (Prentice-Hall, Company, or Respondent) violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by negotiating with District 65, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (the Union or District 65) in bad faith and with no intention of entering into any final or binding collective-bargaining agreement, and by withdrawing and withholding recognition from the Union. In its answers to both the original and amended complaint, Respondent denied the conclusionary allegations of violation of the Act. The General Counsel and Respondent each filed posthearing briefs.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the posthearing briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

[1] Another complaint, in Case 22-CA-11298, with the same Charging Party and issued against the same Respondent, was first consolidated for hearing with the instant complaint by order and issuance of an amended complaint on January 25, 1982, and then later ordered severed by the Regional Director on motion made by Respondent.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS

Respondent is a corporation[2] engaged in the publication, sale, and distribution of books and other printed matter. At all times material it has maintained its principal office and place of business in Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, the only facility involved in this proceeding. Annually, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, publishes, sells, and distributes at the Englewood Cliffs facility books and other printed products valued in excess of $50,000, of which books and other printed products valued in excess of $50,000 are shipped from the facility in interstate commerce directly to points outside the State of New Jersey. Respondent admits, and I find, that Prentice-Hall is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Respondent admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Union's Bargaining History with Prentice-Hall

By the time District 65 organized the composition services department (CSD or the unit), it had already organized two other units at Prentice-Hall: a small clerical unit in a subsidiary just outside Boston, and the attorney-editors in the looseleaf services division (LLSD) located in Paramus, New Jersey. The clerical unit had signed its first bargaining agreement in September 1980, and the LLSD's first contract was in effect from June 1, 1980, until May 1, 1982. Negotiations for a second LLSD contract began in late March or early April 1982 and, following a brief strike immediately following the expiration of the first agreement, a new agreement was signed.

B. The Unit

The CSD was created by Prentice-Hall a decade before this case arose as an in-house alternative to private vendors for preparing manuscripts. The department's employees perform typesetting, proofreading, and pasteup tasks for which they compete with outside vendors. The overwhelming majority (95–96 percent) of this work is performed by outside vendors.

In September 1980, the Union filed its petition with the National Labor Relations Board (Board) to represent CSD employees. Prentice-Hall and District 65 entered into a stipulation for certification upon consent agreement for an election that was held on November 6, 1980. Twenty-five of the 48 employees who participated in the election[3] voted in favor of representation, and on November 17, 1980, the Board certified a unit consisting of all full-time and regular part-time advertising production coordinators, camera operators, compositors, pasteup artists, system operators, quality control personnel, control clerks, and proofreaders employed by the Employer in its CSD at its Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey facility but excluding all managerial employees, confidential employees, casual employees, watchmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, as appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

[2] Respondent filed two answers, one to the complaint, and another to the amended complaint. In its answer, Respondent admitted to being a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey, and in its amended answer to being a corporation organized under the laws of Delaware. Because Respondent admits jurisdiction, and I so find, I have not resolved this inconsistency.

[3] Apparently, the unit consisted of 50 employees at the time of the election. Later, at the time of this litigation, CSD employed only 35 employees.

C. Bargaining Participants, Procedures, and Respondent's Notes of the Sessions

Throughout the negotiations each party was represented by a chief negotiator accompanied by a negotiating team. Michael Senick and Joseph Kelly were the primary negotiators for the Union and Respondent, respectively.

Kelly was Respondent's vice president in charge of human resources. He had experience as both a negotiating committee member and as the principal spokesperson in contract negotiations for two other employers before coming to Prentice-Hall.

Prior to becoming employed by District 65, Senick, an attorney, had been an employee in Prentice-Hall's LLSD for 5-1/2 years. While still an LLSD employee he had been a member of that unit's negotiating committee for their first contract. The CSD negotiations represent the first time Senick had acted as the chief spokesperson in contract negotiations. He subsequently was the primary negotiator for the Union in its successful negotiations for a second LLSD contract.[4]

Kelly's committee was comprised of John Canoni, a partner at the law firm of Townley & Updike, with extensive background in contract negotiations; Peter Aschoff, manager of CSD; Michael Sweet, a participant in first contract negotiations between Respondent and LLSD; and James Madigan, an associate with Townley & Updike with no previous experience in collective bargaining. This committee remained intact throughout the course of the negotiations, although not all members were present at all sessions.

Senick's committee consisted primarily of unit employees and its composition varied from one meeting to the next. Bernice Krawczyk also attended some of the sessions before July 1981. She was in charge of District 65's publishing division and was Senick's supervisor at the Union.

Negotiations were initiated by Senick by letter in mid-December 1980. Kelly responded to this request by sending a letter offering two dates in mid-January for commencing bargaining. The parties ultimately met on January 22, 1981, and continued to meet at intervals until November 5, 1981.

Early in their negotiations, the parties agreed on ground rules for conducting their meetings.[5] It was also agreed that economic issues would be deferred until later in the negotiations.

At the first session the Union gave Respondent's committee a package of most of its proposals. Over the course of the next several sessions these were presented by various union committee members who explained the rationale behind each proposal and answered questions. Respondent later responded by delivering its own proposals and an explanation of its rationale for each.

Over the course of their meetings, tentative[6] agreement was reached on many issues,[7] but 15 proposals remained unsettled when negotiation broke down. These were: management rights, no-strike rules and corrective discipline, union security, arbitration, wages, seniority, subcontracting, jury duty, medical and life insurance, complete agreement, term of agreement, successors and assigns, holidays for part-time employees, and credit union checkoff.[8]

During the course of negotiations, Michael Sweet, a member of Respondent's negotiations team, made notes of each bargaining session. Kelly relied on these notes to refresh his recollection of the parties' negotiations when he testified at the hearing before me. (Tr. 1118.) At the conclusion of Kelly's direct testimony, Respondent produced the notes in response to the General Counsel's request. The General Counsel introduced these notes into evidence and they were admitted, without limitation, as to what was said at the meetings. (G.C. Exh. 7, Tr. 1127–1130.)

In its brief the General Counsel urges that the notes be relied on as an accurate representation of what occurred at the bargaining table. Respondent's counsel, Canoni, confirmed that the notes reflect what transpired at the meetings, "at least as reflected by the minutes." (Tr. 1127.) I have noted that the minutes are not necessarily complete and have relied on them only when they conflict with or supplement the testimony given at the hearing.

D. Areas in Dispute

1. Jury duty

On February 26, the Union presented its proposal for handling employees called to jury duty:

[4] All reference to the LLSD contract are to the first bargaining agreement which was in effect from June 1, 1980, until May 31, 1982, unless otherwise noted.

[5] These included, inter alia, recognition of full authority of Kelly to negotiate and initial tentative agreements, and the requirement that Prentice-Hall's executive committee and a majority of unit members present on behalf of the Union approve and ratify and contract.

[6] Tentative because final agreement on any single issue was clearly contingent on agreement on a contract as a whole.

[7] Agreement was reached on 23 proposals between April 1, and November 5, 1981. In the order in which they were agreed on they were: military service, savings clause (April 1); no discrimination, job posting (May 12); visitation rights, probationary period (May 27); access to records, overtime, information (June 6); recognition, leave of absence (June 11); personal days (June 24); profit sharing (July 16); bulletin board (July 23); bereavement leave (August 12); grievance procedure (September 3); sick leave, holidays, severance pay (September 24); other benefits, vacations (October 22); union stewards, workweek (November 5).

[8] A 16th proposal, proposed by the Union on February 12 and discussed briefly on March 12, entitled health and safety, was never raised again by the Union.

> An employee called to serve on Jury Duty or to appear as a witness in any legal proceeding shall receive his or her regular weekly salary during the period of such service.

Senick characterized this clause as essentially embodying the Company's current policy as expressed in YAYCO.[9]

Respondent's counterproposal, presented at the May 12 meeting, limited paid time off for jury duty to 10 days, permitted the Company to require verification from the clerk of the court, required 24 hours' notice to the Company, required the employee to report to work if released from duty during the workday, and was applicable only to persons whose employment exceeded 1 year.

After some discussion and a union counterproposal, Respondent dropped its 1-year requirement but restricted jury duty benefits to employees who had completed their probationary periods, and substituted "prompt" notice for its 24-hour notice requirement.

By September 3, conflict over this clause centered on the proposed 10-day ceiling on paid jury duty leave per calendar year. Kelly asserted that this limitation was consistent with the Company's current policy, although on cross-examination he admitted that it was not expressly included in YAYCO. His explanation for this discrepancy was that YAYCO merely set forth nonbinding company policy but a contractual agreement was obligatory and to avoid future misunderstandings should be explicit. Furthermore, Kelly asserted that CSD employees abused paid absences more than other company employees, and that because the cost to the Company tied into the total economic cost of the contract as a whole, the current proposal was reasonable. Kelly also stated that he had no obligation to propose anything in YAYCO.

As previously noted, before becoming a union negotiator, Senick had been an employee with Prentice-Hall's looseleaf editors division for 5-1/2 years. In response to Kelly's assertions, he stated that he was never aware of any time limitation on jury duty benefits during his tenure of employment, that no such limitation was imposed under the terms of YAYCO, and that he would not accept less than what other Prentice-Hall employees enjoyed.

On cross-examination, Kelly, who admitted that there was no time limit imposed on paid jury duty in the LLSD contract, reasoned that in the editors' unit 85 percent of the employees were attorneys and here not eligible for jury duty.

There was no further discussion of the jury duty clause following the October 22 meeting.

2. Successors and assigns

At the March 12 meeting, Senick explained that the purpose behind the Union's proposal was to bind successors and assigns to the terms of the contract and thereby avoid "being transferred into lawsuits" in the event of a transfer of CSD. In addition to binding its successors and assign under the clause, Respondent would also be required to give a 30-day notice of its intention to sell the business and, further, not to sell unless and until the purchaser first agreed to accept and assume in writing all terms of the agreement and to continue all existing rights of the employees. Kelly agreed to return with other language.

On April 21 Kelly informed the Union that this issue was covered by the management-rights clause where the Company reserved the "sole right to discontinue temporarily or permanently, in whole or in part, the operation of its business or to sell part or all of such business operation." Under these terms Prentice-Hall would retain the unconditional right to sell or otherwise dispose of its business.

The Union's desire to condition a sale or other transfer of CSD on the purchaser's acceptance and assumption in writing of the contractual terms established by the contract was in direct conflict with Respondent's desire to retain the unabridged right to dispose of this part of its business. Senick asserted that language binding successors to the contract was common, and Kelly countered that it was not in every contract.[10]

On May 12 Kelly offered what was to be Respondent's final proposal on this topic. This clause obligated Respondent to notify the Union 30 days prior to the sale or other disposition of CSD, as had been proposed by the Union in its prior proposal. Unlike the Union's clause, however, it did not bind the successor to the contract between CSD and Prentice-Hall and Senick objected to it on this basis.

Senick presented a new proposal on July 16: "This agreement shall inure to the benefit of and bind the parties and their successors and assigns." He characterized this language as a "very simple clause that's included in most agreements."[11]

Kelly formulated numerous hypothetical situations and inquired what the application of the clause would be in each case. It soon became clear that Senick had not anticipated all possible scenarios to which the clause might be applied. This discussion was soon terminated by Senick who admitted his lack of competence to respond to Kelly's questions regarding the legal consequences in specific circumstances.

No new proposals on successors and assigns were exchanged after July 16. Although it was discussed briefly on three more occasions,[12] no further substantive comments were made by either party.

3. Medical and life insurance

Among the Union's initial proposals was a clause continuing the employee's current level of benefits from the Company, and adding dental, optical, and prescription

[9] "YAYCO" is an acronym for "You and Your Company," which is essentially the Company's benefits handbook.

[10] At least two of a group of contracts that Respondent offered in evidence, in the publishing field, contain such clauses, Winthrop Publishers, Inc., a subsidiary of Respondent, and Amsco School Publications, Inc.

coverage equal to or greater than that provided by the Union's own insurance plan (District 65—Security Plan).

At the February 26 meeting, Senick defined this topic as an economic area and indicated a preference to defer further discussion of the clause until a later date. However, the Union did turn over a copy of its insurance plan, including the costs to the employer associated with it. Senick also responded to questions put to him by Kelly concerning the Union's plan dental, optical, and prescription coverage at the March 12 session. Senick also agreed to supply additional information so Kelly could compare the union plan's coverage and its cost to other plans. On July 8 Bernice Krawczyk made a presentation on the optical and dental benefits under the District 65 plan then in effect.

Respondent's first proposal on this issue was given to the Union on May 12. It continued the current coverage enjoyed by the employees, but did not add any of the additional benefits sought by the Union. The Company's clause expressly excluded matters involving insurance benefits from arbitration.

The Union dropped its demand for the prescription benefits from its proposal on July 8. Senick stressed the importance of dental and optical coverage.

On July 16 Kelly presented a company proposal which would give CSD employees the optical and dental coverage under the District 65 plan only if Respondent decided to extend some dental and optical coverage to other company employees in Bergen County, New Jersey. Kelly would not comment on whether ther were existing plans to cover other employees and admitted that other employees could get greater coverage than that provided under the union plan, while CSD employees would be limited to that plan's benefits.

The entire clause as provided for by the Company was not subject to arbitration under the agreement. The Company's notes reflect that Senick pointed out at the July 16 meeting that this lack of arbitrability was preventing the Union from agreeing to the clause.

The question of arbitrability of dispute arising under this clause was discussed further on July 21. At that meeting the Union submitted to the Respondent the same clause previously offered by Respondent, but without excluding arbitration. Kelly expressed concern over the Company's becoming involved in an arbitration of administrative matters outside its control. Senick acknowledged the validity of this concern and expressed his willingness to look at a proposal excluding problems with the insurance carrier from arbitration.

At the August 12 meeting Kelly reported that the Company would remain with its earlier proposal because he was unable to come up with acceptable language. However, he did invite the Union to submit a proposal for consideration. Senick responded on September 3 with language excluding insurance matters "within the sole control of the insurance carrier . . . [from] the grievance or arbitration provisions of the contract."

Kelly objected to this language, saying it was "too general," but agreed to look into it. On September 24 he returned to the table, restated his position that the language proposed by Senick was too broad, and that, because he too had been unable to come up with acceptable language, Respondent's earlier proposal continued to be its position on this clause.

On October 5 the parties' positions were clearly polarized on the question of arbitration. Kelly was particularly concerned about frivolous grievances. He maintained that the entire clause should not be subject to arbitration and placed the onus on Senick to convince him otherwise. In support of his position Kelly cited the Union's history of filing frivolous grievances,[13] and expressed an unwillingness to permit grievance and arbitration for this small segment of the employees complement when the remainder of the employees had no such coverage.

At their next meeting, held November 5, Senick expressed doubt that any agreement could be reached on this question unless one of the parties changed their position. Neither had and they scheduled a future meeting for November 19.[14]

4. Grievance and arbitration

Grievance and arbitration were first introduced by the Union in a single clause containing a four-step process for resolving disputes. The Company's proposal, submitted on April 21, treated the two clauses separately. Each of these clauses was discussed on numerous occasions during the course of negotiations, and agreement was eventually reached on the grievance clause. The arbitration clause remained unsettled when negotiations ended in November.

When the Union's proposal for a grievance and arbitration clause was first presented at the bargaining table on February 12, Senick told Respondent's negotiating team that this clause was one of particular importance to the unit because it allowed for an orderly resolution of problems arising both under the contract and in the workplace in general. Kelly objected to the absence of time limits for employees to raise grievances on the grounds that time constraints would help eliminate the frivolous grievances the Union had a history of bringing against the Company.[15]

---

[13] See discussion, sec. II,D,4 at fn. 15, infra, regarding the Respondent's claims about its excessive arbitration burden and costs in the LLSD unit.

[14] This meeting never took place and November 5 was the final negotiation session.

[15] In the bargaining notes, Kelly refers to District 65's history of filing frivolous grievances over promotions. This reference pertains to the arbitration proceeding between the LLSD and Prentice-Hall which had taken place on 14 days between October 31, 1980, and January 19, 1981. The grievances, filed by 13 employees, were all dismissed by the arbitrator who found that Respondent had not violated the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement when it refused to promote, upgrade, or reclassify the grievants under the terms of position description referred to but not set forth in the bargaining agreement, and that the Union was seeking to obtain, through arbitration, remedies it should have and failed to obtain in negotiations. Kelly implied that time limits would have barred these grievances on procedural grounds, thereby saving Respondent the time and expense of arbitration. On cross-examination Kelly estimated the cost of these proceedings at approximately $50,000: $3000 actually paid to the arbitrator, and $47,000 in costs of management's time and legal fees directly attributable to the proceedings. (Tr. 873–875.) With this kind of history, one would have concluded that, for the successor LLSD agreement, the Company would have insisted on more strict time limitations for pursuing grievances at each step of the process. Yet, a close examination of the two LLSD agreements in evidence reveals that

Continued

Shortly before the April 1 negotiations, Respondent had given the Union its package of proposals. Respondent's initial arbitration proposal permitted either party to seek arbitration, but only after the grievance procedure had been exhausted without yielding a satisfactory resolution of the dispute and after notice had been given to the other party. A mutually agreed-on arbitrator would then make a decision and finding, which would be final and binding on the parties. The grievance and arbitration procedures would be the "sole and exclusive means for the settlement of all disputes that may arise between [the parties]."

The substantive provisions of the proposal denied the arbitrator the authority to modify the contract and limited the scope of its interpretation. The arbitrator could not construe the contractual provision in question in any way that was inconsistent with the management's-rights clause.[16] In a conflict between management rights and any article or provision of the agreement the parties agree their intent is for management rights to prevail.

In addition, the arbitration proposal called for the costs of the arbitration proceeding to be paid by the loser, or, if there was no clear resolution, to be shared equally by the parties. Backpay awards would be limited to the grievant's regular compensation, less any unemployment or other compensation he could have received from any source during the relevant period. However, no award could date back further than the date that the cause of the grievance arose or the date before it was first reduced to a written presentation—whichever was later.[17] Each arbitration proceeding would be limited to one grievance from one employee, unless the parties had agreed, in writing, to the contrary.

Senick responded at the April 1 meeting by introducing another proposal. According to the Company's bargaining notes, he identified several problems that the Union had with management's grievance and arbitration clauses and stated that in its new proposal the Union had attempted to address both its own and the Company's concerns.[18]

Senick noted specifically that the Union had a problem with the time limits imposed by Respondent's grievance and arbitration proposals. The newest union arbitration proposal allowed either party 20 days from the date of receiving a response to the last step of the grievance procedure to submit the grievance to arbitration. The Company's proposal had allowed only 10 days from the date the final step in grievance was initiated and required 2 days' notice from the Union of its intention to file with the American Arbitration Association (AAA).

Senick also disagreed with Respondent's proposed language requiring that a mutually agreed-on arbitrator hear their disputes. He pointed out that this language was a modification of the voluntary rules of the AAA that the Union proposed be adopted.[19]

Kelly testified that his goal in these negotiations was to settle disputes at the bargaining table and to get a contract that could be administered with a minimum of disputes and resort to costly arbitration.[20] Concern was after the complained-of arbitration proceeding, the new (1982–1985) LLSD agreement contained more liberal time limits for processing grievances at steps 2 and 3 and to final and binding arbitration. However, the successor agreement does contain a more detailed management-rights clause which, inter alia, specifically reserves to the Company the sole right to promulgate, revise, and change position descriptions as it deems necessary or advisable—the very subject matter to which the Union had asserted claims of breach in the unsuccessful LLSD unit arbitrations.

[16] The original management-rights clause read as follows:

MANAGEMENT RIGHTS

2.0 Prentice-Hall shall have the right to promulgate position descriptions, work rules and procedures relating to employment, and to revise and change such descriptions, rules and procedures from time to time as it deems necessary or advisable.

2.1 Prentice-Hall shall have the sole right: to conduct its business, direct and control its operations and manage its affairs as it deems necessary and/or expedient; to hire; to discharge; to layoff; to suspend; to promote; to demote; to assign duties to; to transfer employees; to increase or decrease the work force; to abolish; restructure or rearrange departments, functions, and operations; to transfer equipment, personnel and operations to other locations; to schedule work; to train personnel; to assign and change the work, duties, and job functions of specific employees including supervisors; to alter and/or change the type and nature of its operations; to promote and maintain efficiency in its operations or methods; to determine the materials to be produced or worked on by employees or by outside contractors or at other facilities; to determine the number, locations and sub-division of the department that may operate; to move the unit or any of its parts or areas to other areas or locations; to determine the schedules of production; to maintain order and efficiency at its operations; to determine the qualifications of employees; to determine job content; to determine the starting and quitting time; to determine the number of hours to be worked; to introduce new equipment, machinery or processes; to discontinue, temporarily or permanently, in whole or in part, the operations of its business or to sell part or all of such business or operations; to decide the nature of materials, services, supplies, equipment, or machinery to be used; to subcontract any or all of the operations, present or future; to determine the number of employees assigned to any particular operations; to determine the work place; to establish performance standards and evaluate employees; performance based on the standards, to establish, change, combine or abolish job classifications and the job content of any job classifications; to determine when overtime shall be worked and to require overtime; and to carry out the ordinary and customary functions of management. No such rights or authority shall be deemed waived or modified in whole or in part unless such waiver or modification is in writing and signed by the parties hereto.

2.2 Management shall have all other rights and prerogatives including those exercised unilaterally in the past even though not particularly enumerated above.

2.3 The failure of Prentice-Hall to insist upon a strict performance of any of its rights under, or of any of the terms or conditions contained in, this Agreement shall not be deemed a waiver or modification of such rights or remedies nor shall it be deemed a waiver or modification of its rights to insist upon a strict performance of all the terms and conditions of the Agreement thereafter.

2.4 Should the Union at anytime hereafter enter into an agreement with any publishing company or composition company operating within the Greater Metropolitan New York area or any other area served by Prentice-Hall, or should the Union in the case of any publisher or composition company with which it has a contract, countenance a course of conduct by such company enabling it to operate under more advantageous terms and conditions than is provided for in this Agreement, Prentice-Hall, party to this Agreement, shall be privileged to adopt such advantageous terms and conditions.

[17] It is obvious that, as a practical matter, the date on which the grievance is filed will never precede the date on which it arose. On May 12, the notes show that Senick "agreed" that the award should be backdated to the date on which the grievance occurred.

[18] The Union's proposal on this date still addressed grievance and arbitration in a single article. This immediate discussion will not address the grievance provisions unless necessary to clarify any references to the arbitration provisions.

[19] The voluntary rules were not placed in evidence by either party.

[20] Again Kelly's position was grounded in the Company's prior experience with District 65's looseleaf editor's unit described supra.

also expressed about the length of such proceedings. He also testified that there were other available means of enforcing the contract without arbitration—for example, in the courts as a contract suit. (Tr. 871.) This testimony is directly-contradicted, however, by the language of paragraph 6.1 of its arbitration proposal, maintained by Respondent to the very end, which provides that "It is the intent of the parties that the procedure set forth here and in Article 5, Grievances shall serve as the sole and exclusive means for the settlement of all disputes that may arise between them. [Emphasis added.]" Indeed, under questioning by me Kelly admitted that under paragraph 6.1 and paragraph 4.5 of Respondent's final proposal on rules and corrective discipline (the sole recourse for resolution of disputes regarding discipline and discharge shall be the grievance procedures, with absolutely no recourse to arbitration),[21] the Union could not bring a lawsuit disputing a Respondent disciplinary action and would be limited to grieving a disciplinary action, without any further recourse following the Company's rejection of it. (Tr. 1290.) In any event, it is also interesting to note that Kelly subsequently acknowledged that court suits were more expensive than arbitration and that the Company's negotiating committee never compared the length of arbitration to that of a court suit. (Tr. 882.)

On April 21, Prentice-Hall gave the Union another copy of its original article, with one very minor change. This proposal adopted the Union's language that the time limit for submitting a grievance to arbitration would begin to run from the date of the response after the final step in the grievance procedure. The limit itself remained the same (10 days) with 2 days' notice of the Union's intent to Respondent, but no reciprocal obligation on Respondent's part.[22]

The discussion again turned to the process of selecting an arbitrator. Senick again advanced the AAA selection process, arguing that it was fair and workable and preferable to delaying an arbitration. Kelly asserted that it was unlikely that both sides would exhaust list after list and that to argue otherwise was "simply a lack of trust."

Senick moved on and noted problems with Respondent's proposal that the loser in an arbitration would bear the total cost unless there were no clear-cut loser. In addition, he stressed the problems of having the rights outlined in the management-rights clause supersede in the case of a conflict between it and any other contractual provision. Senick was identified in the Company's notes as saying: "The way I read it, anytime there's a problem over a clause interpretation you say it's covered by Management Rights, the Union would be out of the ballpark. It is a clause we cannot accept, because it is all consuming. It cuts across-the-board at all our positions." The notes do not indicate any response by Kelly.

On May 12 the Union returned with a proposal that adopted some of the Company's language limiting backpay in settlement awards and permitting extensions of the time limits only by mutual consent. Failure to meet the time constraints would be deemed a waiver or settlement of the grievance, as Respondent had proposed. The Union's proposal also reduced the proposed time period for submitting grievances to 15 days from the 20 days in its original article.

The May 12 negotiation session dealt with arbitration briefly. The discussion focused primarily on the time limits imposed by Respondent's clause on initiating the arbitration proceedings.

> In the event the grievance procedure does not result in a satisfactory adjustment of the formal grievance in question within ten (10) working days after the Step 3 response,[23] either side may submit an eligible grievance in writing to arbitration before the American Arbitration Association (AAA) provided however, that 1) at least two (2) working days notice is given to Prentice-Hall prior to any filing with the AAA and 2) that such matter has been submitted to the AAA within (30) working days after it was first raised at the final step. It is agreed that only the New Jersey Office of AAA will be used. The AAA is not empowered to select any arbitrator the parties do not mutually agree on.

Respondent extended the 10-day filing period in the paragraph quoted above to 15 days in its next proposal, submitted on May 27. Senick was under the impression that this time period was a cooling off period, during which no action could be taken, and that by extending it in this context the Union effectively had even less time to file for arbitration than they had initially. Kelly clarified the intent of this language which was to give the Union 15 days after the step 3 grievance procedure in which to file.

Respondent also modified the clause covering the cost of arbitration. The expenses under this proposal would be paid by both parties equally regardless of the outcome of the dispute. Kelly characterized this as a "major economic concession."

Senick once again expressed his dissatisfaction with the language requiring mutual agreement on an arbitrator. Kelly submitted that in view of Respondent's "major economic concession" in this clause, he thought that the Union could consent to mutually agree on an arbitrator. Senick did not immediately connect an economic concession with the equal liability for the cost of arbitration and did not consider this in formulating the Union's position. Kelly defined his position, noting that Respondent had never gone beyond the second panel list in selecting an arbitrator. This assertion did not persuade Senick to accept the proposed language.

Regarding backpay awards, Kelly expanded on what "compensation from any other source" to be deducted from any award would encompass: "For example, unemployment. We should not be liable for compensation that an employee would have received but refused to. Federal or State subsistence would be other examples. If an [21] See discussion, infra at sec. II,D,6, pars. 12-20.

[22] Kelly sated that Respondent would consider extending the same right of notice to the Union.

[23] Step 3 is the final step in Respondent's grievance procedure. At this stage the grievant or Union would have 7 days to bring the grievance to the vice president for human resources who would then have 7 days to give his response.

employee doesn't take a position elsewhere it could have, it's the employees [sic] problem."

As previously noted, backpay would only be retroactive to the date when the formal grievance was filed. Senick pointed out that he found this in conflict with the Respondent's proposed informal, and optional, first step in the grievance procedure. If an employee could only recover from the date of a written filing, then the Union would recommend this be done in every instance involving backpay. Kelly could not "imagine a situation where the employee would be penalized as a result of this clause" which was aimed at discouraging employees from delaying in bringing out the facts.

At the June 4 meeting, Senick returned with a union proposal that adopted Respondent's format of having separate clauses for grievance and arbitration. The first paragraph was substantially the same as Respondent's proposal, but was redrafted for greater clarity.

The second paragraph outlined a method of selecting an arbitrator where, if after two lists there was no agreement on an individual, the parties would have an additional 30 days to mutually decide on one, or the AAA would select one for them. Kelly found this language much closer to what the Company wanted, and agreed to come back with new language.

On retroactive backpay the Union proposed that it run from the time the Company was notified of the problem, whether orally or in writing. The Union's proposal omitted entirely the provision giving precedence to the management-rights clause over any other contract clause in a dispute, but adopted Prentice-Hall's language binding the parties to the arbitrator's decision, prohibiting the arbitrator from modifying the terms of the agreement, and allowing only one grievance from one employee at each arbitration unless the parties agreed in writing, to the contrary.

Discussion of this clause continued on June 11 when Kelly turned over Respondent's next proposal. It adopted the Union's language establishing the timeframe during which an arbitration could be filed, deleted its own requirement, which had been adopted by the Union, that only the New Jersey AAA office be used, and adopted the essence of the Union's proposal for selecting an arbitrator.

Regarding retroactive pay, Respondent deleted its previous requirement that it begin to accrue only from the time the grievance was presented in writing, thus bringing it into line with the Union's proposal. Senick questioned the computation of backpay based on compensation the employee could have received from other sources while the dispute with the Company was being processed. He asserted that this was too speculative and that the employee's compensation should be offset only by what was actually received. Kelly objected to this proposal because it would permit an employee to refuse another job offer and still get paid by Respondent. Senick speculated that narrower language could be found to address both parties' concerns.

However, Respondent's article retained the provision requiring deference to the management-rights clause in the event of a conflict between it and any other article in the agreement.[24] In response to Senick's objections, Kelly asserted that this clause was very important to Respondent, and that, if necessary, Respondent would be willing to defer agreement on arbitration until the management-rights clause had been more clearly defined.

Senick also expressed misgivings over Respondent's language limiting recourse for all disputes solely and exclusively to the grievance and arbitration clauses. He pointed out that a number of clauses were not subject to arbitration and stated that the Union required a means of enforcing the contract.[25]

Further discussions took place on September 24 and October 5. Senick testified that at the first of these two meetings he again raised the problem of resolving disputes in favor of management rights, and noted the lack of arbitration in many clauses. At the next meeting, according to the Company's notes, Senick clarified that the sole and exclusive recourse language applied to disputes that were subject to grievance and arbitration and that no action could be brought for breach of contract. He acknowledged that he could agree to this, but that he could not accept the language defering to management rights because it weighed too heavily in Respondent's favor. However, I find the attribution of this acceptance to Senick in the notes is misleading. Based on facts brought out in the course of the hearing, Senick's willingness to accept the grievance and arbitration proceeding as conclusive was based on the conjunction of the arbitration phase where the final determination was in the hands of a disinterested third party and not concerning those bargaining subjects only made grievable and subject to final determination by the Company.[26]

No further substantive discussion of this clause took place after October 5.[27]

Concerning the separate grievance clause, the history of its negotiations illustrates some of the bargaining tactics employed by Respondent particularly in seeking to eliminate or severely restrict the exercise by employees of their Section 7 rights. While, as earlier noted, agreement on a clause was ultimately reached before negotiations broke down, substantial time was expended at the sessions in grappling with the Company's demands in this

[24] Respondent's express intent was that if a conflict were established, then the case would be closed.

[25] Senick testified that at the first session after his receipt of the Respondent's initial set of proposals, held on April 1, he told the company representatives that "Under those circumstances, many of the clauses would be unenforceable. I would have no means of resolving disputes between us."

[26] This finding is grounded in discussions between the parties of both the arbitration clause and of the other subjects which Respondent expressly excluded from arbitration. (See, e.g., Rules and Corrective Discipline, sec. II,D,6, infra.)

[27] During the course of this meeting Senick said he would try to bring in an acceptable proposal dealing with the deference accorded management rights in this case of conflict with another contractual provision that the Union could not accept. Senick's response at the October 22 meetings shows that the matter had slipped his mind. I conclude, however, that the breach between the parties was so profound on the conclusive deference to be accorded management rights, each side maintaining its position as firm and unyielding and basic to its negotiating posture, that an impasse was truly reached probably as early as June 11, assuming, without deciding the matter here, that Respondent's proposal was made in good faith.

area, which delayed agreement on this clause and another as well. Thus, the Company's first counterproposal discussed on April 1 required a prior discussion between employee and department head before a complaint could be considered a grievance—a procedure which Senick noted unduly restricts the employees' access to the Union. Similarly, Senick criticized the Company's proposal for a 2-day limit from incident to grievance filing with the vice president as unduly short.

The Company's April 21 proposal also providing that "the degree of discipline imposed and the reasons for discipline are in the sole discretion of Prentice-Hall and shall not be subject to review under Article 6, Arbitration" was totally unacceptable to Senick, who informed the Company "we couldn't agree to any kind of a just cause standard that wasn't tied to an arbitration provision in some way."

From the very first company proposal before April 1, until shortly before agreement was reached in September, Respondent demanded that employees be prohibited from engaging in union activities on its premises, including union business of seeking to enforce the agreement through filing and processing of grievances. Meetings between employees and with the shop steward were to be on their own time and expense during nonworking time and off premises. Senick's position was that this was totally unacceptable.

Over time, the Company eliminated certain restrictive clauses in its grievance article, dropping on May 27 the requirement of a prior supervisor meeting, the clause providing the Company prevailed on a failure to meet time limits by either side, and severe restrictions on the filing periods. Although the language excluding discharges from arbitration was dropped in the grievance proposal it was still retained in the discipline clause. As to the prohibition on union activity on company premises, Senick by June 4 had proposed limiting such activities to employees' nonworktime. The Company's June 11 proposal now permitted an employee to meet with a steward to discuss a grievance during nonworktime in a nonwork area, but Senick commented "we don't think we can waive [employee statutory] rights."

On July 23, Senick noted the primary remaining difference on the grievance article was the on-premises agreement (relating to nongrievance union activity). Kelly continued to seek a waiver of that right. "Faced with the realities of a miniscule unit in a large company we would like to limit the unit to unit business." Finally, on August 12 the Company removed the prohibition of union activity on company premises from the grievance article but now incorporated it in a revised stewards' article. When Senick expressed anger at this tactic, Kelly assured him it would not be moved again but expressed the position that the prohibition was an extremely important clause and the Company was unwilling to remove it from the contract.[28]

[28] No such restriction appears in either the first or second LLSD agreement and none was sought by the Company in the second round of negotiations.

The stewards' article continued the prohibition until agreement on a clause was finally reached on November 5 at the last meeting when the Company agreed to change the prohibition from Prentice-Hall's premises to "in a work area." A company demand that union stewards be liable in the event of a job action was retained and agreed to by the Union in the final clause which the parties initialed.

5. Management rights[29]

Respondent's first contract proposal included an article in which it reserved certain rights within its exclusive domain. In addition, Respondent proposed that the rights reserved under the management-rights clause would take precedence over all other terms negotiated and adopted by the parties in the event of a dispute which could be resolved under either management rights or some other clause in the agreement.[30]

When this article was first discussed on April 9, Senick allowed that he had no problem in theory with including this type of provision in the contract. However, he stated that he was reluctant to agree to such a lengthy and broad proposal before knowing how it would fit in with the remainder of the contract. Kelly emphasized the importance Respondent attached to this proposal which, he added, incorporated Respondent's response to many of the Union's individual proposals.

A revised proposal was passed to the Union on April 21 which omitted language granting management "all other rights and perogatives including those exercised unilaterally in the past even though not particularly enumerated above." According to Kelly, this language had been the only target of the Union's criticism that Respondent had noted in their previous discussion. Senick's response (according to the Company's notes) was that the Union had "other problems" with this clause. His testimony at the hearing was that the proposal was still "too overbroad."

The issue of management rights came up again on July 23 when Senick questioned Respondent's inclusion of position descriptions as a reserved right when they had previously stated that no descriptions existed. Kelly explained that Respondent wanted to preserve its right to promulgated job descriptions if it desired them at some future date.

In addition, Senick expressed the opinion that Respondent's clause was redundant in part; and he objected to the Company's "most favored nation" language where the Company would be entitled to adopt any more advantages terms or conditions from future contracts negotiated by District 65 within the New York metropolitan [29] Respondent's first management-rights proposal is quoted in its entirety in sec. II,D,4, at fn. 16, supra.

[30] This result would be achieved by the language proposed by Respondent for the arbitration clause:

> It is expressly recognized that for purposes of contract interpretation by any arbitrator if any Article or provision of this agreement conflicts in any way with Article 2, Management Rights, than the parties agree that their intent's for Article 2, Management Rights to prevail.

See discussion in sec. II,D,4, Arbitration, supra.

area. Kelly asserted that this was a starting position and expressed his willingness to entertain other proposals.

On August 12, Senick expressed his opinion that Respondent's clause was complicated and redundant. He then submitted the Union's first proposal covering management rights. In substance it delegated to Respondent all rights to manage the business "except as expressly modified or limited by this Agreement." This proposal bore great similarity to the one adopted in the looseleaf editors' contract.[31]

When Kelly returned with Respondent's next proposal on September 3, he noted certain deletions from the earlier proposal aimed at "tightening up" the language. However, he confirmed Senick's observation that the intent of the clause remained unchanged.

In response, Senick gave management a new proposal on September 24. It adopted some of Respondent's language enumerating the exact nature of the managerial rights reserved to Respondent, with the Union's modification "except as expressly modified or limited by this agreement."

Senick expressly rejected the Company's "most favored nation" language citing difficulty with its interpretation and application in practice. He also pointed out that Respondent had denied the Union's request to retain the right to have past practices continued.[32]

The parties were also divided over the concept of position descriptions. The Union's view was that it would like to see, discuss, and agree on them in the course of negotiations. Kelly's assertion was "that position descriptions are the sole right of management to create, administer, modify and eliminate."

On October 5, Kelly gave the union negotiators another copy of Respondent's earlier proposal. From the outset of the discussion he emphasized the clause in which none of the rights retained by Respondent under the agreement would be considered waived merely because Respondent failed to exercise them. He explained that Respondent wanted "to prevent the Union from filing grievances based upon what's done and not done."

Senick agreed to consider Respondent's desire to retain certain rights, and added that the Union would be more sympathetic regarding as yet unexercised management rights if Respondent moved on its "most favored nations clause." Kelly noted the applicability of its current proposal was limited to future contracts between District 65 and other composition and publishing companies in the metropolitan area. However, its original pre-April 1 proposal had also been so limited, specifically referring to like companies in the metropolitan New York area or any other area served by Prentice-Hall.

The parties remained in sharp disagreement over Respondent's desire to reserve the unilateral right to promulgate position descriptions. No mention of position descriptions was made in the Union's proposal because, as Senick explained, he did not want to negotiate an abstract proposal.

Kelly pointed out that the Union's proposal seemed inconsistent because, on the one hand, it acknowledged Respondent's "sole right to conduct its business . . . as it deems necessary and/or expedient, including without limitation, but on the other hand, only except as expressly modified or limited by this agreement." Further, Senick was asked to explain why the Union omitted such rights as the right to suspend, to promote, to demote, and to schedule overtime from its proposed management-rights clause although it granted management the right to discipline and discharge employees.

Senick explained that the intent behind the Union's proposal was to reach an agreement that would limit management's rights. Where a topic was covered under a separate clause, for example hours, the language of that clause would be controlling. Kelly responded that the Union's proposal failed to meet Respondent's needs, especially its exclusion of job descriptions.

On October 22 the Union returned with another proposal that incorporated verbatim the language of Respondent's clause preserving management's rights to insist on strict performance of any terms and conditions in the agreement even if not previously exercised. It remained otherwise unchanged and, according to Senick, Respondent maintained it still did not go far enough.

On November 5 Respondent came forth with another proposal. The only change was the "most favored nations" clause which would now give Respondent the option of adopting more favorable terms from any subsequent agreement between District 65 and any composition unit within the New York metropolitan area. Once again Kelly emphasized the importance of this clause to Respondent and pointed to the several changes that had been made in the clause as evidence of Respondent's willingness "to consider change and negotiate the specific language." In response to Senick's questions regarding this change, Kelly told him that the labor pool for CSD was the greater metropolitan area. Senick appeared satisfied with this explanation as to the scope of the clause because later in their discussion he acknowledged that this clause was "not much of a stumbling block now."

However, Senick was still not prepared to agree to the management-rights clause. He pointed out that the link between this article and the arbitration clause was unacceptable. Senick suggested Respondent delete the language in the arbitration proposal giving precedence to management rights in the event of a conflict and they would be much closer on both of those articles.[33] Al-

[31] The management-rights clause in the looseleaf editors' contract read as follows:

> Except as limited by this agreement, the Employer retains all of its rights, powers, discretion and authority, including but not limited to the exclusive right to hire, lay off, promote, assign duties to, transfer, discipline and discharge employees; to introduce new improved methods and facilities, and to carry out the ordinary and customary functions of management.

[32] See discussion in sec. II,D,12, Complete Agreement, infra.

[33] Neither the first nor the second LLSD contract contained a precedence clause and Respondent did not propose one for inclusion in the second agreement. By November 5, Respondent had made very few changes overall in its management-rights article. Compare fn. 16, supra. The provisions deleted were the right to: assign duties; alter the type and nature of operations; move the unit or any of its parts or areas to other locations; maintain order and efficiency; determine job content; and decide the nature of materials, services, supplies, equipment, and machinery to be used. These rights are management preogatives in any event. Two other changes, made April 21 and September 3 are noted above.

though Kelly agreed to consider it, no further negotiations were ever held.

6. Rules and corrective discipline

Among its initial proposals the Union included one on discharge and discipline which was first discussed on February 12. During a lengthy exchange it became clear that the parties were far apart on how warnings, disciplines, and discharge should be handled.

District 65 proposed that warning letters should be destroyed 1 year after execution, that employees should be given 3 weeks' notice before discharge for less than gross misconduct but under no circumstances should they be discharged for less than just cause, that employees and the Union should be given a 3-month notice before a layoff, and that disputes over discharge and layoff decisions should be decided by the grievance-arbitration process.

Respondent objected to the provision directing Prentice-Hall to destroy warning and disciplinary letters after 1 year claiming that it would both encourage recidivism and deprive the Company of a full and complete employment history for the individual. The Union's rationale was that an employee's lapse should not blemish his record indefinitely, and that a year was a reasonable length of time after which it should be purged.

The notice provisions for discharge or layoff were also objected to by Respondent. Kelly disagreed with the concept of an employee getting both notice under this provision and severance pay under the severance pay clause. In addition, Kelly saw no basis for requiring the Company to give 3 months' notice before a layoff. He pointed out that in 66 years, Prentice-Hall had never laid off an employee and that this provision would prevent the Company from acting quickly on a business decision. Senick defended the Union's position for both notice requirements on the grounds that employees need a reasonable transition period when these types of changes are being imposed on them.

The greatest areas of conflict in this article were the provisions concerning the applicable standard for discipline and discharge, review of company action under the clause by an arbitrator, and the operation of a progressive disciplinary provision which was proposed by Prentice-Hall and largely incorporated in the Union's proposal.

The Union proposed a just-cause standard for review of discharge and discipline. In the event of a disagreement which remained unsettled by the grievance procedure a final and binding determination could be made by an arbitrator. Kelly found this method of outside review totally unacceptable as illustrated by the following exchange taken from the Company's notes:

> Kelly (J.K.): . . . this in effect says an arbitrator will oversee a judgement that management makes.
> Senick (M.S.): Arbitrator routinely look at discipline and discharge situations. It is consistent with the Union-Management relationship.
>
> J.K.: If an action went to arbitration, tied to the job security clause, isn't that purely a management's judgment?
>
> M.S.: No.
> . . . .
>
> J.K.: You don't understand. Management has found an employee has violated a rule, then an employee has already been found to have violated the rule.
>
> Krawczyk (B.K.): You're saying, you are the one making judgment?
>
> J.K.: Yes.
>
> B.K.: We have a big disagreement.
> J.K.: You are right.

Management's counterproposal gave rise to a brief but heated discussion on April 1. Among other things, its proposal included a list of 33 causes for immediate discharge or other disciplinary action in addition to continuing in full force and effect all current rules and regulations and allowing Prentice-Hall to promulgate any new rules as it saw fit. Kelly's position was that the contract should spell everything out to avoid any future disagreement. Recourse for resolving disputes was to be solely through the grievance procedure, exclusive of arbitration.

On April 9, Senick responded with another union proposal that deleted all references to the notice for layoff and discharge provisions that had caused earlier debate. Its proposal required just cause for discharge and discipline, and provided a list of examples of behavior constituting just cause including "flagrant violation of reasonable company-wide rules and regulations set forth in writing." Senick emphasized the importance of the just-cause standard and resolution of disagreements by an outside arbitrator by characterizing their absence as an obstacle, if not a complete bar, to agreement.[34]

During this exchange Senick implied that Respondent was treating these unit employees more harshly than employees elsewhere in the Company and that, based on his own 5-1/2 years of employment with the Company, the list of rules was inconsistent with past practice. Some rules were considered too broad, particularly there was no recourse to arbitration. Especially noted as objectionable was the rule prohibiting "conduct that violates standards of decency and morality." Kelly defended his position on the basis of each situation being different and that decency and morality are a common clause and has been defined in many arbitration cases.

Progressive discipline was outlined in Respondent's article. Conceptually, progressive discipline was applauded by the Union, except that the Company had reserved to itself the right to elect not to follow the procedure. In Senick's view, reserving the sole right to discipline or terminate an employee without recourse to progressive discipline made the procedure meaningless and left the employees without protection. Kelly denied these assertions and the provision remained in the Company's proposal throughout the bargaining sessions.[35]

---

[34] Recourse to arbitration was presumed unless expressly limited by the terms of the proposed article. See text accompanying sec. II,D,4, at fn. 21, supra.

[35] The "right to discipline" included the right to determine the nature of the discipline imposed. As originally proposed it could consist of

Continued

In its counterproposal on June 4,[36] District 65 proposed language which incorporated the Company's structure of progressive discipline and made its implementation mandatory except where the employee's conduct rose to the level of gross misconduct. Senick emphasized again the need for a just-cause standard and included language to that effect in his proposal.[37]

Kelly for Respondent returned to the negotiations on June 24 with another proposal which omitted the list of specific reasons for immediate discipline or discharge because it was redundant, those rights having already been covered to his satisfaction by the remaining language in the clause. From the company notes Kelly appeared to have emphasized that his goal in this clause was "to make it clear that only work rules and regulations are adopted in the contract and not any past practices." In all other respects Respondent's proposal remained essentially unchanged.

Senick asked for clarification of this proposal on July 8. Among other things, Kelly told him that he could not think of any situation where an employee had been deprived of seniority as a disciplinary measure, but he wanted to retain the Company's right to do so in light of the inclusion of a seniority clause in the ultimate contract.

The chief modification in the Union's July 23 proposal was its addition of Prentice-Hall's clause permitting the Company to adopt and enforce new rules and regulations, and its incorporation and ratification of all current company rules and regulations. Demands on which the Union remained firm were: just cause for discharge and discipline, mandatory use of the progressive discipline procedure in all cases except those involving gross misconduct, and recourse to arbitration for disputes. Senick also objected to the breadth of the Respondent's clause permitting it the right to mete out the discipline of its choice. Kelly defended this provision as allowing management to determine what was appropriate.

Kelly returned with Respondent's next proposal on August 12, and enumerated the changes which had been made in this article:

> [W]e dropped the . . . sentence . . . which read "the union agreed to aid P-H in every way possible in enforcing these rules and regulations, etc." . . . we dropped the . . . sentence . . . which read to the effect "P-H reserves the sole right to determine the appropriate disciplinary action, including discharge, to be taken for violations." Also we dropped the reference to loss of seniority as it is included in "any other action." . . . [Progressive discipline] . . . now read [sic], "to achieve this result the following procedure may be followed in any case, and will be followed in all cases involving poor or unsatisfactory job performance or excessive or habitual absenteeism or lateness." So with those types of cases we have contractually agreed to follow the corrective discipline procedure. [G.C. Exh. 7.]

The new proposal also omitted the Company's right to terminate an employee without cause on payment of 2 weeks' wages and clarified that its meaning of the requirement that an employee sign a reprimand or warning may not be used to imply that such action was proper, but only that the employees received written notice of the action.

It is clear from Kelly's presentation and the discussion that followed that many of the Company's modifications did not alter the substance of their proposal, as illustrated by the following exchange:

> M.S. [Senick]: I am confused regarding [progressive discipline] being a mandatory procedure. Wouldn't the reservation of right clause at the end of the article override this.[38]
> J.K. [Kelly]: Yes.
>
> M.S.: Although you dropped loss of seniority it is included in the phrase "any other actions."
>
> J.K.: Yes, it would be a possibility. . .
> M.S.: It would [sic] be argued that this is a significant regretion [sic]. Not only is there no Just Cause clause, but the Without Cause clause [which] provided for two weeks notice payment is no longer there. We can not except [sic] discharge without recourse to the arbitration provisions . . . [G.C. Exh. 7.]

The Union's next proposal was taken verbatim from the previous one offered by Respondent with two significant differences: progressive discipline would be the required procedure in all cases except where gross misconduct is involved and the entire article would be subject to grievance and arbitration.

By November 5, the distance between the parties had been narrowed still further. Respondent's proposal included language limiting discipline to just cause; the parties were still separated on the question of arbitration.[39] Kelly stated that the Company would consider it but that he really did feel this area was for management's sole review.

During the course of negotiations Kelly pointed out that no employee had ever been dismissed or suspended from Respondent's employ for disciplinary reasons, and that Prentice-Hall was a good place to work.[40] On this "warning, loss of seniority, suspension, discharge or any other actions . . ."

[36] This article was also discussed briefly on May 12 when Kelly announced Respondent's intention to remain with its prior proposal (of April 9) until there had been further discussion. Senick testified that during the June negotiation session he asked if the Company was going to make a counterproposal, but Kelly said he was going to stand firm.

[37] Just-cause language did appear in the Company's "Grievance" clause also before the Union at this time, but a decision under the clause would still not have been subject to arbitration. Furthermore, the grievance procedure would be the sole and exclusive recourse for resolution of disciplinary conflicts where the Union disputed the Company's just cause for taking disciplinary action.

[38] The clause referred to reads as follows:

> Prentice-Hall reserves the right to terminate an employee or take any other disciplinary action in appropriate cases without recourse to the provisions of [progressive discipline].

[39] Senick told Respondent's negotiation team that if they deleted the no-arbitration clause he would concede to agree notwithstanding his reservations over progressive discipline being a discretionary procedure.

[40] Senick concurred with these statements.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Local Lodge 1835, International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO.

WE WILL NOT make unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL NOT deal directly with our employees.

WE WILL NOT unlawfully lock out our employees, replace them, and offer them conditional reinstatement.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with discharge if they refuse conditional offers of reinstatement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain in good faith with the Union and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL make the below-named employees whole, with interest, for any losses of pay and benefits without prejudice to seniority and other rights that may have resulted from our unlawful lockout:

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ELEANOR MACDONALD, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at New York, New York, on 5 days between May 17 and July 9, 1982. The complaint, issued on April 19, 1982, alleges that Respondent failed to bargain in good faith with the Charging Party, unlawfully locked out all of its unit employees, permanently replaced its unit employees, made unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment, offered its employees reinstatement on condition they forego benefits under the collective-bargaining agreement, threatened its employees with discharge, and unlawfully discharged its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent in September 1982, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Clemson Brothers, Inc., a New York corporation with an office and place of business in Middletown, New York, is engaged in the manufacture and sale of hacksaw blades and files. Respondent annually ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of New York. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The Respondent, an old family-owned business, and the Union have had a collective-bargaining contract for the period November 1, 1980, through November 1, 1983, the Company and the Union agreed, in view of the Company's claims that the business was not sufficiently profitable, that there would be no general wage increase but that there would be a cost-of-living allowance (COLA), payable in the second and third years of the contract.[1] In addition, article 33 of the contract provides

[1] The first year's COLA, due February 1, 1982, would have increased each employee's pay by $2 per week.

best copy available for a wage and fringe benefit reopener at the end of the first year:

> (33.0) . . . Either party may serve a written notice upon the other sixty (60) days prior to November 1, 1981 to amend the wage rates and fringe benefits provided for in this agreement. Upon receipt of such notice, the other party will meet immediately and negotiate in good faith concerning the modifications proposed.
> (33.1) In the event that the parties fail to agree on the modifications proposed within sixty (60) days after receipt of the aforesaid notice, any limitation upon the right of the union to strike established by the terms expressed or implied of this agreement shall terminate on and after the sixtieth (60th) day following the receipt of the aforesaid notice. In the event of a strike or lockout the contract shall terminate.

Pursuant to article 33, on August 17, 1981, the Union notified Respondent that it wished to amend the wage rates and fringe benefits, and the parties met and negotiated from September 1981 to January 1982.[2] No agreement to amend the contract was reached, and the Company told the unit employees not to report to work on February 1, 1982, the day the COLA payment was due to be made. By the time of the trial, all the unit employees except one had been recalled by Respondent.[3]

A. The Negotiations

Joseph Schrade II, secretary-treasurer of Respondent, and Emil Jeker, its vice president, represented the Company at the negotiations. John C. Gallagher, grand lodge representative, represented the Union; he was accompanied by an employee-negotiating committee. In addition, a Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS) mediator was present at some of the meetings.

In its proposal, the Union was seeking improved hospitalization benefits, an improved vacation schedule, three additional holidays, additional contribution to the IAM pension fund, 5 paid sick days, a $2-across-the-board wage increase, discontinuance of present job classifications and replacement with prior job classifications, additional paid personal days off, one-half hour paid lunch period, and increased sickness and accident benefits payments.

Respondent countered by proposing that the contract remain in force for one more year with no adjustments in wage rates or fringe benefits, waiver of the cost-of-living clause, elimination of certain holidays, fewer personal days off with pay, less vacation time, and the establishment of a hold harmless trust for the Company's liability under Federal pension legislation. The Company's avowed aim throughout the negotiations was to reduce unit labor costs by 30 percent over the next 3 years.

1. September 23, 1981

The first session of the negotiations was held on September 23, 1981. At this meeting, ground rules for the negotiations were agreed to by the parties.[4]

2. September 30, 1981

Gallagher testified that on September 30, the parties discussed the employee classification system and the Company indicated that it would not grant a wage increase. The Company confirmed that it had hired some salespeople. According to Schrade, the parties exchanged proposals and clarified their intent. The Company's representatives told the Union that Respondent had the funds to meet the Union's demands but that these were not realistic. Although Clemson Brothers had investments and capital, it was not earning a sufficient return on its manufacturing operation.

3. October 7, 1981

On October 7, according to Gallagher, the Union presented its proposal to increase disability payments and the various medical insurance programs. The parties discussed these demands, the hourly rate and the hold harmless Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) trust fund proposed by the Company. The Company was asking $1 per hour to be contributed to the fund from the employees' wages. The Union rejected this concept. On October 7, according to Schrade, he asked Gallagher for information about the pension fund portfolio. The latter told him to communicate directly with the fund director. The Union asked for information regarding the new work rules and the Company promised to produce information. Then, medical insurance was discussed.

4. October 14, 1981

On October 14, according to Gallagher, the parties discussed medical insurance. Jeker and Schrade said that orders had fallen off and business was down; Gallagher asked if they were "pleading inability to meet any demands, over poverty" and Respondent's representatives said "no, it just doesn't make sense to give any increase."

---

[2] There were also negotiations in February and March 1982.

[3] Employee Robert Hallcot is on medical leave according to Respondent. The employees who were unlawfully locked out according to the complaint were

[4] In his testimony, Gallagher mistakenly placed the first meeting on September 30, 1981.

According to Schrade, Jeker supplied certain cost information at this meeting.

5. October 16, 1981

On October 16, Gallagher testified, the Union presented a new proposal.[5] The Union asked that the Company withdraw its "take-away" program and it modified its vision care proposal. Furthermore, it dropped the holiday increase demand, decreased its pension demand, and decreased its sick leave demand. After a caucus, the Union decreased its wage demand to $1 per hour. The Company rejected the entire package. The Company stated that it had no intention of granting a wage increase. Again Gallagher asked if Respondent was pleading poverty or inability to meet the Union's demands, and again Respondent's representative replied, "no, it just doesn't make sense to grant any wage increases." Gallagher testified that he asked to see the Company's books once it claimed to be operating at a loss but that Joseph Schrade refused. According to Schrade, at this meeting, the Union cut its original proposals in half. It dropped some proposals and scaled down others. The Company said it was not going to increase its pension contribution rate and explained its fear of increased liability due to a change in the pension law. Schrade testified, "we never seriously considered" making increased pension contributions. Respondent's negotiators also told the Union that its was probably not realistic to discuss wage increases and that increases in any benefits would have to be made within a framework of decreasing labor costs.

6. October 27, 1981

On October 27, according to Gallagher, he again asked the Company to open its books to prove is was losing money, and again Respondent refused. The parties discussed Respondent's price list and the fact that it had last increased prices in February 1981. Joseph Schrade said that if the Union was willing to consider giving up some holidays, Respondent would be able to offer the Union an increase. The parties discussed the cost of disability insurance and the Union's vision program, and the Union reduced its wage demand to 50 cents per hour. The Company responded that it had no intention of granting a wage increase or additional benefits. The Union dropped its proposal to increase personal and sick leave. According to Schrade, at its meeting the Company provided information relating to disability income protection. The parties discussed the possibility of a wage increase. The Company discussed the competitiveness of the saw blade market and its difficulty in raising prices. The Company said it would consider an increase in benefits provided total labor costs to the Company were not increased. The Company again stated its goal to decrease unit labor costs 30 percent over 3 years.

7. October 30, 1981

On October 30, Gallagher testified the Company reported that it had still not heard from its insurance agent concerning disability costs. Gallagher told the Company that the employees' last wage increase had been in 1979 and asked Respondent if it had identified any other sources of cost cutting besides labor costs. The Company asked the Union to delete the COLA provision from the contract and extend the contract to November 1982. Jeker mentioned that profit sharing was a possibility but he offered no proposal relating to this subject. Jeker said the Company was losing money and Gallagher asked to see the books. At the membership meeting that day, the employees rejected the Company's offer to delete the COLA freeze the contract until 1982, and a majority of the employees voted to authorize a strike. However, Gallagher convinced the employees to continue negotiations in view of the fact that the COLA would soon take the effect and provide some economic relief.

According to Schrade, on October 30 the Company withdrew its proposals to reduce vacation, holiday, and personal time and withdrew the proposal for a hold harmless trust.

8. November 6, 1981

On November 6, the Company proposed profit-sharing plan to replace the COLA. According to Gallagher, the proposal was not well formulated and did not set forth details relating to how the plan would be administered or how profits would be computed. After this, Schrade and Jeker asked for the return of the proposal saying that it never should have been presented. The Union reduced its vision program demand at this session. Gallagher stated that he asked to see the Company's proposal. A profit-sharing proposal was given to the Union which was intended as a basis for future negotiations, especially the percentage rate. The company explained it was a skeleton proposal designed to elicit further negotiations, but Gallagher refused to discuss it saying it was "facetious." Gallagher said the Union had no ability to check the Company's profit figures. Schrade said he would present the Company's tax figures for this purpose but that he would not let the Union audit company books. The Union proposed a pension contribution of 5 cents, a reduction of its prior demand, and a 50-cent wage increase. The Union also modified its disability income proposal, revising it downward. The Company rejected the package as excessive, but said it wanted to keep talking. The Company was informed of the strike vote.

9. November 20, 1981

On November 20, according to Gallagher the Company said it would offer a wage increase in return for cutting holiday and vacation time. There was discussion of wages and business conditions, and discussion of the Company's pension liability.

The Company gave the Union the operating figures for the previous 5 years. In 1977, sales were $3,223,033 and the profit was $37,769. In the year ending June 1981, sales were $2,845,417 and the operating loss was [5] On cross-examination, Gallagher stated that there had been no meeting on October 16; the only meeting was on October 14.

$280,222.[8] The Company promised it would have a wage proposal at the next meeting.

According to Schrade, at this meeting the Company said it might grant a wage increase in return for concessions in other areas of the contract relating to paid time off. The Union's last proposal and the Company's financial position were discussed. The Company explained that although it had liquid assets it was not profitable on its current operations. In fact, the Company was losing money. The Union responded by asking to see the books, saying that unless union accountants could verify the figures the Union could not consider them. The Company refused to permit the Union to inspect its books. The Company said it would not increase pension contributions. Schrade promised that the Company would make a wage offer at the next meeting. However, Schrade testified that before the next meeting, he was overruled by Richard Schrade, president of Respondent.

10. December 9, 1981

On December 9, Gallagher testified, Joseph Schrade said the Company wanted to eliminate the COLA and did not wish to give any raise. He refused to have a union accountant go over the Company's books. Schrade stated that COLA would be paid to any employee who was working on February 1, 1982. According to Schrade, at this meeting, the Company made no wage offer. It proposed a zero increase explaining that the manufacturing end of the business was not providing an adequate rate of return. At this session, the Company first indicated there might be anyone working on February 1, 1982, if the Union did not waive the COLA, by saying that COLA would be paid to anyone who was working on February 1.

11. January 26, 1982

On January 26, according to Gallagher, the parties met as a result of an urgent call from Emil Jeker. They discussed the COLA, and Schrade said the Company would not pay the COLA that was due on February 1. Gallagher again asked if the Company was pleading poverty or inability to meet the Union's demands, and Schrade replied, "No, it just doesn't make sense to pay it." Schrade said that if there was no agreement to waive the COLA, the plant would be closed. Jeker said Respondent wanted a wage freeze with a reopener later in 1982. The Union said this did not make sense based on past experience. The Union proposed a $600 bonus for each employee per year in lieu of the COLA, but the Company rejected this plan. The Company proposed a bonus of 5 hours' pay, or about $35, for each employee that year. Gallagher asked whether the Company was pleading inability to pay. Respondent's representatives replied that they had made an offer and that the plant would be closed if the Union did not agree to waive the COLA. The Company did not say it was terminating the contract nor that it was locking out the employees.

According to Schrade, on January 26, 1982, the Company twice stated that in the absence of a waiver of the COLA, the plant would be closed. The Company explained that it was not pleading inability to pay, only that it made no sense to pay. Gallagher offered to waive the COLA for a bonus of $600 per year. Schrade said this was a very positive proposal and "very constructive" but that the parties were far apart on the numbers. The Company offered 1 hour's bonus and the offer was amended to propose a bonus of 5 hours' pay for the second year of the contract and 10 hours' pay for the third year. The Union would not accept this.

Schrade testified that impasse was reached on January 26, 1982. The impasse occurred when the Company told the Union that time was running out and that a concession was needed, and the Union offered a bonus in lieu of the COLA but no agreement was ever reached. Respondent's managers had believed for some time that it was unlikely the parties would settle their differences. They had discussed locking out the employees as early as October 30, 1982, and sought the advice of counsel on this point.

B. The Lockout

On January 27, 1982, Respondent had a press release read to its assembled employees. The release stated:

> Clemson Bros. today announced the lay off of all hourly employees at the end of work on Friday 29 January 1982. The Company said that negotiations of freeze wages have been unsuccessful. In the absence of such an agreement the Company believes that continued operations under terms of the present labor contract to be uneconomical.
>
> The leadership of Local 1835 of I.A.M. which represents Clemson hourly workers has not informed the Company whether or not Company proposals have been presented to the membership for a acceptance or rejection.
> Clemson Bros. has had unsatisfactory operating results for several years.

Schrade testified that the notice used the term "lay off" instead of lockout in order to avoid sabotage. Schrade said the Company would not have laid off the employees if the Union had agreed to waive the COLA payments. The reason for the lockout of the employees was to employ economic pressure to cause the Union to accept the Company's terms and to avoid paying the COLA. The Company did not continue to make pension or dental plan contributions under the collective-bargaining agreement; however, Schrade said the Company did not consider the employees as discharged during the lockout.

[8] According to Vincent Fox, a member of the union negotiating committee, the Company mentioned as early as September 1981 that it had lost $280,000 in the preceding fiscal year.

Jack Judelson, Respondent's independent accountant for the last 18 years, testified that a new generation of the family has taken over the management of Respondent and is attempting to make it profitable. The business is overcapitalized and has excess cash to invest. At least 4 years ago, Judelson advised management that unless the business could show a net profit of at least $300,000 it should be sold or terminated. In the last 4 years, the Company's operating losses have totaled about $390,000 and $280,000 of this was experienced in 1981. The Company has a surplus generated by its investments, but this is declining due to the operating losses.

On January 29, 1982, the production manager gave each unit employee a layoff slip, a slip for unemployment insurance, a set of medical insurance conversion papers, and any severance pay due under the contract. Gallagher was notified of the layoff by the employees, but Respondent never notified him of its actions.

The plant did not close on February 1. There was inventory on hand and there were outstanding orders to fill. In addition, some goods in process could be finished rapidly. The clerical employees worked in the plant and three wives of company officials had skills and were put to work. In addition, 7 to 10 outsiders were hired. They were told that a labor dispute was in progress and they were not promised permanent employment. Schrade testified that five of these are still on the payroll performing nonbargaining unit work.

On February 12, 1982, Respondent addressed a letter to 19 of its 26 employees offering them their jobs at their old wages, but without payment of the COLA and without pension or dental plan contributions. The letter required acceptance by February 22, and warned that if the employees did not come back to work "we will attempt to find a replacement for you. Should we succeed, you may be permanently discharged." Respondent did not send copies to Gallagher or to any other union official.

The Company received identical responses from the employees accepting the offer to return to work but refusing to waive COLA, pension, and dental payments. Respondent did not permit the employees to return to work under their conditions and sent a letter to the employees stating that the offer to return to work was "cancelled" and that the Company "will attempt to replace you."

On April 27, 1982, the Company offered unconditional reinstatement to all of its employees agreeing to honor all the terms of the contract. Employees hired since February 1, 1982, were no longer to do bargaining unit work. This offer was accepted by the Union and the employees returned to work.

C. Discussion and Conclusions

1. Alleged bargaining in bad faith

The General Counsel argues that the Company negotiated in bad faith, requesting that employees who had foregone any wage increase for over 2 years agree to waive a COLA payment and to accept the reduction of other benefits. In lieu of the COLA, the Company proposed a bonus of 13 cents per week. This was unreasonable in view of the fact that Respondent acknowledged that it had the money to meet the Union's demands, but argued that it did not make sense to pay because the manufacturing operation was not sufficiently profitable. Further evidence of bad faith, according to the General Counsel, lies in the Company's refusal to permit the Union to inspect its books to verify its claim of unprofitability. The Company also reneged on its promise to make a money offer during the negotiations.

The General Counsel concludes that the totality of Respondent's conduct shows that the Company had a predetermination not to reach agreement; it knew the Union would not accept its proposals to waive the COLA and it made no offer that the Union could accept. The General Counsel urges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by bargaining in bad faith.

Respondent argues that it never made any claims of inability to pay during the negotiations; in fact, Respondent's representative acknowledged that the Company had the money to meet the Union's demands. Respondent concludes that it was therefore under no obligation to comply with the Union's request to produce financial books and records for inspection by the Union.

In NLRB v. Truitt, 351 U.S. 149 (1956), the Supreme Court said:

> Good-faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either bargainer should be honest claims. This is true about an asserted inability to pay an increase in wages. If such an argument is important enough to present in the give and take of bargaining, it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy. 351 U.S. at 152–153.

This rule relating to an employer's claims of inability to meet a union's demands has been construed by the Second Circuit in Pressman Local 51 v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 496 (2d. Cir. 1976).[7] In that case, Judge Hays rejected a mechanistic approach in determining whether an employer had indeed raised a claim of inability to pay:

> So long as the employer's refusal reasonably interpreted is the result of financial inability to meet the employees' demand rather than simple unwillingness to do so, the exact formulation used by the Employer is . . . immaterial. 538 F.2d at 500.

The employer in the circuit court had repeatedly met each of the union's wage demands with the response that it could not "reach" them. The court concluded that the "plain English meaning of this . . . reiterated statement clearly indicates that the Employer was claiming an inability to pay,"[8] and the court found that the employer's refusal to produce financial records requested by the union was a violation.

In the instant case, Respondent's officers advised the Union that its manufacturing operation was not profitable and that unit labor costs must be cut 30 percent over the next 3 years. The Company made it clear that but for some investments unconnected to the manufacturing operation, Clemson Brothers would have been operating at a net loss. Indeed, the Company read certain sales and loss figures to the negotiating committee across the table. The plain English meaning of the Company's statements was that the Company's manufacturing operation employing all the bargaining unit workers was losing money and that the Respondent could no longer afford to subsidize the manufacturing end of the business by a drain on its investments; a drastic decline in labor costs was necessary. This claim was tantamount to saying that the Company was unable to afford a wage increase. It is immaterial that the Company avoided using the magic words—inability to meet the demand. The fact is, the Company wished to convince the Union that the manufacturing operation could not meet the cost of improved wages and benefits. The truth of this analysis is proven by the Company's behavior at the bargaining table when it actually presented certain loss figures to the Union. As the Supreme Court said, "If such an argument is important enough to present . . . it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy."[9] Thus, having presented the figures, the Company should have been willing to have its books inspected by a union accountant, and its unwillingness in the face of a union request was a refusal to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[7] Rev. Milbin Printing, 218 NLRB 223 (1975).

There is further evidence of Respondent's bad-faith bargaining: Respondent acknowledges that on November 20, 1981, it promised to make a wage offer at the next session and that it reneged on this promise. Further, although Respondent characterized the Union's willingness on January 26, 1983, to accept a bonus in lieu of COLA as "very constructive" and a step in the right direction, Respondent nevertheless locked out its employees on February 1, 1982, without engaging in further bargaining on this important concession.

2. Alleged unlawful lockout

The General Counsel argues that the lockout of the employees before impasse was reached was unlawful because it was designed to avoid paying COLA and avoid bargaining and was not supported by economic justification or the imminent possibility of a strike.[10] The General Counsel concludes that the lockout was inherently prejudicial and devoid of economic justification and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, citing American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB., 380 U.S. 300 (1965); and Vore Cinema Corp., 254 NLRB 1288, 1293 (1981).

Respondent urges that the parties had reached an impasse in the negotiations. No further progress was likely after the meeting of January 26, 1982, because neither side was likely to compromise. Thus, Respondent concludes, in the face of a genuine impasse Respondent could institute a lawful lockout.

Based on my findings above as to Respondent's failure to bargain in good faith, I have concluded that no genuine impasse in the negotiations existed.[11]

In American Ship Building, supra, the facts showed that the parties had bargained to impasse in good faith and that the lockout was not based on hostility to the Union or a desire to avoid collective-bargaining obligations. In the instant case, the employer did not bargain in good faith and no genuine impasse was reached. Furtherance, it is clear that the lockout was motivated by Respondent's wish to avoid the COLA payment required by the contract and by Respondent's desire to avoid bargaining in a situation where it was unable to gain any further concessions from the Union. Respondent has presented no evidence of economic justification for the lockout nor evidence of an imminent strike. Indeed, Respondent's brief concedes that the lockout was "not motivated by economic considerations." Therefore, the lockout of February 1, 1982, violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[12]

3. Alleged unlawful hiring of replacements

The General Counsel argues that the locked-out employees were discharged and permanently replaced in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). In the alternative, the General Counsel argues that if the replacements were temporary, their use was inherently destructive of employee rights in that Respondent did not demonstrate a substantial business justification for using replacements.

The evidence does not show that the unit employees were discharged nor that their replacements were anything but temporary. However, since I have found above that the lockout was unlawful, it follows it that the temporary replacement of the employees was also in a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).

4. Alleged unilateral changes

The General Counsel argues that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally ceasing the payment of COLA as well as payment of pension and dental plan contributions on February 1, 1982. The General Counsel contends that the contract had not terminated, as urged by Respondent, because the employees had been unlawfully locked out. Even if the contract had been terminated, Respondent had no right to make unilateral changes.

Article 33.1 of the contract provides that the contract terminates on a strike or lockout. However, since I have found that the lockout was unlawful, I find that the contract did not terminate. Thus, it was unlawful for Respondent to cease making any of the payments required by the contract, including pension and dental plan contributions and the COLA payment. I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962).

5. Alleged unlawful conditional offer of reinstatement

The General Counsel contends that having been discriminatorily discharged, Respondent's employees were entitled to unconditional offers of reinstatement. Because Respondent did not make such offers initially, it violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1). I find that the offers of employment made to the unlawfully locked-out employees on February 12, 1982, were conditional in that they would have required employees to waive the COLA, pension, and dental plan payments provided by the contract. Having been discriminatorily locked out, the employees were entitled to unconditional offers of reinstatement; Respondent's failure to tender such offers of reinstatement; Respondent's failure to tender such offers violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. K & E Bus Lines, 255 NLRB 1022 (1981).

[9] 351 U.S. at 152–153.

[10] According to the General Counsel, Schrade had decided on a lockout on October 30, 1981. However, the record shows that Respondent's officials only considered a lockout at this time, but had not reached a decision.

[11] Pressman Local 51, supra at 501.

[12] American Ship Building, supra; Vore Cinema Corp., supra.

6. Alleged unlawful direct dealing

The General Counsel contends that Respondent dealt directly with its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, and requests permission to amend the complaint to allege this separate violation. The General Counsel points out that Respondent's February 12, 1982 offer of conditional reinstatement was made by letter to the employees and that the Union was not notified and had no opportunity to bargain over the mandatory terms of employment sought to be changed by Respondent's offer.

Although this violation is not alleged in the complaint, the alleged unlawful activity was related to and intertwined with the allegations in the complaint and the matter was fully litigated. Therefore, I grant the General Counsel's motion to amend the complaint. Doral Hotel & Country Club, 240 NLRB 1112 (1979).

The facts concerning the reinstatement offer of February 12, 1982, are not in dispute and are conceded by Respondent. The reinstatement offer would have required employees to forego payments mandated by the collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent was attempting to change wages and other terms of employment by dealing directly with its employees. I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by mailing an offer to employees which differed from the contract agreed to by the parties. Mt. Airy Psychiatric Center, 230 NLRB 668, 680 (1977).

7. Alleged unlawful threats

The General Counsel urges that Respondent threatened its employees with discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(1) when it informed them by letter of February 12, 1982, that they might be permanently discharged. The General Counsel states that the threat must be considered in light of Respondent's bad faith in the negotiations and the unlawful lockout.

I have found above that the lockout of the employees was unlawful and that Respondent's unilateral attempt to reinstate the employees at different wages and conditions of employment was unlawful. In this context, Respondent's statement that the employees might be discharged if they refused to accept the unlawful conditions imposed by Respondent on their return to work was coercive and interfered with the employees' rights in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. Alleged unlawful discharge

The General Counsel contends that Respondent's letter of February 23, 1982, notified the employees that they had been discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The General Counsel argues that the employees' protected conduct in refusing the conditional offer of reinstatement was the motivating factor for the discharge.

The Respondent's letter of February 23, 1982, does not contain a notification of discharge. It merely states that Respondent will attempt to replace the employee. There is no evidence that any of the employees were discharged and this allegation of the complaint should be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Clemson Brothers, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Lodge 1835, International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By failing to bargain in good faith with the Union, making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment and dealing directly with its employees, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. By locking out its employees, replacing them, and offering them reinstatement on certain conditions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. By threatening its employees with discharge if they did not accept conditional offers of reinstatement, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. The unfair labor practices found above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. Respondent did not violate the Act by discharging its employees.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist, and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent unlawfully locked out its employees but then offered them reinstatement, I shall direct that the employees be made whole for any losses of pay and benefits they may have suffered by reason of the unlawful lockout and that the previously accomplished reinstatement shall be without prejudice to the employees' seniority and other rights and privileges.

All loss of earnings and other benefits due under the terms of this Order shall be computed within interest in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962); and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The Respondent, Clemson Brothers, Inc., Middleton, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing to bargain in good faith with the Union, making unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment, and dealing directly with its employees.

(b) Locking out its employees, replacing them, and offering them conditional reinstatement.

---

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Threatening its employees with discharge if they refuse conditional offers of reinstatement.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at all of its facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Make whole the employees listed in footnote 3 above for any losses of pay and benefits without prejudice to seniority and other rights in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

August 24, 1988

DECISION, CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION, AND ORDER REMANDING FOR HEARING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the Petitioner's objections to elections held on December 18, 1987, and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The elections were conducted pursuant to Stipulated Election Agreements. The tally of ballots in United Airlines Services Corp., Case 19–RC–11660, shows 145 for and 228 against the Petitioner, with 7 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results. The tally of ballots in Support Services, Inc., Case 19–RC–11661, shows 47 for and 50 against the Petitioner, with 10 challenged ballots, a sufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the Petitioner's exceptions and brief, and adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendations regarding the Petitioner's Objections 6 and 10.[1] However, contrary to the Regional Director, the Board finds that Objection 8, which applies solely to Support Services, Inc., raises substantial issues of fact and law that can best be resolved on the basis of a hearing.

The Petitioner's Objection 8 alleged that Employer Support Services, Inc. released a letter dated November 30, 1987, in which it announced a change in the biweekly pay schedule so that the schedule would conform to the prior employer's practice of alternating its paydays with those of Government employees. According to the letter, this change was implemented to ease waiting lines in banks, credit unions, and stores. In support of this objection, the only evidence the Petitioner offered was a copy of the letter itself.

The Regional Director found that no additional economic benefit accrued to Support Services employees as a result of the change in payday. He accordingly concluded that there is no showing that the Employer's conduct in this regard warrants setting aside the election.

In its exceptions, the Petitioner relies on R. Dakin & Co., 284 NLRB 98 (1987), to argue that a change in an employer's payroll system for purposes of employee convenience is a benefit that can influence the outcome of an election. The Petitioner further asserts that the Employer in the instant case, like the employer in Dakin, has failed to show that the change in paydays would have been made even in the absence of the Union's organizational efforts.

It is well established that the mere grant of benefits during the critical period is not, per se, grounds for setting aside an election. Rather, the critical inquiry is whether the benefits were granted for the purpose of influencing the employees' vote in the election and were of a type reasonably calculated to have that effect. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405 (1964). As a general rule, an employer's legal duty in deciding whether to grant benefits while a representation proceeding is pending is to decide that question precisely as it would if the union were not on the scene. R. Dakin, supra, quoting Reds Express, 268 NLRB 1154, 1155 (1984). In determining whether a grant of benefits is objectionable, the Board has drawn the inference that benefits granted during the critical period are coercive, but it has allowed the employer to rebut the inference by coming forward with an explanation, other than the pending election, for the timing of the grant or announcement of such benefits. Uarco Inc., 216 NLRB 1, 2 (1974). See, e.g., Singer Co., 199 NLRB 1195 (1972).

Applying the above-stated principles to the circumstances of this case, we conclude that the issues raised by the Union regarding Objection 8 may best be resolved pursuant to a hearing. In this regard we note that, contrary to the implication of the dissent, the Employer has not offered any explanation for its timing, i.e., for making this change in the biweekly payroll system during the pendency of the election.[2] Although the Employer may provide an explanation at the hearing, we cannot provide a rationale for it: it is the Employer's motive that is at issue. Compare NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 at 34–35 (1967). We further note that additional information is needed to determine whether such a change constitutes a benefit reasonably calculated to influence the election results.

[1] In the absence of exceptions, we adopt, pro forma, the Regional Director's recommendation that the Petitioner's Objections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, and 11 through 28 be overruled, and that the challenges to 8 of the 10 challenged ballots in Support Services, Inc., be overruled.

[2] The change is puzzling in part because this more convenient payroll schedule had been used by the Employer's predecessor on the maintenance contract, and the Employer could have implemented it at the outset simply by continuing the predecessor's practice. Instead, the Employer chose to implement a new schedule at the outset, and it then reverted to the predecessor's practice after the election petition was filed.

Accordingly, we shall order a hearing in Case 19–RC–11661 and we shall certify the election results in Case 19–RC–11660.

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots in Case 19–RC–11660 have not been cast for United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC and that it is not the exclusive representative of the United Airlines Services Corp. employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All corrosion control tech. II, corrosion control tech. III, crane electrician A, crane electrician B, crane mechanic A, crane mechanic B, crane mechanic C, crane operator, electronic tech. III, engineering equip. operator, gardener lead, general maintenance worker, heavy equipment mechanic, heavy motor vehicle operator, housekeeper I, housekeeper II, HVAC mechanic, instrument cont. tech., laborer, lead electrician tech. III; lead engineer. equip. operator, lead housekeeper II, lead HVAC mechanic, lead locksmith, lead maintenance electrician, lead maintenance machinist, lead maintenance mechanic, lead motor vehicle mechanic, lead storekeeper II, lead woodcraft worker, light motor vehicle operator, locksmith, maintenance carpenter, maintenance electrician, maintenance machinist, maintenance mason, maintenance mechanic, maintenance painter, maintenance pipefitter, maintenance plumber, maintenance trades helper, maintenance welder, medium motor vehicle operator, millwright, motor vehicle mechanic, pest controller, railroad track worker, rigger, roof repairer, sheet metal mechanic, sign painter, stationary engineer, storekeeper I, storekeeper II, taxi driver, tractor operator, safety specialist, driver-messenger, vehicle inspector, or persons performing the functions described in the above job titles, employed by the Employer at its SUBBASE Bangor, WA facility, but excluding all computer production controller, drafter, librarian tech., photographer lab tech., accounting clerk, data entry clerk, stenographer, receptionist, fire fighter, computer operator, illustrator, photographer, radio dispatch clerk, security clerk, clerk typist, general clerk, dispatcher, security policeman, word processor, clerical salaried employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

ORDER DIRECTING HEARING

It is ordered that a hearing be held in Case 19–RC–11661 before a duly designated hearing officer for the purpose of receiving evidence to resolve the issues raised by Objection 8.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the hearing officer designated for the purpose of conducting the hearing shall prepare and cause to be served on the parties a report containing resolutions of credibility of witnesses, findings of fact, and recommendations to the Board concerning the disposition of the issues. Within the time prescribed by the Board's Rules and Regulations, any party may file with the Board in Washington, D.C., eight copies of exceptions thereto. Immediately on the filing of exceptions, the party filing them shall serve a copy on each of the other parties and shall file a copy with the Regional Director. If no exceptions are filed, the Board will adopt the recommendations of the hearing officer.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Case 19–RC–11661 is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 19 for the purpose of arranging and giving notice of the hearing.

MEMBER CRACRAFT, concurring and dissenting in part.

I agree with my colleagues and the Regional Director that the Employer did not engage in objectionable conduct under the circumstances of this case by disseminating a new employee handbook to employees during the 2–3 weeks prior to the December 18, 1987 election and by announcing (in writing) to the employees on December 16, 1987, that employees who did not require health insurance coverage under the Employer's plan could choose to have the Employer pay into such an employee's Individual Retirement Arrangement (IRA) account—but not directly to the employee—an amount equal to the amount of the health insurance premium. However, contrary to my colleagues, I also agree with the Regional Director's determination, which I find to be satisfactorily based on his administrative investigation, that the Employer also did not engage in objectionable conduct under the circumstances of this case by announcing (in writing) to the employees on November 30, 1987, that the schedule of paydays had been revised in order to alleviate overcrowding at nearby banks, credit unions, and stores, thereby "mak[ing] payday more convenient for you and your family."

R. Dakin & Co., 284 NLRB 98 (1987), relied on by the Petitioner in support of its objection regarding alteration of the pay schedule, is distinguishable. In that case employees complained about the pay schedule for 6 months prior to the employer's alteration of the schedule immediately after the advent of union organizational activity. In such circumstances, it was proper to conclude that the alteration constituted a grant of benefit and that the employer did not adequately explain the timing of the grant.

The announcement about both the health insurance premium option and the revised payday schedule herein might, under other circumstances, be reasonably perceived by employees as grants of benefits. Nevertheless, I find that under the instant circumstances, the timing of both these announcements within the critical period is reasonably and adequately explainable by the fact that the Employer's operational startup period—with its predictably attendant need for clarification and revision of personnel policies such as those in question here—was virtually contemporaneous with the instant preelection critical period.

Accordingly, I find the Regional Director's resolution of these matters to be sufficient under the circumstances and I find it unnecessary to remand Objection 8 for hearing. I note the Petitioner's exception to the Regional Director's report does not claim that this objection should be resolved on the basis of record evidence but, rather, argues that the Regional Director's conclusion was erroneous as a matter of law.

United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 324, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (Albertson's, Inc.) and John M. Cacas. Case 21–CB–9847

August 24, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 4, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 324, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, Santa Ana, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Brian Sweeney, for the General Counsel.
Robert A. Cantore (Gilbert & Sackman), for the Respondent.
John M. Cacas, for himself.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding in which a hearing was held on 30 July 1987 is based on an unfair labor practice charge filed 17 March 1987 by John M. Cacas (Cacas) against United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 324 (Respondent) and on a complaint issued 13 May 1987 by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) alleging that Cacas' employer, Albertson's, Inc., at Respondent's request, discharged him for failing to pay to Respondent the dues and initiation fee owed Respondent under the union-security agreement between Respondent and Albertson's, and that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) because, prior to requesting Cacas' discharge, it failed to give him reasonable notice of the money he owed, failed to afford him an adequate opportunity to pay the money he owed, and failed to warn him he would be discharged if he failed to pay the money he owed. Respondent filed a timely answer to the complaint denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the parties' posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER INVOLVED

Albertson's, Inc., the employer involved in this case, is engaged in the retail grocery business and operates stores located in the State of California. During the course and conduct of its business operations in California, Albertson's annually derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and annually purchases and receives goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. Albertson's is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. Under the circumstances, I find it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Evidence

Albertson's retail clerks employed in its stores located in certain areas of southern California, including Santa Ana, California, are represented by Respondent for purposes of collective bargaining. During the time material, Respondent and Albertson's were parties to a collective-bargaining contract covering these employees. Article II of the contract contained a union-security agreement which, in pertinent part, included the following provisions:

> A. UNION SECURITY. All employees shall, as a condition of employment, pay to the Union the initiation fees and/or reinstatement fees and periodic dues lawfully required by the Union. This obligation shall commence on the thirty-first (31st) day following the date of employment by the Employer who is signatory to this Agreement, or the effective date of this Agreement, or the date of signature, whichever is later.
> . . . .
>
> E. ENFORCEMENT. The parties hereto agree that this Article II shall be implemented and enforced as hereinafter set forth.
> 1. Introductory Letter. This letter will be sent by the Union to the employee's home (if the Employer has complied with Article II-B of this Agreement requiring the Employer to supply such home address to the Union), or to the store where the employee is employed.

(a) This letter will quote the language of Article II-A of this Agreement and advise employees of the Union's office hours and other matters relating to the employee's satisfaction of his obligations under Article II-A of this Agreement.

(b) A copy of this letter shall be sent to the Employer's Industrial Relations Department on the same date that the original of the letter is sent to the employee.

2. All employees will be billed for their appropriate initiation fee and/or reinstatement fee and/or periodic dues lawfully applied in accordance with the Bylaws of the respective Local Unions.

3. Delinquency Notice. This notice will be sent to the employee's home address (if the Employer has furnished the Union with such information); otherwise it will be sent to the store in which the employee works, with copies sent to the Industrial Relations Department of the Employer and to the store manager.

The delinquency letter is to be sent to the employee specifically advising him that:

(a) He is delinquent in his financial obligations to the Union;

(b) Advising him of the specific amount due;

(c) How the amount is computed;

(d) The date the sum must be received by the Union;

(e) The penalty for noncompliance, i.e., discharge if the obligation has not been met; and

(f) Address and telephone number of the Local Union and hours of operation.

4. Termination Notice. The termination notice shall be sent to the Employer involved. The copy to be sent to the employee shall be sent to the employee's home address (if the Employer has furnished the Union with such information). If the Employer has not furnished such information, the copy shall be sent to the employee at the store where the employee works.

(a) The termination notice will be sent at such time as the employee has ignored all efforts by the Union to obtain compliance with this Article II.

(b) The notice will advise the Employer that the employee has failed to comply with the Union Security Clause of this Agreement in that the employee has not paid the initiation fees and/or reinstatement fees and/or dues as lawfully applied. In addition, the notice shall advise that the Union has complied with the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board, as well as its own International Constitution and Bylaws with regard to the required procedural steps of notifying the employee of the delinquency.

(c) The termination notice shall also advise that the Union will not accept any payments from the employee or on account of the employee from and after the date thereof. The Union agrees that it will not in fact accept any such payments.

(d) The Employer shall terminate the employee at the end of the current week's work schedule after receipt by the Employer of the termination notice.

Respondent administers dues payments for approximately 22,000 members. It processes monthly dues payments for between 400 and 500 new members weekly, and does this in the following fashion. On employing a new hire in the unit represented by Respondent, the employers, including Albertson's, send Respondent a "notice of new hire" which gives the employee's date of employment, name, social security number, job classification, rate of pay, store location, and most of the time the employee's home address. It is not unusual, however, for the "notice of new hire" to fail to include the employee's home address. Respondent places all this information into its computer system and the system is programed to print out the above-described "Introductory Letter" at the appropriate time and if, in response to this letter, the employee does not fulfill his or her union-security obligation in a timely manner, the computer is programed to print out the above-described "Delinquency Notice" at the appropriate time. If Respondent has not been given an employee's home address, the "Introductory Letter" and "Delinquency Notice" are mailed to the employee at the store where he or she works. In all cases courtesy copies of the "Introductory Letter" and "Delinquency Notice" are mailed to the employer at the store where the employee works.

On or about 3 June 1986 Charging Party Cacas began work for Albertson's as a grocery clerk at its store 1650 located in Santa Ana, California. The clerks employed at this store are represented by Respondent and covered by the above-described union-security agreement. Previously, for approximately 1 year during 1985–1986, Cacas was employed by Albertson's as a grocery clerk in Las Vegas, Nevada, where the clerks are represented by one of Respondent's sister locals. The contract between that union and Albertson's did not contain a union-security agreement because Nevada is a so-called right-to-work state. Cacas did not join the Union or pay dues and fees to the union while employed by Albertson's Las Vegas, Nevada store. As a matter of fact no one ever asked him to join the Union while employed at Albertson's Las Vegas, Nevada store.

Although Cacas began work at Albertson's Santa Ana, California store on or about 3 June 1986, Albertson's did not notify Respondent of his employment until 10 November 1986, when Respondent received a "notice of new hire" from Albertson's notifying it of Cacas' employment. The notice, however, failed to give Cacas' home address and gave an incorrect social security number.

Cacas, throughout his employment at the Santa Ana store, worked the night shift, 12 a.m. to 8:30 a.m. or 9 a.m. On 8 September 1986 he was promoted to night crew chief, but on Friday, 21 November 1986, was demoted to his clerk position. During the time material, the manager of the Santa Ana store, known as the store director, was James Sidenglanz.

Louis Cruz, Respondent's business representative assigned to administer the collective-bargaining contract covering Albertson's clerks employed at the Santa Ana store where Cacas worked, testified he spoke to Cacas on 19 November 1986 for the first time about his obligation to comply with the contractual union-security agreement. In this regard, it is undisputed that during the latter part of November 1986 Cruz met with Cacas and the other members of the store's night crew, at the end of their shift, to listen to their grievances concerning Store Manager Sidenglanz, who had only recently assumed that position.[1] It is also undisputed that after listening to the night crew's grievances and their expressed feeling that if they could discuss their grievances with Sidenglanz' boss, District Manager Simonson, that Simonson would resolve them, that Cruz ended the meeting by stating he would try to arrange for a meeting between the night crew and Simonson.

Cruz further testified that after the meeting ended, Cacas came to him and discussed in greater detail his personal grievances concerning Sidenglanz. When questioned by counsel for the General Counsel as an adverse witness, Cruz testified that at this time, "I asked him [Cacas] if he had already joined the Union" and when Cacas answered "no," Cruz said nothing else to him concerning that subject. Later when questioned by counsel for Respondent, Cruz embellished and added significantly to this testimony; he testified, "I told him [Cacas] that I noticed that his name was not . . . in the book[2] . . . and . . . asked him if he had come in to join the Union, and he [Cacas] said no," and further testified that he responded by telling Cacas, "he had to come in and join the Union." Later when cross-examined by counsel for the General Counsel, Cruz, when asked what he said to Cacas concerning his financial obligations to the Union, testified, "I believe I said that he had to come down and join the Union" and when asked if he said anything else to Cacas on that subject, testified "I don't remember."

Cacas specifically denied Cruz asked whether he was a member of Respondent and denied Cruz stated anything to him about joining Respondent. I credit Cacas' and reject Cruz' testimony because Cacas' testimonial demeanor, which was good, was better than Cruz'. Also, as described above, Cruz' disputed testimony was not given in a straightforward manner.

On 26 November 1986, pursuant to the above-described article II(E) of its contract with Albertson's, Respondent mailed an "Introductory Letter" to Cacas. Because it had not been furnished with Cacas' home address by Albertson's, the letter was addressed to Cacas at the store where he worked. In addition, as was its practice, Respondent mailed a courtesy copy of the letter to the store where he worked. The letter quoted verbatim article II(A) of the contract, the contractual union-security agreement. The letter then, in pertinent part, stated that Cacas' failure to comply with his union-security obligation under article II(A) of the contract might result in his termination and informed Cacas he owed Respondent monthly dues of $21 a month for the month of December 1986 and owed an initiation fee of $275. The letter gave Respondent's address and office hours and advised Cacas to come to Respondent's office no later than the 31st day from the date of his employment to make arrangement for the payment of the $296 he owed Respondent. As is discussed infra, there is a dispute whether Cacas received this letter.

Toward the middle of December 1986, Cacas telephoned Cruz and asked whether he succeeded in arranging the meeting between Albertson's district manager, Simonson, and the night crew. Cruz answered in the negative. He explained that both himself and Simonson had been on vacation and that Simonson had failed to return his telephone calls, but assured Cacas he intended to arrange for a meeting between Simonson and the night crew. Nothing was stated during this conversation about Cacas' obligation to join Respondent or comply with the contractual union-security provision.

On 31 December 1986, pursuant to the above-described article II(E) of its contract with Albertson's, Respondent mailed a "Delinquency Notice" to Cacas. Because it had not been furnished with Cacas' home address by Albertson's, the notice was addressed to Cacas at the store where he worked. In addition, as was its practice, Respondent mailed a courtesy copy of the notice to the store where he worked. The "Delinquency Notice" advised Cacas he was "delinquent in [his] financial obligations to [Respondent]" and further explained, in pertinent part:

> Union records indicate that the following amounts are past due:
> Based on your classification of employment you must pay dues for the months of Dec. 1986 thru Dec. 1986 at $21.00 per month, equaling $21.00, and your initiation/reinstatement fee of $275.00 for a total of $296.00
> . . . .
>
> Under Article II of the collective bargaining agreement, it is your duty to meet the financial obligations imposed by the Agreement or your continued employment may be in jeopardy, and you will be subject to termination should you fail to meet your obligation.
> The amount owed must be received in the Union's office at the close of business on or before January 14, 1987. If you do not meet this obligation by the specified date, the penalty for noncompliance will be discharge from employment.—This is your final notice—

As discussed infra, there is a dispute whether Cacas received this notice.

During the first week of January 1987, Cacas telephoned Cruz and asked whether he had made progress in arranging the meeting between Simonson and the night crew. Cruz told him he had been unable to contact Simonson who had failed to return his telephone calls, but intended to keep on trying to arrange for a meeting between Simonson and the night crew. Cruz then asked

[1] Cruz places this meeting as occurring on 19 November 1986, whereas, Cacas places it as occurring during the last week of November 1986.

[2] Referring to the book Cruz maintains which lists the names of the employees employed in the several stores whose employees he is assigned to represent.

whether Cacas had been a union member while employed by Albertson's in Las Vegas. Cacas answered "no." Cruz told him he was required to join Respondent because in California, unlike Nevada, there was no right-to-work law. Cruz also explained to Cacas that under the collective-bargaining contract between Albertson's and Respondent, Cacas was required to join Respondent as a condition of his employment. Cruz gave Cacas one of Respondent's several telephone numbers and told him to phone that number and stated, "they will take care of you."[3]

During the first week of January 1987, Cacas, immediately after his above-described conversation with Cruz, followed Cruz' instruction and dialed the number that Cruz had given him, one of the several numbers for Respondent's office. A lady answered and Cacas either spoke to that lady or to another lady to whom the call was transferred. Cacas introduced himself and stated he had just spoken to Cruz who had told him to call this number and had told him that the person at this number would "take care of me as far as joining the Union." In reply to the lady's inquiry, Cacas stated his social security number and the lady punched that number into a computer. After a moment the lady told him she did not have any information concerning him[4] and asked how long he had been working for his employer. Cacas told her he had been employed by Albertson's since approximately May 1986. In response the lady asked, "And you have not received a notice yet?" Cacas stated, "No." The lady replied by stating, "But you have been talking to Lou Cruz" and Cacas answered, "Yes," he had just finished talking to Cruz and had been told by Cruz to call this call number and he would be taken care of. The lady told Cacas he would receive a notice from Respondent that would explain everything he needed to know about joining Respondent. Cacas asked why he had not already received this notice because he had been working for Albertson's for several months. The lady stated she "would not know" because "it is not her job."

The next day Cacas again called the number that Cruz had given him. He did this because, after considering the matter, he feared that because he had been employed by Albertson's for several months he would owe Respondent a lot of money and wanted to find out the amount he owed. He spoke to the lady who spoke to him the previous day or to another lady. He introduced himself and stated he was calling about how much he owed Respondent, that he had spoken to Respondent's business representative, Cruz, and to someone at that telephone number the previous day, that he had been told he would be receiving a notice from Respondent, but wanted to know how much money he owed Respondent because he had been employed by Albertson's for several months and wanted to be able to plan ahead prior to getting the notice so he could save a sufficient amount of money to pay what he owed. The lady responded by telling him she was unable to supply him with this information because she did not have it because it was someone else's job, but assured him he would be provided with this information very shortly in the notice Respondent was sending to him and apologized for not being able to help him.[5]

On either 22 January 1987 or 23 January 1987 at approximately 8:45 a.m., Cruz personally spoke to Cacas, in the presence of Sidenglanz, about Cacas' obligation to join Respondent.[6] Cacas, a witness for the General Counsel, Cruz, an adverse witness for the General Counsel, and Sidenglanz, a witness for Respondent, testified about this conversation. Their testimony follows.

Cacas testified he was on his way out of the store at the end of his work shift when he observed Cruz standing in the store's pharmacy. Cacas walked over to where Cruz was standing and asked whether Cruz had heard anything from Simonson, Albertson's district manager. Cruz replied, "Shh, shh" and indicated he did not want to talk about that subject while Sidenglanz was in the vicinity and pointed over Cacas' shoulder to where Sidenglanz was standing approximately five or six steps away. Cacas indicated he understood. Cruz changed the subject and asked whether Cacas had joined Respondent. Cacas answered "no" and explained he had telephoned Respondent's office using the telephone number Cruz had given him and was told he was supposed to receive a notice from Respondent. Cruz asked, "You haven't gotten no notice yet?" When Cacas answered "no," Cruz and Cacas went to where Sidenglanz was standing nearby in front of a check stand and Cruz asked him if he had received any notices from Respondent concerning Cacas. Sidenglanz replied he had not received anything. Cruz indicated that Sidenglanz by that time should have received notices from Respondent concerning Cacas. Sidenglanz repeated he had not received any notices. Cruz told Cacas he had to join Respondent and told him to go to Respondent's office that day and be there by 4 p.m. and gave him directions on how to get there. This summarizes Cacas' testimony.

Cruz testified he and Sidenglanz were standing at the front of the store, near the store's safe, which is adjacent to the store pharmacy, when Cacas approached them. Before Cacas could say anything, Cruz asked whether he had joined Respondent. Cacas answered, "No." Cruz asked whether Cacas received a message that he had to be at Respondent's office by 4 p.m. that day. Cacas

[3] The above description of Cacas' early January 1987 telephone conversation with Cruz is based on the testimony of Cacas, whose demeanor was good when he testified. Cruz did not deny his testimony.

[4] As I have noted supra, Albertson's had furnished Respondent with an incorrect social security number for Cacas.

[5] The above-description of Cacas' early January 1987 telephone conversations with the lady or ladies to whom he spoke when, in response to Cruz' instruction, he telephoned Respondent's office about joining Respondent is based on the undenied testimony of Cacas, whose demeanor was good when he testified. Respondent, based on the testimony of its Dues Department Supervisor Schultz, argues Cacas' testimony was inherently incredible because, if he is believed, the persons he spoke to deviated from certain established procedures in answering his inquiries, i.e., did not refer him to someone with the necessary expertise to answer his questions and did not punch his name into the computer when the social security number he gave failed to generate any employment information. Respondent's contention is without merit because in a labor organization of approximately 22,000 members it is not inherently incredible that on occasion some of its office clerical employees do not follow the procedures their supervisors assume they are following.

[6] Cacas dates this conversation as occurring 22 January, whereas Cruz and Sidenglanz date it as occurring 23 January.

stated he had not received the message. Cruz asked Sidenglanz whether he had given this message to Cacas.[7] Sidenglanz answered "no" and explained this was the first time Sidenglanz had seen Cacas since Cruz on 20 January had given him the message. The conversation ended at this time with Cruz telling Cacas he had better "take care of this" by 4 p.m. that day. Cacas replied he intended to go down and join Respondent that day. This summarizes Cruz' testimony.

Sidenglanz testified he and Cruz were walking toward the back of the store and Cacas was walking in the opposite direction on his way out of the store when Cruz asked, "Is that John Cacas?" Sidenglanz answered in the affirmative. Cruz then initiated a conversation with Cacas by stating, "Oh, you're Cacas" and told Cacas if he did not go to Respondent's office that day and take care of his dues payments he was going to be terminated. Cacas replied by stating, "I've never got a notice." Cruz asked Sidenglanz whether Sidenglanz had seen any notices. Sidenglanz replied he had not seen any notices addressed to Cacas. The conversation ended with Cruz telling Cacas, "You've got to get down and take care of it today" and Cacas stating, "I'll get it taken care of." This summarizes Sidenglanz' testimony.

I credit Cacas' description of his 22 January or 23 conversation with Cruz because he testified about the conversation on both direct and cross-examination in a straightforward and sincere manner and his testimonial demeanor, which was good, was better than Cruz' or Sidenglanz'. I also note that Cruz and Sidenglanz, in testifying about this conversation, not only failed to corroborate one another in several significant respects, but each presented essentially different versions of what allegedly took place. In view of these circumstances, I have credited Cacas' testimony.

On either 22 or 23 January 1987, the day Cruz told Cacas, as I have found supra, to be at Respondent's office by 4 p.m. that day and join Respondent, Cacas went to Respondent's office but did not get there until after 6 p.m. and found it was closed. The reason he was so late in getting to Respondent's office was that Cacas, who was 18 years old, did not own an automobile and it was not until his aunt, who he lived with, got home from work that he was able to borrow her automobile to drive to Respondent's office.

On the day following his 22 January 1987 conversation with Cruz, as Cacas walked by the company bulletin board on the way to his workstation, he inadvertently bumped against the bulletin board and knocked off one of the posted documents. When he stopped to tack it back on, he observed it dealt with the subject of his obligation to join Respondent, a subject that Cruz had recently been speaking about to him, so he removed the document from the bulletin board and took it with him to his workstation and read it during his break period. The document was a one-page memorandum dated 25 June 1986 from Albertson's regional labor relations director and was addressed to all the Company's employees who worked under "Retail Clerks Collective Bargaining Agreements" and was entitled "Your Termination Which Could Result From Failure To Pay Union Dues and Initiation Fees."[8] The memorandum described in detail the employees' obligation to pay initiation fees and dues to Respondent under the contractual union-security agreement and informed them of Respondent's obligation to send them an "Introductory Letter" explaining their obligation. The memorandum also stated in substance that if they failed to pay their dues and fees by the time stated in the "Introductory Letter," that Respondent would send them a "Delinquency Notice" describing in detail their obligation to pay Respondent's dues and initiation fees. The memorandum, among other things, also advised the employees that if they did not pay the moneys owed by the date specified in the "Delinquency Notice," that Albertson's would have no alternative but to terminate their employment.

On either Monday, 26 January 1987, or Tuesday, 27 January 1987, Cruz telephoned Sidenglanz and requested he terminate Cacas by the end of the week. Sidenglanz agreed.

It was not until 29 January 1987 that Cacas returned to Respondent's office to join Respondent and pay whatever moneys he owed. He testified he delayed before returning to Respondent's office because he had to wait until his aunt had a day off so he could use her automobile, and he intended to pay Respondent whatever moneyes he owed by using the $300 he had previously saved and another $300 from his 29 January paycheck.[9]

On 29 January when Cacas visited Respondent's office to join it and pay his dues and initiation fee, he was informed by Cruz that he was too late, that he should have followed Cruz' instruction and gone to Respondent's office the previous week and taken care of the matter then. Cacas told Cruz he had tried to get to Respondent's office but had arrived there late and told Cruz that he had in his possession $600 to pay whatever he owed Respondent. Cruz told him he was too late in tendering the money because Respondent had already sent Albertson's his termination notice, and that he could not get his job back unless Albertson's agreed to rehire him. Cruz showed Cacas copies of the 26 November 1986 "Introductory Letter" and the 31 December 1986 "Delinquency Notice" which Respondent had sent to the store where Cacas worked. Cacas, after looking at these documents, told Cruz he had never received any of them. Also during this meeting Respondent discovered Albertson's had given it an incorrect social security number for Cacas, which explained to Respondent's clerical personnel why the social security number given to them by [7] Cruz testified that on 20 January 1987 he telephoned Sidenglanz and asked him to tell Cacas to join Respondent by 4 p.m. 23 January 1987, and that if he failed to join Respondent by that time, that Respondent would send a notice requesting his termination. Sidenglanz did not corroborate this testimony and, as described infra, failed to corroborate Cruz' testimony that Cruz during his conversation with Cacas asked Cacas whether he had received this message.

[8] There is no evidence how long this memorandum had been posted on the store bulletin board. Cacas had not observed it prior to this date. However, it probably had been posted previously because Cacas did not normally make a conscious effort to read the materials posted on the bulletin board, but only noticed those notices that were printed in large print, i.e., the minimum wage notice.

[9] 29 January was a payday.

Cacas had failed to generate any information from Respondent's computer.

On 30 January 1987, at the conclusion of his work shift, Cacas was notified by Sidenglanz that Respondent had terminated his employment.

On 30 January, after Sidenglanz told Cacas he was discharged and after Cacas had gone to Sidenglanz' office to get his final paychecks, Cacas telephoned Cruz and protested his discharge. He told Cruz he had not received any of the notices that Respondent had addressed to him in care of the store and, in support of this, stated he had just been to the store for his final paychecks and had observed the notices sent to him by Respondent on Sidenglanz' desk, and asked Cruz "if I received those notices, what are they doing right there in his office on the desk." Cruz replied by stating this was something they could not discuss over the telephone and agreed to meet with him the following Tuesday.

On Tuesday, 2 March 1987, Cacas and night crew employee Gordie Owens met with Cruz and Cruz' boss at Respondent's office. Cacas reiterated that he had not received any of the notices sent to him by Respondent. In order to determine whether this was true, Cruz telephoned the store and spoke to the store's bookkeeper, Jo Wilson, and after speaking with Wilson told Cacas and Owens that Wilson had told him she had no idea whether Cacas received the notices Respondent had addressed to him in care of the store, but that she did recall seeing an envelope addressed to him that had been left on the windowsill of the store's office. Owens stated he also remembered seeing such an envelope addressed to Cacas on the office windowsill.[10] The meeting ended with Cruz informing Cacas that Respondent intended to persuade Albertson's to put him back to work even if it meant going to arbitration.[11] Thereafter, on several occasions when Cacas spoke to Cruz about the matter, Cruz repeated Cacas should not worry but should give him a few more days, and assured him Respondent intended to persuade Albertson's to put him back to work even if it meant going to arbitration.

On 10 March 1987 Cacas, Owens, Simonson, Sidenglanz, Cruz, and another Respondent business representative, met at the Albertson's store where Cacas used to work and discussed the night crew's grievances and Cacas' rehire. On the subject of Cacas' rehire, in an effort to persuade Albertson's district manager Simonson to rehire him, Cruz argued Albertson's had never given Cacas the notices Respondent sent to him in care of the store. More specifically, Cruz explained to Simonson how Respondent had sent several notices to Cacas addressed to the store and that Store Manger Sidenglanz in effect had admitted Cacas did not receive the notices. Cruz stated he had no idea what happened to the notices when they got to the store but, in his opinion, it was "obvious" Cacas did not receive them. Simonson indicated he would consider rehiring Cacas and would notify Respondent in a few days whether it would do so.[12]

On or about 13 March 1987 Cruz notified Cacas that Albertson's did not intend to rehire him. Cruz also informed Cacas that Respondent had decided to drop the matter and did not intend to pursue it any further.

On 17 March 1987 Cacas filed the unfair labor practice charge in this case.

Either in April or May 1987 Cacas went to work as a clerk for Ralph's Grocery in one of its stores located in Santa Ana, California.[13] The clerks employed by Ralph's Grocery are represented by Respondent and apparently are covered by the same contractual union-security agreement as Albertson's clerks. Cacas quit his employment with Ralph's Grocery after working for approximately 1 month and at the same time moved from Santa Ana, California, to the northern part of California, and approximately 1 or 2 months after having moved received an "Introductory Letter" from Respondent, which had been forwarded to him from his old address in Santa Ana, California.[14]

As I have found supra, Respondent mailed Cacas an Introductory Letter and a Delinquency Notice on or about 26 November 1986 and 31 December 1986, respectively. Respondent did not have his home address, so these documents were mailed to him in care of the store where he worked and copies were mailed to the store itself. Cacas testified he did not receive either of these documents and that he first saw them when, as described supra, on 29 January 1987 Respondent's business representative, Cruz, showed them to him. Respondent contends Cacas' testimony is incredible. In evaluating this contention the following evidence is pertinent.

After its belated notification on 10 November 1986 from Albertson's of Cacas' employment, Respondent mailed Cacas an Introductory Letter on or about 26 November 1986 and, when he did not comply with that letter, mailed him a Delinquency Notice on or about 31 December 1986. Respondent did not have his home address, so, as was its practice in such cases, mailed these documents to him in care of the store where he worked and mailed copies to the store itself.

During the time material Store Manager Sidenglanz normally opened the mail addressed to and received by the store. On occasions when he was busy he did not open the envelopes on which Respondent's logo was printed, but assumed they contained either Introductory Letters or Delinquency Notices and left them unopened in the basket on the desk in the store office used by Madelyn Pool, who worked in the store 1 day a week, on [10] No evidence was presented that either Wilson or Owens in fact remembered seeing an envelope addressed to Cacas on the office windowsill.

[11] The description of what was said at the 2 March meeting is based on the testimony of Cacas whose testimonial demeanor was good. Cruz testified Cacas stated he did not receive any of the notices addressed to him at the store. Cruz did not deny the remarks Cacas attributed to him concerning his telephone conversation with Wilson, nor did he deny that he ended the meeting by stating Respondent intended to make an effort to have Albertson's put Cacas back to work even if it meant going to arbitration.

[12] The description of the 2 March meeting is based on the undenied testimony of Cacas, whose testimonial demeanor was good.

[13] The parties appear to have stipulated that Cacas was hired by Ralph's Grocery on 11 May 1987; however, other record evidence (R. Exh. 8), indicates he was hired by Ralph's Grocery on 11 April 1987.

[14] The record reveals that on or about 14 May 1987 Respondent mailed an Introductory Letter to Cacas at his Santa Ana, California address and on or about 17 June 1987 mailed a "Delinquency Notice" to him at that address.

Thursday, doing the store's payroll. Sidenglanz, when it was not busy, normally opened all the envelopes addressed to the store and placed any Introductory Letters or Delinquency Notices in Pool's basket where they remained until she came to work on Thursday. The same was the case with unopened envelopes left by Sidenglanz in Pool's basket. On Thursday, Pool took whatever Introductory Letters and Delinquency Notices were in her basket and attached them to the employees' paychecks by means of paperclips. The envelopes containing the Introductory Letters and Delinquency Notices that were not addressed to the store, but to employees in care of the store, were treated differently. Sidenglanz' practice was to leave those envelopes unopened on the windowsill of the store's office for the employees to pick up. There is no evidence that Albertson's ever informed the employees, either verbally or in writing, that these envelopes would be there for them to pick up.

Each Thursday, during the time material, Pool prepared for distribution the approximately 105 employee paychecks, which between 8 and 8:30 a.m. were placed by her in alphabetical order in a cardboard box, which she left either upstairs in the store office or downstairs in the store's video room.[15] The employees, including the night crew, received their paychecks by walking up to the box and removing their checks, after signing for them on a piece of paper that had been left aside of the box. The box with the checks, whether it was located in the store office or in the video room, was not watched by anyone nor were the employees kept under surveillance as they removed their checks from it. Although Pool was present in the office when the employees came in to get their paychecks, there is no evidence that she stopped work and watched them remove their paychecks or that she otherwise kept employees under surveillance when they took their checks out of the box.

Sidenglanz testified he did not remember seeing Cacas' Introductory Letter or Delinquency Notice or an envelope addressed to Cacas. This was consistent with his further testimony that when he was told on 23 January 1987 that Cacas was complaining he had not received either an Introductory Letter or Delinquency Notice from Respondent, that Sidenglanz replied by telling Cacas and Cruz that Sidenglanz had also not seen those documents.

Pool testified she was absolutely positive she saw Cacas' 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter and the 31 December 1986 Delinquency Notice which were addressed to the store, and testified she was absolutely positive she paperclipped both of them to Cacas' paychecks. Pool further testified it was in May 1986 that she started attaching the Introductory Letters and Delinquency Notices addressed to the store to employees' paychecks and testified that in the approximately 14 months she has been doing this she has attached approximately 50 such documents to employees' paychecks and to her knowledge no employee has ever complained about not receiving the notices she has attached to their paychecks.[16]

The record also reveals that Sidenglanz and Pool on or about 1 April 1987 discovered the copy of the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter which Pool testified she was absolutely positive she had attached to Cacas' paycheck. The alleged circumstances surrounding this discovery follow. Upstairs in the store, adjacent to the office, are several baskets used by department heads for purposes not revealed by the record. Sidenglanz testified he and Pool discovered Cacas' 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter addressed to the store, while they were looking for a grocery price book that Sidenglanz needed in order to find the price of an item for a customer, and when they could not find the book in the grocery manager's basket, where it should have been, they looked in the adjacent basket, the night crew chief's basket, and Sidenglanz found the 26 November 1986 "Introductory Letter" at the bottom of the basket. Pool testified she and Sidenglanz were looking for completed customers' check application cards which were supposed to be in the grocery manager's basket, but found them instead in the night crew chief's basket and, in the process of removing the check application cards from that basket, that either herself or Sidenglanz discovered the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter laying in the basket. As I have found supra, Cacas' last day as night crew chief was Friday, 21 November 1986. Anyone employed at the store has access to the night crew chief's basket as well as the other baskets.

Cacas' testimonial demeanor was good when he testified he did not see an envelope addressed to him on the window sill of the store's office and that he never received copies of the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter or the 31 December 1986 Delinquency Notice, either attached to his paychecks or by some other means. There is nothing in the way Cacas conducted himself that impugns his testimony. Quite the opposite, at all times he informed Respondent's clerical employees and Respondent's business representative that he had not received the notices that Respondent had mailed to him in care of the store where he worked. Moreover, no one from Albertson's disputed his complaint that Albertson's had not transmitted Respondent's notices to him. This despite the fact that Cacas and Cruz, Respondent's business representative, were taking the position in their dealings with Albertson's representatives that Albertson's had failed to transmit the notices to Cacas. Albertson's sole statement concerning this matter was Store Manager

[15] There is a dispute about where the box with the checks was left during the time material. I have not resolved this dispute because it does not affect the outcome of the case.

[16] Pool's testimony that to her knowledge no one ever complained they did not receive a notice she attached to their paychecks is suspect. As described in detail supra, on or about 23 January 1987 Store Manager Sidenglanz was advised that Cacas was complaining he did not receive an Introductory Letter or a Delinquency Notice. When confronted with Cacas' complaint, Sidenglanz admitted having no recollection of ever seeing either of those documents or an envelope addressed to Cacas. Thereafter, Respondent's business representative Cruz took the position in his dealings with Albertson's representatives that Albertson's should rehire Cacas because Albertson's had failed to transmit to him the Introductory Letter or the Delinquency Notice. Under the circumstances, I find it difficult to believe Pool's testimony that no one from Albertson's brought it to her attention that Cacas was complaining he had not received a copy of either the Introductory Letter or Delinquency Notice.

Sidenglanz' admission to Cacas and Cruz that he did not remember receiving correspondence from Respondent involving Cacas or addressed to Cacas. No one including Sidenglanz ever mentioned that Pool remembered having attached the relevant Introductory Letter or Delinquency Notice to Cacas' paychecks.

I realize that at the hearing in this proceeding, Pool, a member of Respondent, testified on behalf of Respondent that she was absolutely positive she had seen Cacas' 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter and the 31 December 1986 Delinquency Notice addressed to the store, and testified she was absolutely positive she paperclipped both of them to Cacas' paychecks. Pool's testimonial demeanor was not good when she gave this testimony. Also her testimony is suspect in view of Albertson's failure to notify either Cacas or Business Representative Cruz that Pool, the person who attaches the Introductory Letters and Delinquency Notices to the employees' paychecks, specifically recalled attaching those documents to Cacas' paychecks.[17] This doubt about the reliability of Pool's testimony is reinforced by the fact that on or about 1 April 1987, several months after the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter was supposedly paperclipped to Cacas' paycheck by Pool, this letter was allegedly discovered by Pool and Store Manager Sidenglanz in the night crew chief's basket. I use the term "allegedly" because the circumstances of the discovery make the testimony of Pool and Sidenglanz suspect. First, Cacas had been replaced as night crew chief on 23 November 1986 and there is no explanation why the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter would have been placed in the crew chief's basket and there is no explanation why Cacas' successor or successors as crew chief would not have discovered this letter and removed it. Second, there was no reason for either Sidenglanz or Pool to be looking for anything in the night crew chief's basket. Third, Pool and Sidenglanz gave different versions of why they happened to be looking in the night crew chief's basket on or about 1 April 1987 when they discovered the 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter. Fourth, Pool works at the store only 1 day a week, a Thursday, the day she handles the store's payroll, thus for her to have been involved with Sidenglanz in the discovery of the letter is a remarkable coincidence.

It is for all the foregoing reasons, and particularly Cacas' sincerity when he denied having seen an envelope addressed to him on the windowsill of the store's office and denied receiving the 26 November Introductory Letter or the 31 December Delinquency Notice, that I find Cacas did not receive either of those documents and was not shown them until 29 January 1987 when Cruz brought them to his attention. In so concluding I considered that Pool paperclipped copies of a 19 November 1986 Introductory Letter and a 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter to the paychecks of employees Leichtfuss and Catalfano. I am not persuaded, however, that establishing the Introductory Letters sent to the store concerning two other employees were paperclipped by Pool to their paychecks, warrants the inference that she also affixed Cacas' Introductory Letter or Delinquency Notice to his paychecks. In this regard, I note that the fact Albertson's may have submitted correct social security numbers to Respondent for employees Leichtfuss and Catalfano does not warrant the inference it submitted a correct social security number for Cacas—it in fact did not. Likewise, the fact that Pool paperclipped Leichtfuss' and Catalfano's Introductory Letters to their paychecks does not warrant the inference that, under the circumstances of this case, she also did so in Cacas' case.

I have also considered Respondent's contention that Cacas' testimony concerning several other matters was inherently incredible, thus indicating he generally was not a truthful witness, and considered its further contention that because two copies of the 26 November Introductory Letter and two copies of the 31 December Delinquency Notice were mailed by Respondent to the store where Cacas worked, and because under the store's procedure all four of these documents were supposed to be transmitted to Cacas, that the law of probability dictates he should have received at least some of those documents. I do not agree that Cacas' testimony referred to by Respondent was inherently incredible in whole or in part. Regarding Respondent's latter contention, I am persuaded that regardless of the probabilities involved, Cacas did not receive any of the documents in issue for, as I have stated previously, he impressed me as a sincere and conscientious witness when he denied receiving them. I am not prepared to speculate about what happened to those documents: whether all or some of them were not received by the store; whether all or some of them were not left for Cacas on the store office windowsill; whether all or some of them were not paperclipped to his paychecks; whether all or some of them fell off from his paychecks after being paperclipped. All I know is that when Cacas testified he did not see an envelope addressed to him on the store office windowsill and denied ever receiving the documents involved in this case, his testimonial demeanor was good and, under the circumstances of this case, the probabilities of the situation do not make his testimony inherently incredible.

B. Discussion

A labor organization seeking to enforce a union-security provision against an employee has a "fiduciary" duty to "deal fairly" with the employee affected. "At a minimum this duty requires that the Union inform the employee of his obligations in order that the employee may take whatever action is necessary to protect his job tenure." NLRB v. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 568, 320 F.2d 254, 258 (3d Cir 1963). Accord: H. C. Macaulay Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 553 F.2d 1198, 1201 (9th Cir. 1977). In Teamsters Local 122 (Busch & Co.), 203 NLRB 1041, 1042 (1973), the National Labor Relations Board specifically defined the union's duty as including "a statement of the precise amount and months for which dues were owed, as well as an explanation of the method used in computing such amount," plus "an adequate opportunity to make payment." In addition, the union must specify when such payments are to be made and make it clear to the employee that discharge will result from failure to pay. Western Publishing Co., 263 NLRB 1110, 1112 (1982).

[17] As I have found supra, Cacas and Business Representative Cruz were complaining to Albertson's that Albertson's had not transmitted to Cacas the notices sent to him in care of the store.

In the instant case on 23 January 1987 when, pursuant to the provisions of its contractual union-security agreement with Albertson's, Respondent sent its request to Albertson's to terminate Cacas for his failure to meet his union-security obligations, Respondent had not advised him of the amount of his obligation, nor the method of computation, nor the deadline for such payment, nor clearly stated to Cacas he would be terminated if he did not comply with this obligation.[18] As described in detail supra, as of that date the only information that Cacas had received from Respondent was Business Representative Cruz' statement that he was required to join Respondent as a condition of employment and to telephone the Respondent's office to learn the details of this obligation. However, when Cacas, pursuant to Cruz' instruction, telephoned Respondent's office during the first week of January 1987 in an effort to learn more about his union-security obligation, he was not given any additional information, but advised he would be receiving a notice from Respondent that would explain everything he needed to know. In other words, when Respondent on 23 January 1987 requested Albertson's to comply with the contractual union-security clause and terminate Cacas for nonpayment of dues and an initiation fee, it had not furnished Cacas with any of the information the Board has found necessary to a union's fiduciary duty to deal fairly with an employee in enforcing a contractual union-security clause.[19] The record also reveals that as a result of Respondent's 23 January 1987 termination request, on 30 January 1987 Albertson's discharged Cacas. In view of these circumstances, I find Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, by attempting to cause and causing Albertson's to terminate Cacas.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By attempting to cause and causing Albertson's to discharge John M. Cacas on 30 January 1987, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[18] As described in detail supra, Respondent attempted to notify Cacas of his contractual union-security obligation by sending the above-described 26 November 1986 Introductory Letter and the above-described 31 December 1986 Delinquency Notice to him in care of the store where he worked. However, as I have found supra, Cacas did not receive them and did not receive the copies that had been mailed to the store and allegedly paperclipped to his paychecks.

[19] The fact that Cacas on or about 22 January 1987 did not visit Respondent's office in response to Cruz' request and thereafter failed to visit the office until Thursday, 29 January 1987, to find out about his union-security obligation, does not establish he was acting in bad faith or was willfully and deliberately attempting to avoid meeting his union-security obligation. Cacas did make an effort to visit Respondent's office on or about 22 January 1987, pursuant to Cruz' instruction, but was not able to get there until after it had closed because he did not own an automobile and it was not until his aunt, who he lived with, got home from work that he was able to use her automobile to drive to Respondent's office. The reason Cacas did not return to Respondent's office until Thursday, 29 January, was he waited until his aunt had a day off so he could use her automobile and he intended to use some of the money from his paycheck, Thursday was payday, to meet his union-security obligation.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist from engaging in such activity and to take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent caused Albertson's, Inc., to unlawfully discharge John M. Cacas, I shall order that Respondent notify Albertson's, Inc. in writing, with a copy to Cacas, that it has no objection to the reinstatement of Cacas, and that it requests Cacas be reinstated. The Respondent shall be ordered to make Cacas whole for any loss of wages and benefits he may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's action until Cacas has been reinstated by Albertson's, Inc., to his former or substantially equivalent job, or he obtains substantially equivalent employment elsewhere, less his net interim earnings.[20] The amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided for in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 324, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC, Santa Ana, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Causing or attempting to cause Albertson's, Inc. to discriminate against any of its employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, except to the extent that such rights may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, as authorized by Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole John M. Cacas for any loss of wages or other rights and benefits he may have suffered as the result of its discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy of this decision.

(b) Notify Albertson's, Inc. in writing with a copy to John M. Cacas that it has no objection to the employment of John M. Cacas, and it requests that Cacas be reinstated.

(c) Remove from its records any reference to the unlawful discharge of John M. Cacas and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge shall not be used as a basis for future action against him.

[20] Sheet Metal Workers Local 355 (Zinsco Electrical Products), 254 NLRB 773 (1981).

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Post in conspicuous places, at its business office and meeting hall, including all places where notices to members are customarily posted, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt. Once posted, these notices shall remain posted for 60 consecutive days. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Deliver to the Regional Director for Region 21 signed copies of the notice in sufficient numbers to be posted by Albertson's, Inc. in all places where notices to employees are customarily posted, if it is willing. Ask the Employer to remove any reference to Cacas' unlawful discharge from the Employer's files and notify Cacas that it has asked the Employer to do this.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[22] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT cause or attempt to cause Albertson's, Inc. to discriminate against John M. Cacas or any other employee in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, except to the extent that those rights may be abrogated by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, as authorized by Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

WE WILL make whole John M. Cacas for any loss of wages or other rights and benefits he may have suffered by reason of our discrimination practiced against him, with interest, until he has been reinstated by Albertson's, Inc. or obtains substantially equivalent employment elsewhere.

WE WILL notify Albertson's, Inc. in writing with a copy to John M. Cacas that we have no objection to the reinstatement of John M. Cacas and we request that he be reinstated.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the discharge of John M. Cacas and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future action against him and WE WILL ask the Employer to remove any reference to Cacas' unlawful discharge from its files and will notify Cacas that we have asked the Employer to do this.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On November 3, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Martin J. Linsky issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The issues in this case are (1) whether the Respondent unlawfully polled its employees about their continued support for the Union and (2) whether, following its poll, the Respondent unlawfully withdrew recognition from and refused to bargain with the Union.

In 1972, the Respondent recognized the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative for the Respondent's drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers. The most recent collective-bargaining agreement between the parties was for the period May 23, 1984, through May 23, 1987. At the time of the material events there were five employees in the bargaining unit—three mechanics and two spotters.

On March 13, 1987,[1] the Union notified the Respondent in writing that it wanted to begin negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement to replace the agreement due to expire on May 23. For asserted reasons discussed more fully below, the Respondent's vice president, Howard M. Howes, decided to conduct a poll of the employees in the unit to determine whether they still wanted to be represented by the Union. The Respondent conducted such a poll on March 21. All five employees in the unit voted "no" to the question of whether they wished to be represented by the Union. On March 30, the Respondent notified the Union, in writing, that it was withdrawing recognition of the Union, effective on expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement on May 23. The Respondent honored the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement until it expired, but refused to negotiate a successor collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

The complaint alleges that the Respondent acted unlawfully, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, by withdrawing recognition from, and thereafter refusing to bargain with, the Union. The Respondent denies that it acted unlawfully as alleged, and asserts that at the time it withdrew its recognition of the Union, the Respondent knew, based on the results of the poll, that each of the five employees in the unit had expressed a desire not to be represented by the Union. The Respondent further asserts that at the time it polled its employees about their desire to be represented by the Union, the Respondent had a good-faith doubt about the Union's majority status, based on objective evidence existing prior to the poll.

The judge found merit in the Respondent's defense. More specifically, applying the Board's established standard for determining whether an employer may lawfully conduct such a poll, the judge found that the Respondent had a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that the incumbent Union continued to have the support of a majority of the employees it represents,[2] and was therefore privileged to conduct the poll and to rely on its results in withdrawing recognition from the Union. For the reasons discussed below, we disagree with the judge.

The judge found that the cumulative effect of eight factors, which assertedly prompted the Respondent to conduct the poll, were such that any reasonable person would doubt the Union's continued majority support. On reviewing these factors, individually and in their cumulative effect, we conclude that they do not support a reasonable doubt of the Union's majority status.

The judge found that the Respondent properly relied on questions asked by unit employee union member Mark Swinehart in late February or early March. According to the Respondent's vice president, Howard M. Howes, he mentioned to Swinehart, in passing, that the Respondent would soon have to negotiate another collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and he wondered—aloud—who was going to be representing the Union on a local basis. According to Howes, Swin-

[2] See Thomas Industries, 255 NLRB 646 (1981), enf. denied 687 F.2d 863 (6th Cir. 1982). In denying enforcement of the Board's order in Thomas Industries, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the Board's above-stated standard for when an employer may lawfully poll its employees about their continued support for an incumbent union, and held instead that an employer may lawfully conduct such a poll when it has substantial, objective evidence of a loss of union support, even if that evidence is insufficient in itself to justify withdrawal of recognition (i.e., even if that evidence would not, in itself, support a reasonable doubt about the incumbent union's continued majority support). 687 F.2d at 867. The instant case arises in the Sixth Circuit. The judge, noting these circumstances, found that the Respondent's polling was lawful under either the Board's or the Sixth Circuit's standard.

ehart questioned whether there was still a union that was active at that location, and whether a union was necessary at all. Howes testifed that he did not answer Swinehart's questions and that "at that point, I really terminated the conversation . . . any further conversation about any union."[3]

Contrary to the judge, we find that Swinehart's questions to Howes do not constitute objective evidence indicating that a majority of the unit employees no longer wanted to be represented by the Union. First, we find that Swinehart's questions to Howes were, at most, little more than rhetorical questions about the current state and future role of the Union in the Respondent's operation. Second, and in any event, Swinehart's questions certainly did not indicate that he no longer wished to be represented by the Union, but rather that he was concerned about the inactivity of the Union and was questioning, rather than rejecting, the fact of union representation.

Howes conceded that this brief encounter with Swinehart was the only specific conversation that he had with any employee about the Union. Swinehart made no reference, express or implicit, to any other employee. Thus, of the five unit employees in question, Howes spoke to only one of them about the Union, and even that one employee did not indicate to Howes that he no longer desired to be represented by the Union.

Howes further testified that he overheard "general derogatory remarks and comments that reflected a lack of interest in any representation of the union." However, Howes was only able to provide one example of having overheard any such remark within the year prior to the poll in question. In this regard, Howes testified that:

> Lloyd Hedges [a unit employee-union member], you know, he might say something about, you know, "we haven't seen any union out here for a long time. The only thing we've really got from this union has been breakfast, once a month", these sorts of comments.

Howes also testified that Hedges "bemoaned the fact" that it had been a year or more since the Union had conducted meetings or sent anyone to visit the Respondent's plant. According to Howes, those sorts of general comments from Hedges were common, "it was just common knowledge." Also in this context, Swinehart testified that while he could not recall precisely what comments Hedges made about the Union in Howes' presence:[4]

> "[I]t was, you know, just comments as far as, that we should, you know, something should be done, you know, to decide what to do with the union, as far as whether to keep it, or to get rid of it, you know, either way, just . . . in general that something should be done, to get it straightened out. . . . Just, you know, whether to—if we're going to have a union, lets get a representative, and, you know, have meetings regular and all that, or, you know, just to get rid of it altogether.

We find that Hedges' remarks, overheard by Howes, are no more indicative of a loss of majority support for the Union than were Swinehart's questions, posed directly to Howes. First, Howes was able to recall overhearing only two specific remarks by Hedges: (1) that Hedges had not "seen any union out here for a long time" and (2) "the only thing we've really got from this union has been breakfast, once a month." These remarks by Hedges do not constitute objective evidence indicating that a majority of the unit employees no longer wanted to be represented by the Union. At most, these remarks by Hedges could not reasonably be construed by Howes as anything more than one employee's oblique, tongue-in-cheek expressions of dissatisfaction with the recent performance of the Union. As with Swinehart's questions, Hedges' remarks did not indicate that he or any other unit employee no longer wished to be represented by the Union. Second, these remarks by Hedges are the only arguably disparaging remarks by an employee about the Union's performance that Howes could specifically recount at the hearing. (As seen, Swinehart's questions to Howes did not expressly or implicitly disparage the Union, much less demonstrate a desire to be rid of the Union.) Additionally, beyond Hedges' remarks, Howes could only testify vaguely, generally, and without attribution that he had overheard "general derogatory remarks and comments that reflected a lack of interest in any representation of the union." We find that such unsupported, summary testimony provides no probative, material support for the Respondent's assertion that it had a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that the Union

[3] Swinehart's version of this encounter is generally consistent with Howes'. According to Swinehart:

> I asked him [i.e., Howes] about the union, just because there hadn't been any representation recently. I was just wondering where we stood with the union . . . and . . . what we could do about, or whatever, to see what was going on. And he said that we would just sort of have to wait, and see what happens . . . not really a definite reply. . . . Since there hadn't been any, really, union meetings, or anything, I just asked him how we stood with the union, or what was being done, and whether it was really, you know, necessary to have a union.

According to Swinehart, Howes did not respond to these questions.

[4] Hedges did not testify.

no longer had the support of a majority of the unit employees.[5]

The Respondent also relied on Howes' knowledge, through his unsolicited receipt of internal union correspondence, that none of the current unit members wanted to serve as local officers and that the local had recently been placed in administratorship by the parent union, United Steelworkers of America.[6] The record shows that no unit employee had served as a union officer or designated himself as a local union spokesman since April 1986. In late February or early March 1987, Don Baker, a former unit employee and former union recording secretary, sent to Howes several pieces of correspondence Baker had received in late 1986 or early 1987 from Steelworkers International headquarters and the Ohio AFL–CIO, in his former capacity as union recording secretary. Baker requested that Howes notify the International that Baker was no longer an employee or union officer and that the International should stop sending such correspondence to Baker. The correspondence in question, which Howes read, consisted of, inter alia: (1) A December 9, 1986 letter from the International president to Baker, advising him that in order "to assure the performance of the collective bargaining agreements or other duties of the bargaining representative," Local 14094 (i.e., the Union) was being placed under an administrator, Robert Andrews, and all the local officers were relieved of their duties.[7] (2) A January 30 letter from the International to Baker, and four other individuals addressed as union members, enclosing a copy of a report of the International Commission, which stated that Andrews had explained to the commission that "the membership of the local had declined to four members and that there was decided lack of interest in serving as an officer" and that "the lack of interest on the part of the remaining members is such that there is no objection to the imposition of administratorship." The report recommended that the administratorship of the Union be continued and that "serious consideration be given to the possibility of merging with a more active local, as it is unlikely that this unit will get much larger in the foreseeable future." (3) A February 25 letter from the International to Baker, advising him that the International executive board had adopted the above-described report and recommendations. (4) Two form letters, January 13 and February 5, from the Ohio AFL–CIO to "All Top Officers" (including, presumably, Baker, who received these letters), advising them that their local union had not paid per capita taxes (45 cents per member per month) to the Ohio AFL–CIO for 6 months or more.

We find, contrary to the judge, that the above union correspondence does not constitute an objective basis to support a reasonable doubt about the Union's continued majority status. First, there is no indication that any of the current unit members was even aware of the administratorship and per capita tax matters discussed in this correspondence. Second, even if they were aware of these matters, mere reluctance or unwillingness of any unit employees to seek out or accept union office is not an indication that a majority of employees no longer wish to be represented by a union. As the judge himself stated, "employees could have genuine desire to be represented by a Union but no interest whatsoever in being an officer or steward." Third, the correspondence asserts that four of the employees were union members, a clear majority of the five unit employees.

The Respondent also relied on the fact that only two of the five unit members had authorized dues checkoff. However, the failure of a majority of the unit employees to authorize dues checkoff is not indicative that a majority of the employees no longer want to be represented by the Union. First, the collective-bargaining agreement makes it clear that dues-checkoff authorization was entirely voluntary on the part of the employees. Second, and in any event, it is well settled that failure of employees to authorize dues checkoff does not indicate opposition to, or loss of support for continued representation by, the union in question.[8]

The Respondent also relied on the Union's apparent inactivity, as purportedly evidenced to Howes by the questions and remarks of Swinehart and Hedges, respectively, as set out above; the fact that the Union had not filed any grievances in over a year (since January 1986); and the fact that Howes had not seen or heard from any union official in approximately 8 months (since July 1986).

Contrary to the judge, we find that the above facts do not support the Respondent's asserted reasonable doubt about the Union's continued majority status. First, it is well settled that an absence of grievance activity, or even a union's general inactivity, vis-a-vis, an employer, is not an indication that a majority of the unit employees no longer

[5] Indeed, Swinehart's hesitant, almost tortured testimony, set out above, about what remarks Hedges might have made in Howes' presence not only fails to support the Respondent's contention but actually supports the notion that continued representation by the Union was still a decidedly open question.

[6] It appears from the record that the Union in question, Steelworkers Local 14094, the Charging Party, represents only the five-member unit involved in this case.

[7] Baker had not served as recording secretary since early 1985, and the last union officer had quit in April 1986.

wish to be represented by their union.[9] Second, under the particular circumstances of this case, which, as will be discussed below, were well known to and understood by Howes, the absence of grievance activity from early 1986 was not unusual, was reasonably foreseeable, and, in any event, was not indicative of a loss of support for the Union among the five unit employees in March 1987.

The Respondent had recognized the Union in 1972 as the representative of the Respondent's drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers. But beginning in September 1985 the Respondent's approximately 20 driver employees began to convert to independent contractor status, no longer employed by the Respondent. By March 1986, this conversion was essentially complete, and what had been a 25-employee unit composed mostly of drivers had become a 5-employee unit comprised 3 mechanics and 2 spotters. When the drivers had been unit employees, prior to 1986, they had been the principal source of grievances. Thus, according to Howes, he received 10 or 11 grievances from the Union during the 3 years prior to the conversion of the drivers to independent contractor status, and "most" of those grievances were filed by the drivers. Howes conceded that he did not have "too much trouble" from the mechanics and spotters remaining in the unit. Indeed, according to Howes, "I really didn't have too much trouble from anybody . . . no, I didn't. I didn't [have] many grievances, and we had a good relationship." Thus, by Howes' own account, he had enjoyed a good relationship with his employees; the Union had a history of not filing many grievances; most of the grievances that were filed were filed by the drivers; these drivers left the unit in late 1985 and early 1986; and Howes particularly did not have "too much trouble" from the five employees remaining in the unit—the mechanics and spotters. Under these circumstances, we find that Howes could not reasonably construe the absence of grievances since the drivers left the unit as an indication that a majority of the five mechanics and spotters remaining in the unit no longer wished to be represented by the Union. Indeed, as the judge himself states in the attached decision, "Some of the factors were ambiguous, e.g., no grievances could mean the members simply have no problems and that the Respondent was complying with the collective bargaining agreement and not reflect lack of interest in the Union."

For this same reason, we do not find that the failure of the Union to contact Howes during the 8 months between the resolution of the last grievance in July 1986 and the Union's March 1987 notification to the Respondent that it wanted to begin negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement to be an objective consideration on which the Respondent could base a reasonable doubt that the Union continued to have the support of a majority of the unit employees. Quite simply, the Union may not have felt any need to speak with Howes during these months.

Finally, the Respondent relied on the fact that for more than a year prior to the March 1987 poll in question Howes had not seen any union postings on the employee bulletin board. There is a bulletin board in the drivers' room, which is used for both company and union postings. The Union had regularly posted notices of union meetings, but Howes had not seen any such notices posted since about March 1986. However, it was in March 1986 that the drivers completed their conversion from their former status as unit employees, represented by the Union, to their current status as independent contractors, no longer represented by the Union. Thus, the absence of union postings on the drivers' room bulletin board is most reasonably explained by the fact that union notices ceased being posted there about the same time that the drivers themselves were ending their relationship with the Union, by becoming independent contractors. Although three mechanics and two spotters were still in the unit and represented by the Union, the drivers' room, according to Howes, was not used by the mechanics and spotters: "No, not really. That was basically the drivers' room. The mechanics had their own room, where they have a desk and their files and records." (Emphasis added.) The mechanics' room, located about 25 feet from the drivers' room, did not have a bulletin board.[10] Under all these circumstances, we find that there was no reasonable grounds for Howes to construe the absence of union postings on the bulletin board in the independent contractor drivers' room as an indication that a majority of the five mechanics and spotters—who had their own room, albeit without a bulletin board—no longer wanted to be represented by the Union.

In accordance with the above analysis, we find that none of the factors relied on by the Respondent in support of its asserted reasonable doubt about the Union's continued majority status constitutes in itself a sufficient objective consideration to support such a doubt. Nor do we find that these same individually insufficient factors, even when considered cumulatively, constitute sufficient objective considerations to support such a doubt.[11]

[9] See Roman Iron Works, 282 NLRB 725 (1987); Cowles Publishing Co., NLRB 903 (1986); Royal Vending Services, 275 NLRB 1222 (1985). See generally NLRB v. Flex Plastics, 726 F.2d 272 (6th Cir. 1984) (an employer must consider a union's inaction from all of the circumstances before entertaining good-faith doubts of majority status). As seen in the following discussion, the Respondent did not reasonably assess the Union's inactivity in light of all the circumstances.

[10] The mechanics and spotters were nevertheless regularly and frequently in the drivers' room, picking up and leaving off reports.

Thus, we conclude that the Respondent, lacking at the time reasonable doubt about the Union's continued majority status, acted unlawfully, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, in conducting a poll of its employees to determine whether a majority of them still wanted to be represented by the Union. Having found that the poll was unlawful, we find that the Respondent was therefore not entitled to rely on the results of that poll in deciding to withdraw recognition from the Union. We further find that the Respondent was not otherwise entitled to withdraw recognition from the Union, and we conclude, therefore, that the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from and refusal to bargain with the Union was also unlawful, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Howard M. Howes, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union, United Steelworkers of America, Local 14094, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all material times the Union has been the designated and recognized exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers.

4. By polling its employees to determine whether a majority of them still wanted to be represented by the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By withdrawing recognition from and refusing to bargain with the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The above violations of the Act are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[11] In making these findings, we are, of course, applying the Board's well-established standard for when an employer may lawfully poll its employees to determine if a majority of those employees still wish to be represented by an incumbent union. As discussed in fn. 2 above, however, we are mindful that the case arises in the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, and that the court applies a different standard for determining whether an employer has acted lawfully in conducting such a poll. More specifically, the Sixth Circuit has held that an employer may poll its employees to determine their union sentiment if it has substantial, objective evidence of a loss of union support, even if that evidence is insufficient in itself to justify withdrawal of recognition. Thomas Industries v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 863, 867 (6th Cir. 1982). In our view, and as fully discussed above, we do not find that the evidence proffered by the Respondent constitutes "substantial, objective evidence of a loss of union support."

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[12]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Howard M. Howes, Inc., Baltimore, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Polling its employees about whether they want to continue to be represented by the Union when at the time of polling the Respondent does not have a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that a majority of the employees want to continue to be represented by the Union.

(b) Withdrawing recognition from and refusing to bargain with the Union at a time when either the Union has not actually lost the support of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit or the Respondent does not have a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that a majority of the employees want to continue to be represented by the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request of the Union, recognize and bargain with the Union as the designated and recognized exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Respondent's drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers.

(b) Post at its facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps

[12] The General Counsel has requested that the Order include a visitatorial clause. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[13] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT poll our employees about whether they want to continue to be represented by the Union unless we have a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that a majority of our employees no longer want to be represented by the Union.

WE WILL NOT withdraw recognition from or refuse to bargain with the Union at a time when either the Union has the support of a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit or we do not have a reasonable doubt, based on objective considerations, that a majority of the employees want to continue to be represented by the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of your rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL, on request, recognize and bargain with the Union as the designated and recognized exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers.

HOWARD M. HOWES, INC.

Carol L. Shore, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Catherine Adams, Esq., of Columbus, Ohio, for the Respondent.
Robert Andrews, of Columbus, Ohio, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARTIN J. LINSKY, Administrative Law Judge. On 4 April 1987, a charge was filed by United Steelworkers of America, Local 14094, AFL–CIO–CLC, the Union or the Charging Party, against Howard M. Howes, Inc., Respondent.

On 20 May 1987, the National Labor Relations Board, by the Acting Regional Director for Region 9, issued a complaint that alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) when it withdrew recognition from the Union and refused to negotiate with the Union concerning a successor collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent filed an answer in which it admitted that it withdrew recognition from the Union and refused to negotiate with the Union but denied that it violated the Act in any way because, it claims, it had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority support that caused it to conduct a lawful poll that showed no support at all for continued union representation by the member of the bargaining unit.

A hearing was held in Columbia, Ohio, on 8 July 1987.

On the entire record in this case, to include posthearing briefs submitted by the General Counsel and Respondent and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDING OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent Howard M. Howes, Inc. is, and has been at all times material, an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Baltimore, Ohio, where it is engaged as a trucking contractor involved in the transportation of freight.

Respondent admits, and I find, that it is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that United Steelworkers of America, Local 14094, AFL–CIO–CLC is now, and has been at all times material a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Issues

Respondent admits that in a letter to the Union dated 30 March 1987, it withdrew recognition from the Union and refused to bargain with the Union regarding a successor collective-bargaining agreement to replace the one due to expire 23 May 1987. The Union had previously sent a letter to Respondent dated 13 March 1987 requesting bargaining regarding a successor agreement to the one due to expire 23 May 1987.

Respondent claims that it had a reasonable good-faith doubt as to the continued majority status of the Union among the bargaining unit members and conducted a lawful poll in which all five unit members said they did not wish to be represented by the Union.

Because it is conceded by the General Counsel that the poll was conducted in accordance with the standards enunicated in Strucksnes Construction Co., 165 NLRB 1062 (1967), and because the results of the poll were five to zero against continued representation by the Union, the only issue is whether Respondent could lawfully conduct the poll. In other words, did Respondent, when it conducted the poll on 21 March 1987, possess sufficient objective evidence to doubt in good faith the Union's majority support. If so, the complaint should be dismissed. If not, Respondent should be ordered to recognize the Union and bargain with it in good faith.

B. Background and Discussion

Since approximately 1972 Respondent has recognized the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative for its drivers, mechanics, and dispatchers. Respondent and the Union had entered into a number of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which was effective by its terms for the period 23 May 1984 through 23 May 1987.

Beginning in September 1985 and because of economic difficulties Respondent began to restructure its work force. Its drivers went from being employee drivers who drove Respondent's trucks to independent contractors, who were not employees of Respondent and who owned and drove their own trucks. By March 1986 the net result of this restructuring, which was accomplished by attrition and with apparent union approval, was that the number of employees in the bargaining unit represented by the Union declined from approximately 25 employees, the vast majority of which were drivers, to 5 employees. The five employees remaining in the unit consisted of three mechanics and two spotters.

On 13 March 1987 the Union notified Respondent in writing of its desire to commence negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement to replace the one due to expire on 23 May 1987. At this time there were five employees, i.e., three mechanics and two spotters, in the unit. The mechanics and their dates of hire were Mark Swinehart (6 April 1982), Todd Bader (3 March 1986), and Tom Morris (15 August 1986). The spotters and their dates of hire were Lloyd Hedges (6 July 1963) and Don Young (1 July 1986).

Howard M. Howes, Respondent's vice president and the person in charge of labor management matters for Respondent, decided to conduct a poll of the employees in the unit to see if they still wished to be represented by the Union.

His reasons for conducting the poll were as follows:

1. Although the collective-bargaining agreement called for mandatory dues checkoff that would be activated when the Union submitted a written document from the employee authorizing dues checkoff to Respondent, only two of the five members of the unit, i.e., Lloyd Hedges and Mark Swinehart, had dues checked off.

2. None of the five employees in the bargaining unit was either a union officer or designated as a steward.

3. No grievances had been filed since January 1986.

4. For more than a year prior to the March 1987 poll Howes had not seen any union postings on the employee bulletin board.

5. With the exception of an arbitration hearing in July 1986 growing out of a grievance filed in January 1986 Howes had not seen or heard from Robert Andrews, the Union's business representative or any other union official.

6. In late February or early March 1987 Howes commented to employees Mark Swinehart that negotiations for a new contract would be coming up and he (Howes) wondered who would be representing the Union and Swinehart, according to Howes "questioned whether or not there was still a union that was active at the location, and whether or not a union was necessary at all,"[1]

7. On a number of occasions for about a year prior to March 1987 Howes heard comments from longtime employee Lloyd Hedges to the effect that the employees had not seen the Union at the workplace for a long time and the only thing the employees really got from the Union had been breakfast—an apparent reference to the fact that breakfast would be served at the union meetings that were held in the mornings—and, further, Hedges told Howes that the Union did not have meetings any more.

8. In late February or early March 1987 Don Baker, who formerly had been an employee truckdriver for Respondent and who was now an independent contractor and no longer in the unit, came to see Howes. Baker, who had been recording secretary for the Union when he was an employee, voluntarily gave a pile of mail to Howes, which mail Baker had received from the Union. Baker gave it to Howes because Baker had no interest in it because he was no longer a member, much less an officer, of the Union. Howes looked at this mail matter that disclosed that the members of the unit had so little interest in serving in union positions that the local had been placed in administratorship and Robert Andrews named as administrator.

Based on the above Howes concluded that Hedges and Swinehart, the only employees in the unit who were union members and who had their dues checked off, had little interest in continued representation by the Union, and that none of the remaining three members of the unit, i.e., Young, Bader, or Morris had any interest at all in the Union because they were not even members.

Howes consulted legal counsel and was advised how to conduct a poll of his employees to determine if they wished to continue to be represented by the Union. Counsel's instructions included written instructions, which contained the suggestion that the Union be contacted and offered the opportunity to be present at the polling. Howes did not call Robert Andrews, union staff representative, however, until the day before the poll and Andrews was not able to be present due to a prior engagement. There is no evidence that Andrews contacted any of the employees in the unit to talk to them about the poll although he was obviously at liberty to do so nor is there any evidence that Andrews sought to have the poll delayed until he was able to be present. The employees were told to report for a meeting on 21 March 1987, they did so, and were told for the first time that a poll was to be conducted. A local attorney, Bill Hayes, conducted the poll that was to be a secret written ballot. All five employees in the unit voted "no" to the question "Do you wish to be represented by the United Steelworkers of America?" Thereafter, Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union effective 23 May 1987 when the collective-bargaining agreement expired. Respondent honored the terms and conditions of the contract until it expired on 23 May 1987 but refused to negotiate a successor collective-bargaining agreement.

It is my conclusion that based on all the evidence available to Respondent that Respondent had an objective basis for doubting the Union's majority status such that it was authorized to conduct the poll. Thomas Industries, 255 NLRB 646, 647 (1981), enf. granted in part and denied in part 687 F.2d 863 (6th Cir. 1982). Any poll would be required to be conducted in accordance with the standards enunciated in the case of Strucksnes Construction Co., supra.[2]

The cumulative effect of the eight factors noted above, which prompted Respondent to conduct the poll, were such that any reasonable person would doubt the Union's continued majority support. The only two members of the Union, Hedges and Swinehart, criticized the Union and Swinehart questioned the need for the Union and although neither circulated a petition to decertify the Union it was plainly apparent that at least Swinehart did not support the Union. None of the other three employees in the unit—Bader, Morris, or Young—were even members of the Union. None of the five were officers. There was no steward. There was no union presence and had not been for over a year. It would appear to a reasonable person that the employees were not interested in the Union and vice versa. When the Union was advised that Respondent was going to conduct the poll it did not even attempt to persuade Respondent to postpone the poll. Some of the factors were ambiguous, e.g., no grievances could mean the members simply have no problems and that Respondent was complying with the collective-bargaining agreement and did not reflect lack of interest in the Union. Further, employees could have a genuine desire to be represented by a Union but no interest whatsoever in being an officer or steward. But the cumulative effect of all the factors clearly establishes a good-faith doubt of continued majority support.

A poll is justified only if the employer has an objective basis for doubting in good faith the Union's majority status. The Board in Thomas Industries, supra, took the position that an employer must set forth objective evidence establishing that over 50 percent of the affected employees have rejected the incumbent union as their representative before the employer may take a poll. The Sixth Circuit, in enforcing in part and rejecting in part, the Board's decision in Thomas Industries, supra, adopted a different test and held that "an employer may poll its employees to determine their union sentiment if it has substantial, objective evidence of a loss of union support, even if that evidence is insufficient in itself to justify withdrawal." Thomas Industries v. NLRB, 687 F.2d 863, 867 (6th Cir. 1982). Under either test I conclude that Respondent in this case could conduct a poll.[3] Swinehart's comments to Howes and the failure of Bader, Morris, and Young to even join the Union reflect lack of interest in union representation by four of the five members or 80 percent of the unit and Hedges, the fifth and last member of the unit, was critical of the Union in numerous comments to Howes over a period of a year.[4] The combination of this and the other factors cited above permitted Respondent, in my opinion, to conduct the poll.

I note, however, as did the Sixth Circuit in Thomas Industries v. NLRB, supra at 869, that the filing of a decertification petition would have been a better way to handle the matter of determining continuing union support than conducting a poll. I conclude, in addition, that Respondent acted in good faith when I consider what it did in light of the totality of all the circumstances. Celanese Corp. of America, 95 NLRB 664, 673 (1951).

Although the results of a poll cannot be used to justify the taking of a poll I note that all five members of the unit voted unanimously against continued union representation and there was no evidence that any voter in the poll was coerced or tricked into voting "no" when he really wanted to vote "yes" regarding continued representation.

Lastly, the unit consists of only five employees and the Union is obviously at liberty to conduct an organizing campaign among these employees. Because this is a very small unit it does not appear that an organizing campaign will be too great an exercise if the employees change their mind and want representation.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Howard M. Howes, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Steelworkers of America, Local 14094, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[2] Absent unusual circumstances, the polling of employees by an employer will be violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act unless the following safeguards are observed: (1) the purpose of the poll is to determine the truth of a union's claim of majority, (2) this purpose is communicated to the employees, (3) assurances against reprisal are given, (4) the employees are polled by secret ballot, and (5) the employer has not engaged in unfair labor practices or otherwise created a coercive atmosphere.

[3] I note that Respondent, an Ohio corporation, is within the jurisdiction of the Sixth Circuit but that does not necessarily mean the Sixth Circuit would handle this case if the matter goes to the court of appeals. See Arvin Industries, 285 NLRB 753 (1987).

[4] Although new employees are ordinarily presumed to support an incumbent union in the same proportion as their predecessors (see Cutter Supermarket, 220 NLRB 507 (1975)), in the instant case the three new employees had nothing whatsoever to do with the Union.

August 25, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 3, 1988, Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Taino Paper Company, Inc., Bayamon, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] On November 1, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL–CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to recommend that the notice be posted in English and Spanish. We agree and order posting in both languages.

Efrain Rivera-Vega, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Manuel A. Nunez, Esq., of Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, for the Company.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on 16 November 1987.[1] The case arose when Union de Tronquistas de Puerto Rico, Local 901, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamster, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (Union) filed an unfair labor practice charge against Taino Paper Company, Inc. (Company) on 27 March. The charge was amended on 31 March and 22 May. Acting on behalf of the Board's General Counsel, the Regional Director for Region 24 investigated the charge and thereafter, on 27 May, issued a complaint and notice of hearing (complaint) alleging the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).[2] The gravamen of the complaint is that the Company laid off 24 specifically named employees on 18 March without notice and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to bargain, as the exclusive representative of certain of the Company's employees, regarding the layoff and its effects. The Company answered, admitting many background and jurisdictional contentions made in the complaint, but denied all claimed wrongdoings.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, introduce relevant evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs filed by the Company and the General Counsel have been carefully considered.

I conclude below, after examining the relevant evidence and applicable legal principles, that the Company violated the Act substantially as alleged in the complaint.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company is a Puerto Rico corporation with an office and place of business located at Bayamon, Puerto Rico, where it is engaged in the manufacture and distribution of paper bags. Annually, the Company purchases and receives goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. The parties admit, and I find, that the Company is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The parties admit, and I find, the Union is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The issues may be generally summarized for discussion as follows:

1. Whether the Union was the collective-bargaining representative of the production and maintenance employees of the Company at the time of the 18 March layoff.

2. Whether the Company's decision to have a layoff was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

3. Whether the Company's failure to give notice to, and bargain with, the Union about the decision to have a layoff and its effects on unit employees violated the Act.

If it is decided the Company violated the Act, that would constitute an appropriate remedy. Each of the generalized issues may and, in most cases, will have

[1] All dates are 1987 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] I granted counsel for the General Counsel's unopposed motion to delete the 8(a)(1) allegations set forth at par. 9 of the complaint inasmuch as the parties had executed, and the Regional Director for Region 24 had approved, an informal settlement agreement remedying all 8(a)(1) allegations in that paragraph of the complaint.

intertwined therewith certain subissues that will also be considered.

B. Background and Operative Facts

The following chronological account of the background and operative facts is for the greater part admitted, stipulated to, or uncontested.

The Company commenced operations in 1984 and has from its inception been managed by Edgar Rodriguez (Rodriquez), its president. The Company manufactures paper and bread bags and obtains the basic raw materials for its production from either the United States or certain South American countries. The Company, at relevant times, employed approximately 35 or 36 production and maintenance employees. Prior to the March layoff, which is the only layoff at issue, the Company had three layoffs, each of which was brought about by an excess of finished products. The there pre-March layoffs occurred in October/Novermber 1984 (involving 20 employees), September/October 1985 (involving 10 employees), and January/February 1986 (involving 15 employees). Each of the pre-March layoffs lasted approximately 1 week.

The employees were selected for the layoffs in 1984, 1985, and 1986 based on seniority and in accordance with the Unjust Dismissal Law of Puerto Rico Public Law No. 80 of 1976 (Pub. L. No. 80).[3]

Pursuant to a Board-conducted election held on 13 March, to which no objections were filed by the Company, the Union was selected as the bargaining representative for certain employees in an appropriate unit at the Company.[4]

On 16 March, the Company began contemplating the need to lay off certain unit employees. It is somewhat unclear whether the actual decision to have the March layoff was made on 16 or 17 March; however, it is undisputed the Company notified the employees involved in writing late in the work shift on the afternoon of 17 March that they would be laid off effective the next day, 18 March.[5] Twenty-four of the Company's 35 or 36 unit employees were actually laid off on 18 March.[6]

The employees were laid off according to seniority with certain exceptions.[7]

Portions of the first-shift and all the second-shift operations were discontinued during the March layoff. None of the laid-off employees received any wages or economic remunerations while they were on layoff status. The Company did provide medical coverage for the laid-off employees until the end of March. It also provided medical coverage for most, if not all, the employees that were returned to work during the month of April.

The Company did not notify the Union of the March layoff. Company President Rodriguez testified the Union was not notified because (1) the layoff was routine in that similar layoffs had occurred in the past, (2) the Union had not been certified and he did not know he needed to notify the Union, and (3) the layoff was unavoidable in that the Company could not pay employees when it had no work for them to perform.

It is undisputed that after the layoff occurred, the Union did not request, either orally or in writing, that the Company bargain with in concerning the layoff.[8]

On 23 March, the Board certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative for the employees in the above-described appropriate unit.

President Rodriguez testified that all those laid off in March were recalled except for five or so who voluntarily resigned their employment with the Company.[9]

It is undisputed that following the March layoff, the Company laid off certain unit employees on 8 July and 9 September because of a surplus in finish products. The Company notified the Union, both telephonically and in writing, before the post-March layoffs took place. A rep-

[3] Sec. 185(b) "Just Cause For Discharge" states in pertinent part: "Good cause for the discharge of an employee of an establishment shall be understood to be: (f) Reductions in employment made necessary by a reduction in the volume of production, sales or profits, anticipated or prevalent at the time of the discharge." Sec. 185(c) "Order of Retaining Employees" states:

> In any case where employees are discharged for the reasons indicated in subsections (d), (e), and (f) of the preceding section, it shall be the duty of the employer to retain with preference in the job those employees of greater seniority provided there are positions vacant or filled by employees of less seniority in the employment within their occupational classification which may be held by them, it being understood that preference shall be given to the employees discharged in the event that within the 6 months following their layoff the employer needs to employ a person in like or similar work to that which said employees were doing prior to the time or their discharge and within their occupational classification, following also the seniority order in the reinstatement, except, and in both situations, in those cases in which there is a clear and conclusive difference in favor of the efficiency or capacity of the workers compared, in which case the capacity shall prevail.

[4] The unit description is as follows:

> Included: All production and maintenance employees including operators, bonders (empacadores), machine tenders, and janitors employed by Respondent at Urbanizacion Industrial Minillas, Bayamon, Puerto Rico.
> Excluded: All other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[5] The written notification, which was signed by President Rodriguez, stated in pertinent part:

> We regret to inform you that as of March 18, 1987 you are partially suspended from employment without pay until further notice due to lack of raw materials.

[6] The 24 employees involved were Herminio Arroyo Pantoja, Miguel Class Davila, Antonio Conde, David Colon, Carlos Cruz Pastrana, Ramon Huertas Rodriguez, David Lopez Ojeda, Efrain Lozada Fuentes, Edwin Maysonet Rivera, Ruben Marcano Reyes, Juan Merced Rosado, Nelson Nieves Ruiz, Hector Nieves Ruiz, Juan Ortiz Marcano, Carlos Pacheco, Manuel Padilla Ortiz, Carlos Ramos Ferrer, Juan Rivera Rivera, Luis M. Reyes Rosado, Luis A. Reyes Rosado, Ramon Rodriguez Reyes, Luis Rodriguez Coira, Juan Sanchez, and Saul Ventura Viera.

[7] All employees from No. 35, the least senior employee on a company-prepared seniority list, to No. 9 inclusive were subject to layoff. Marvin Rodriguez, a maintenance adjustor (No. 35 on the list); Jose A. Gonzalez de Jesus (No. 30 on the list), a maintenance tool-and-die maker; and Jesus Laureano Gonzalez (No. 11 on the list), a mechanic, were not laid off. Company President Rodriguez contends these three were needed to maintain equipment. Ivan Ajenjo Laureano, the least senior employee at the Company, was not laid off. The Company contends he was not included on its seniority list nor was he laid off because the Union had challenged his vote in the Board-conducted election on 13 March as being an administrative employee. Employee Ruben Marcano testified Baureano worked as a unit employee during the time of the March layoff and has thereafter continued to perform unit work.

[8] As is noted elsewhere in this decision, the Union did file the refusal-to-bargain charge against the Company on 27 March.

[9] The General Counsel was unable at trial to stipulate that all the laid-off employees had in fact been recalled. In his posttrial brief, however, he concedes most, if not all, have been recalled.

resentative of the Union informed the Company on both occasions it saw no problems with the layoffs and told the Company it could proceed with the layoffs.[10]

C. Contentions of the Parties

Highlights of the parties' contentions are briefly summarized as follows:[11]

The General Counsel contends the Union was the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in question at the time of the March layoff, that the Company acted without notice to or bargaining with the Union concerning the layoff, that the layoff was a mandatory subject of bargaining, that the layoff constituted a material, substantial, and significant change in the terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees, and that, as such, the Company was obligated to notify and bargain with the Union about the layoff. The General Counsel contends the Company's failure to do so violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Company denies it had an obligation to bargain with the Union or that it violated the Act. More specifically, the Company contends its decision to have a layoff on 18 March was a managerial one of the sort that is at the core of entrepreneurial control and not subject to mandatory bargaining. The Company also contends it followed its past practice of laying off by seniority and of being in compliance with the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and, as such, the layoff was routine and its actions were unavoidable. The Company further contends the Union waived any right it may have had with respect to bargaining because it did not make a request to do so.

D. Discussions

Inasmuch as the underlying representation proceeding resulted in certification, the Union was the collective-bargaining representative of the laid-off employees on the date they were laid off. Not only had the Union won the 13 March representation election prior to the layoff, but the Company had not filed objections to the election results. Therefore, at the time of the 18 March layoff the Company knew the Union would be, and it thereafter on 23 March was, certified as the collective-bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees. When an employer, such as the Company, makes changes in terms and conditions of employment of unit employees after an election, but before a union is certified, it does so at its peril in the absence of compelling economic considerations. See GMC Co., 209 NLRB 701 (1974), enf. denied on other grounds 512 F.2d 684 (8th Cir. 1975). See also Clements Wire & Mfg. Co., 257 NLRB 1058 (1981).

I am persuaded the Company has failed to demonstrate "compelling economic considerations" that would have absolved it from being required to notify the Union and to bargain concerning the layoff. It would appear the underlying rationale for not requiring bargaining when there are "compelling economic considerations" is those situations in which an unforeseen occurrence having a major economic effect is about to happen that requires immediate action. Angelica Healthcare Services, 284 NLRB 844 (1987). Such might, for example, be the case when a major piece of machinery breaks down and there is no time to notify the Union before a temporary layoff is necessary. In the case sub judice, however, the Company knew as early as 16 March that a layoff was eminent, and on 17 March it notified the employees in question that there would be a layoff the next day, but did not notify the Union. Thus, the Company had time to notify the Union and, if requested, to bargain about the layoffs. The Company has made no showing that the situation was so urgent it could not have notified the Union.

The law is settled that an employer violates its duty to bargain with the exclusive representative of its employees by unilaterally implementing changes in terms and conditions of their employment. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). A layoff of unit employees, such as the one herein, falls within the scope of terms and conditions of employment over which an employer has an obligation to bargain. See, e.g., U.S. Gypsum Co., 94 NLRB 112 114 (1951), and Southern Coach & Body Co. 141 NLRB 80, 81 (1963). The Company's contention that for it to have maintained its entire work force any longer than it did would have been "an unsound business practice" that would have made it "less competitive" and "hurt its economic stability" are insufficient defenses to justify the unilateral changes it made in the terms and conditions of employment of its unit employees. See Van Dorn Co., 265 NLRB 864, 865 (1982), enfd. in part as modified 736 F.2d 343 (6th Cir. 1984).

The Company's contention that the March layoff, due in part to a lack of raw materials was not a mandatory subject of bargaining because it was an economically motivated decision within the meaning of Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984), and First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981), is without merit. First, in order for the teachings of Otis Elevator Co. or First National Maintenance Corp. to be applicable, the Company would have had to have established that the layoff was a result of a change in the scope, nature, or direction of its business. This it failed to do. The fact the Company recalled the laid-off employees (except those who resigned) refutes any contention on its part that the layoff was a change in the scope, nature, or direction of its business. The Company's motivation for the layoff was an attempt to avoid labor costs. As Company President Rodriguez testified, the decision to have the layoff was based in part on a lack of available raw materials, but also in part because the Company did not wish to pay wages for its entire work force without work for all its employees to perform. Thus, the layoff was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

Even when, as in this case, the change involves a mandatory subject of bargaining, it does not completely resolve the issue of an employer's bargaining obligation. For a statutory bargaining obligation to arise regarding [10] Seven unit employees were laid off on 8 July and the second shift was temporarily discontinued as a result of the 9 September layoff.

[11] I have not attempted to summarize all contentions made by the parties at this point in the decision; however, all contentions and arguments of the parties have been considered and, to the extent necessary, fully discussed.

any particular unilateral change that an employer implements, such must be a material, substantial, and significant one affecting terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit employees. United Technologies Corp., 278 NLRB 306 (1986). I find the layoff at issue had a material, substantial, and significant impact on unit employees. The layoff adversely affected 24 of the Company's 35 or 36 production and maintenance employees. Those laid off did not receive any wages or economic remunerations (except health coverage) during the time they were laid off. Additionally, the layoff caused the Company to cease its second shift operations altogether during the layoff.

In light of the above, it is clear the General Counsel has established a prima facie showing of an 8(a)(5) violation. The General Counsel has demonstrated, (1) the Union was the bargaining representative of the laid-off employees at the time of their layoff, (2) the layoff was a mandatory subject of bargaining, (3) the Company did not give notice to, nor did it bargain with, the Union about the decision to have a layoff or its impact on unit employees, and (4) the layoff constituted a material, substantial, and significant change in the terms and conditions of employment of unit employees.

After the General Counsel establishes a prima facie case, as he has done herein, it is incumbent on the Company to demonstrate that its refusal to bargain was priviledged. See Van Dorn Co., supra. This it has failed to do.

The Company's contention that the March layoff was routine and that it followed past practice regarding implementing the layoff is no defense to its unilateral action. In the 3 years prior to the March layoff, the Company only had three other layoffs, each of which resulted from an excess of inventory and not as a result of a lack of available raw materials. Thus, in my opinion, the Company has not had a sufficient number of layoffs to demonstrate a past practice even if layoffs for excessive inventory were analogous to layoffs for a lack of available raw materials. Furthermore the pre-March layoffs took place before the Union was the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in question. The Company's past practices, prior to the Union being the representative of its employees, does not relieve it of its obligation to give notice to and bargain with the Union concerning laying off unit employees. See Amsterdam Printing Litho Corp., 223 NLRB 370 (1976), enfd. 559 F.2d 188 (D.C. Cir. 1977). Furthermore, the Company may not justify its unilateral action in March by showing, as it did, that it thereafter, in two subsequent layoffs, gave notice to the Union concerning those layoffs. Such post-March layoff conduct is irrelevant regarding the legality of the Company's actions in March. It would be speculative to infer that because the Union did not request bargaining on the two post-March layoffs that it would not have requested bargaining concerning the layoff at issue.

The Company's contention that, because it complied with Pub. L. No. 80 and followed strict seniority in the March layoff, there was nothing the Union could have done to have avoided the layoff or those selected for layoff and it would have made "no sense" for it to have notified or bargained with the Union is without merit. First, Pub. L. No. 80 governs the discharge and not the layoff of employees in those cases when the layoff is for 3 months or less.[12] Because the Company contends all (except those who voluntarily resigned) were called before 3 months, Pub. L. No. 80 would not have governed or been applicable to the layoff. Second, even if Pub. L. No. 80 applied, it does not require strict compliance with seniority in that it allows an employer to retain less senior, but more efficient, employees. In this regard, the evidence demonstrates the Company did not follow strict seniority in selecting employees for the layoff. It explained it needed Marvin Rodriguez, Jose A. Gonzalez de Jesus, and Jesus Laureano Gonzalez to maintain its equipment, but it did not adequately explain why it retained Ivan Ajenjo Laureano, the least senior employee at the plant, to perform unit work during and after the layoff. Thus, the Company was not required to follow Pub. L. No. 80, nor did it select the employees for layoff by strict seniority.

I reject the Company's argument, alluded to above, that it would have made "no sense" to have notified the Union or to have bargained with it about the layoff because there was nothing the Union could have done to have changed the outcome. The Board has long held that the statutory duty to give notice and bargain is not limited to those situations in which mutually acceptable solutions are guaranteed or even reasonably likely. See Awrey Bakeries, 217 NLRB 730, 733 (1975), enfd. per curiam 548 F.2d 138 (6th Cir. 1976).

Finally, I find no merit to the Company's contention that the Union waived its right to bargain over the layoff because it made no request either orally or in writing to do so. It is undisputed the Union was confronted with a fait accompli at the time it learned of the March layoff. It is clear Board precedent does not require a union to request bargaining when confronted with a fait accompli. See Migali Industries, 285 NLRB 820 (1987).

Accordingly, I find the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally laying off certain of its employees on 18 March without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain regarding such acts and conduct and the effects of such acts and conduct.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company, Tanio Paper Company, Inc., is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Union de Tronquistas de Puerto Rico, Local 901, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[12] This interpretation of Pub. L. No. 80 appears to be supported by the "Guidelines for the Interpretation and Application of Law No. 80," approved 30 May 1976 by the Office of the Solicitor, Department of Labor and Human Resources of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. I grant the General Counsel's unopposed motion to supplement the record to include as an exhibit applicable portions of the above-described document. I have labeled the Spanish translation as G.C. Exh. 4(a) and the English translation as G.C. Exh. 4(b).

3. All production and maintenance employees, including operators, bonders (empacadores), machine tenders, and janitors employed by the Company at Urbanizacion Industrial Minillas, Bayamon, Puerto Rico, but excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

4. The Union is now, and at all times material has been, the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the above unit employees within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. On or about 18 March, by unilaterally laying off certain of its unit employees without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to bargain regarding the layoff and its effects, the Company has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by laying off employees Herminio Arroyo Pantoja, Miguel Class Davila, Antonio Conde, David Colon, Carlos Cruz Pastrana, Ramon Huertas Rodriguez, David Lopez Ojeda, Efrain Lozada Fuentes, Edwin Maysonet Rivera, Ruben Marcano Reyes, Juan Merced Rosado, Nelson Rosado, Nelson Nieves Ruiz, Hector Nieves Ruiz, Juan Ortiz Marcano, Carlos Pacheco, Manuel Padilla Ortiz, Carlos Ramos Ferrer, Juan Rivera Rivera, Luis M. Reves Rosado, Luis A. Reyes Rosado, Ramon Rodriguez Reyes, Luis Rodriguez Coira, Juan Sanchez, and Saul Ventura Viera without notice to and bargaining with the Union, I shall order the Company, on request, to bargain with the Union concerining the 18 March layoff. I shall further order that the Company make whole the employees laid off on 18 March by paying them their normal wages from the date of their layoff until they were recalled to work.[13] Backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[14] In the absence of special circumstances, the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[13] Any dispute concerning when any particular employee was returned to work can be resolved at the compliance stage of this case. Further, any dispute whether certain employees resigned rather than accept recall shall also be left to the compliance stage of this case. I reject the Company's contention that any remedy requiring backpay in the circumstances of this case would be punitive rather than remedial. See, e.g., Intersystems Design Corp., 278 NLRB 759 (1986).

[14] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The Company, Taino Paper Company, Inc., Bayamon, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unilaterally laying off employees without notice to or bargaining with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the below-described appropriate bargaining unit prior to making such changes.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively and in good faith, with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the below-described bargaining unit concerning the 18 March layoff. The appropriate unit is:

> Included: All production and maintenance employees including operators, bonders (emplacadores), machine tenders, and janitors employed by Respondent at Urbanizacion Industrial Minillas, Bayamon, Puerto Rico.
> Excluded: All other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Make whole those employees laid off on 18 March for any loss of pay suffered as a result of this unlawful conduct in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally without notice to or bargaining with the Union layoff employees in the following bargaining unit, which is represented for the purposes of collective bargaining by Union de Tronquistas de Puerto Rico, Local 901, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO:

Included: All production and maintenance employees including operators, bonders (empacadores), machine tenders, and janitors employed by Respondent at Urbanizacion Industrial Minillas, Bayamon, Puerto Rico.

Excluded: All other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain collectively and in good faith with Union de Tronquistas de Puerto, Local 901, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the above-described unit concerning the layoff on 18 March 1987.

WE WILL make Herminio Arroyo Pantoja, Miguel Class Davila, Antonia Conde, David Colon, Carlos Cruz Pastrana, Ramon Huertas Rodriguez, David Lopez Ojeda, Efrain Lozada Fuentes, Edwin Maysonet Rivera, Ruben Marcano Reyes, Juan Merced Rosado, Nelson Nieves Ruiz, Hector Nieves Ruiz, Juan Ortiz Marcano, Carlos Pacheco, Manuel Padilla Ortiz, Carlos Ramos Ferrer, Juan Rivera Rivera, Luis M. Reyes Rosado, Luis A. Reyes Rosado, Ramon Rodriguez Reyes, Luis Rodriguez Coira, Juan Sanchez, and Saul Ventura Viera whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of their being laid off on 18 March 1987, with interest.

Montgomery Ward and Warehouse Employees Local Union No. 730, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO. Case 5–CA–18197

August 25, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 27, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief. The Charging Party filed cross-exceptions and a supporting memorandum.

The National Labor Relations Board has considered the decision and record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order[2] as modified below.

The Charging Party excepts to the judge's failure to pass on and find the 8(a)(3) and (1) allegation that the Respondent discriminatorily transferred John Wagnon from his position as merchandise handler in the warehouse to receiving clerk in the customer pickup area. We find merit in this exception.

Wagnon began employment with the Respondent in May 1983 and worked as 1 of 10 merchandise handlers in the warehouse. Approximately six of the merchandise handlers, including Wagnon, were receivers who unloaded and delivered incoming merchandise. Wagnon was the most senior receiver and the only one with keys to the unloading doors. As a merchandise handler, Wagnon regularly came into contact with all warehouse employees, approximately 25. He was a known union adherent who initially contacted the Union in late May to early June 1986, attended the initial organizational meeting, became a member of the union-organizing committee, wore union buttons, solicited authorization cards, distributed union literature, and "set up shop" in the break room to discuss the Union with fellow employees during their common breaks and lunch periods.

On July 3, 1986, Wagnon was transferred to the position of receiving clerk in the customer pickup center. As the customer pickup attendant, Wagnon worked alone unless a backlog occurred and he requested assistance. His lunch and break periods no longer coincided with those of other employees. Two weeks before his change in job assignments, Wagnon was told by Lawrence E. Loveland, receiving and shipping supervisor, that the customer pickup attendant was coming into the warehouse and Wagnon could train him because Wagnon was the senior receiver. Precipitately, Loveland told Wagnon that someone else would perform the training and, without discussion, Wagnon was transferred to the customer pickup department. Based on the Respondent's animus, as demonstrated by the Respondent's other unfair labor practices, its admitted knowledge of Wagnon's union activities, its unlawful suspension of Wagnon on June 25, and the unexplained and abrupt transfer of Wagnon, the senior receiver in merchandise handling, to the customer pickup area, we find that the Respondent was seeking to take Wagnon out of circulation and to isolate him from other employees because of his union activities. Accordingly, we conclude that the Respondent discriminatorily transferred John Wagnon from his position as merchandise handler in the warehouse to the position of customer pickup attendant in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent excepts to the judge's findings that Thomas Cato was in charge of distribution centers all over the eastern United States, that all 22 technicians take the Respondent's vans home at the end of the workday, and that Douglass was fired on June 20, 1986, the day after the first union organizational meeting. The record establishes that Thomas Cato is the vice president in charge of distribution over 16 distribution centers and 2 fashion distribution centers nationally. The record further establishes that the Respondent employs 22 field technicians and 9 shop technicians at its Landover, Maryland facility. Approximately six to eight field technicians participate in a shuttle program that requires them to drive the Respondent's service trucks home at night. Their work assignments are delivered to their homes, and they begin their routes directly from their homes each morning. Finally, the complaint alleges that about June 23, the Respondent terminated its employee, John Douglass. In its answer, the Respondent admits that about June 20, 1986, it discharged Douglass. The record establishes that on June 20, Douglass received a corrective action notice (G.C. Exh. 4) that read, "Violation No. 1" with no violation name, type, or action taken. Thereafter, on June 23, 1986, the same corrective action notice was changed to read, "Violation No. 6, Violation Name—Fraudulent/Deceptive practices" and stated, "Employee is to be terminated per R.L. Quillen area 16 area service manager." (G.C. Exh. 2.)

The Respondent contends that the judge resolved only 6 of 10 allegations that it unlawfully granted improved conditions of employment. The Charging Party excepts to the judge's failure to find that the Respondent unlawfully provided coverage for its employees under a health maintenance organization. The judge did conclude that the Respondent unlawfully granted "improved conditions of employment such as medical insurance." We find it unnecessary to pass on additional allegations that the Respondent unlawfully granted improved conditions of employment, as the remedy would not be affected.

[2] The Charging Party excepted to the judge's failure to include an expungement remedy in his recommended Order. We shall order the Respondent to remove any reference to the transfer, suspension, and discharge of John Wagnon and to the discharge of John Douglass from its records.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Montgomery Ward, Landover, Maryland, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Transferring, suspending, discharging, or in any other way discriminating against its employees in retaliation for their protected union activity.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union support or union activities.

(c) Telling employees it is aware of their individual union activity.

(d) Offering to take employees to the union hall to assist them in canceling their union authorization cards.

(e) Soliciting grievances from employees to dissuade them from engaging in union activities.

(f) Granting improved conditions of employment to induce employees to withhold support from the Union; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be construed as requiring it to vary or abandon any economic benefit or any term or condition of employment that it has established.

(g) Inviting employees to form an employee committee to deal with the Respondent in place of a collective-bargaining agent.

(h) Threatening to close its plant and discharge its employees.

(i) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer John Wagnon and John Douglass immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[4]

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful suspension and discharges of John Wagnon and John Douglass and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the suspension and discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Post at its facility in Landover, Maryland, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[3] As we have found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) by transferring John Wagnon from his position as merchandise handler receiving incoming supplies to the position of customer pickup attendant prior to his discharge, we shall order the Respondent to reinstate Wagnon to the position of receiver in merchandise handling from which he was removed on July 3.

[4] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held on 12, 13, and 14 January 1987 in Washington, D.C., on complaint of the General Counsel against Montgomery Ward (Respondent or Company). The complaint issued on 26 September 1986 on a charge filed on 7 July 1986 by Warehouse Employees Local Union No. 730, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO (Union or Charging Party). The issues presented are whether the Respondent discharged two employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and committed other violations of Section 8(a)(1). Briefs were filed after the close of the hearing by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

On the entire record and from my observation of the witnesses I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Montgomery Ward, an Illinois corporation, is engaged in the retail sale of goods and services. Its business location at Landover, Maryland, is involved in this proceeding. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, in the course and conduct of its operations, the Respondent derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000. During the same period it sold and shipped from its Landover, Maryland facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $5000 directly to points outside the State of Maryland. I find that that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that Warehouse Employees Local Union No. 730, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

This case turns entirely on questions of credibility. In the very heat of a union organizational campaign among the employees two men were discharged, both overtly active in the movement, one of them actually the moving force. The complaint alleges both men were discharged as a technique to curb the union activity. Denying that charge, the Respondent asserts they were terminated for having violated the work rules in effect. Considering the record as a whole, which side is to be believed? When the two men were fired they were told the reason was violation of the rules. But the management agents who participated in that decision also testified about other things that happened during the critical period. If they were not telling the truth about conversations and activities by the Respondent, their credibility about the major questions becomes suspect.

The more direct questions of credibility involve what was said and done by the participants in the whole story. The witnesses disagreed concerning conversations that took place, including critical talks given by one of the Respondent's top officials. These questions do not call for inferences or conclusions to be drawn from the facts. They go instead to the very question of what was said and, in fact, done by the participants. But there is a direct relationship between the two credibility problems—one to resolve questions of intent or motivation in the minds of the supervisors when they fired the two men. The testimony concerning four critical events that took place will set the story straight.

The union organizational campaign started in late April and early June 1986. The Respondent, of course, learned about it. On 25 June Tom Cato, a vice president of the Respondent whose office is in Chicago and who is in charge of warehouse and distribution centers all over the Eastern United States, like the one involved in this case, came to Landover. It was the first time he had ever visited that location seriously. His purpose was to speak to the employees, whom he gathered in groups of 12, 15, or 20 in separate meetings that day. Dixie Zais, an employee, testified about what Cato told the group. From her testimony:

> He talked about the Company, about being new with the Company, and that he was learning, that if we had any suggestions or questions that had to do with the Company to, please, ask him. Some people had questions. He also said he knew the union was trying to come in, and that he did not like to deal with third parties . . . .
> Q. Can you remember any other suggestions that employees made to him at that meeting?
> A. Some of them suggested putting files on microfilm. They needed supplies in the ladies' room, just things like that.

Cato came back to Landover again on 1 July and this time spoke to all the assembled employees in a large conference room. Regarding his talk that day, Zais testified:

> He just came back to tell us that he had taken care of some of the suggestions and problems we had. Some of the people wanted medical cards. He got that for us. Some of the people wanted HMO. He had taken care of that. The meeting only lasted 4 or 5 minutes, and we went back to work.

John Wagnon, then an active employee, testified that with a number of local supervisors sitting beside him, Cato spoke as follows:

> The whole meeting was prefaced with a statement by Mr. Cato that he knew there was union activities going on and he just wanted to let everybody know that if they wanted to get their cards back that they could do so. And I believe it was Mr. Cardemon who further mentioned that the company could even give them a ride down to the union hall to get them back if they would like. And after that, they proceeded to tell us about many changes that were going to be occurring at Montgomery Ward, such as we were now going to be issued medical insurance cards because everybody had been complaining that they had no card to present in time of emergency at a hospital. So the statement was made that we were now going to be getting all those.
> Q. In relationship to medical insurance, did the subject of HMO come up at that meeting?
> A. Oh, yes and a document was passed out."

Cato then listed the changes and conditions of employment that had been decided on. These included: repair on machines that had been neglected, medical insurance card for each employee, reviews and evaluations to be on time henceforth, errors in pay would be adjusted without delay. Wagnon also recalled as follows:

> They went on to say that there will be the establishment of an employee feedback committee, which we hadn't had in the past, and if they didn't have an open door policy before they sure had one now, and that one of the regional supervisors, I guess it was Schmidt, would be coming in from time to time to meet with the employees, and Mr. Cosentini was now going to meet with the feed back committeee every month I believe it was. And then they further went on to us tell we were going to have benefit sessions with Anna Curry, the personnel specialist.

Cato also distributed to each employee that day a written note entitled "Implementation of HMO," explaining this was an opportunity for each employee to enroll in a form of health insurance. Wagnon made clear these were all matters directly tied to the complaints that had been voiced by the employees during Cato's earlier meetings, in which he had solicited their grievances.

Cato was not offered as a witness by the Respondent; therefore there is no direct contradiction from him of what the employee witnesses heard him say. Several supervisors of the Landover location were present when Cato gave his talk. A number of them testified at the hearing but did not refer to those talks at all. Pat Cosentini, one of the top men at Landover, testified regarding the talks in question. In substance his total testimony is not a contradiction of anything the two witnesses—Zais and Wagnon—said. Throughout his direct testimony Cosentini tried to create the impression that Cato's visit was no more than the usual concern of the Chicago office regarding how things were going on at Landover, that the conditions of employment listed by the Government witnesses were the usual problems of the place, things that did not really change. He said the Company always had an open-door policy, which has not changed. He said management always had meetings with the employees, and gave as an example the Pizza Blast (a company party) as an example. He even said that the Company had planned to improve security—one of the demands voiced by the employees—before the meetings Cato held. The witness' talk in direct testimony was evasive, generalized, and an obvious attempt to remove the subject of the Union entirely from Cato's talk those 2 days. But on cross-examination, Cosentini admitted Cato asked the employees to state their problems, and enumerated virtually the entire list of complaints mentioned by the earlier witnesses. He went on that at the 1 July meeting Cato told the employees that he had been able to make changes as they had asked and added that the employees should bring their problems to the personnel office, where they would be remedied. Asked had Cato announced the formation of an employee committee to resolve problems, the witness said:

> He [Cato] indicated that there's some people that were going to have, instead of the group meetings we were having, that we have smaller meetings and have individuals represented from each area, to form a committee.
> Q. And he announced that that was going to happen henceforth at that meeting?
>
> A. He announced that he was going to review that with management and get our feeling on it and put that into play.

Asked did Cato say there would henceforth be an "open policy," Cosentini answered:

> Well, something to that effect. . . . The employees came to him and talked about open door policy and he implied that we shall have it if we didn't have.

Cosentini's final admission, at the very end of his testimony, was that management "certainly was aware" of the union activity when Cato first came to Landover on 25 June. Moreover, he even said:

> He [Cato] was aware of the activity that was going on and he expressed his opinion.
> Q. What was his opinion?
> A. He felt like he didn't like to deal with a third party operation. Words to that effect.

That the distribution center manager deliberately tried to create a false impression of the purpose of Cato's appearance at the Landover location could not be clearer. His testimony is the starting point of the Respondent's discredited defense against the basic complaint. Cato's talks reveal clearly the Respondent's planned program to put a stop to the self-organizational campaign among the employees in complete defiance of the proscriptions of the statute. The case therefore starts with a complete finding of multiple violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Based on the direct testimony of Zais and Wagnon, which I credit, I find that (1) by soliciting grievances from the employees, (2) by acceding to their resultant demands, including improved safety conditions in the workplace, opportunity to enjoy the Company's health insurance plan, and an improved evaluation system and quick payment of salaries, (3) by suggesting the creation of an employees committee . . . to negotiate conditions of employment in the place of an outside union bargaining agent, and (4) by telling the employees that thereafter the Company would keep an "open door" policy to hear and consider their grievances, all for the purpose of influencing them away from their prounion resolve, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

One other offer that Cato made to the assembled employees on 1 July must be mentioned here. He told the employees that if they wished to get back their union cards they could do so. Cardemon, the supervisor, also present then, added, as Wagnon also testified, that if the employees so wished, the Company would give them a ride to the union hall to get cards back. This testimony stands completely uncontradicted. I therefore also find that by offering to assist its employees to withdraw from the Union, the Respondent again violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This finding is important because other employees also testified about such assistance being offered them by other supervisors.

Employee Natalie Menage testified that after the 1 July meeting by Cato ended, she was called to the office. As she approached the office, a company guard said to her, "We'll go to the union and get your card back." When she asked what the man was talking about, the guard repeated "We'll go get your card from the union hall." At this point Cosentini passed by and escorted Menage into the office of Operations Manager Cardemon. There, as Menage continued to testify, the conversation was:

> He said I heard a rumor that you want your card back that you signed and they won't give it back to you, and I said, "I don't know what your talking about." He said it again, and I said "I don't know what your talking about.' He said the card that you signed.

The employee said nothing about having signed the card, and she just left the office.

Called by the Respondent, Cardemon admitted calling Menage to his office on 1 July. He said his reason was because another employee, Linda Williams, a supervisor, had told him the employee was being harassed and therefore he should talk to the girl. He explained that by mistake he called Menage to his office instead of "Lisa," whom Williams had mentioned. Cardemon denied having offered to assist the employee get her union card back. His story is that all he said was he had heard the girl was being harassed and wished to help her have it stopped. Asked had he inquired of Menage what she was being "harassed" about, the witness said no. Asked had she told him what the harassment was about, again he said no. Finally, and most importantly, asked had the supervisor beneath him told him what the harassment of the girl was about, again the witness gave a clear "no." In short, Cardemon's testimony is that he talked for a while in the privacy of his office with Menage without either of them ever mentioning what the harassment was about. Can one believe such testimony?

Cardemon was followed on the witness stand by Linda Williams, the supervisor under him. She said, as plainly as can be, that when she spoke to Cardemon about the alleged harassment she said it was pressure put on an employee about joining the Union. Whatever other finding may be warranted on this record, one thing is absolutely clear, Cardemon lied on the witness stand. The Respondent's own witness proved that. By telling employee Menage he had heard she wanted her union card back—right after Cato's speech to all the employees offering them improved conditions of employment to get them out of the Union, and even offering to take them to the union hall to assist them in rejecting the Union—Cardemon was continuing the overall scheme of the Respondent to put a stop to the union campaign. His mere statement about knowing about Menage's union activity was a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and I so find.

Again the credibility finding, dictated by the direct testimony of the Respondent's own witness, ties in with the indirect question of credibility—why were the two men fired? —because the top managers, like Cardemon, were all involved in the management talks that took place when those two decisions were made.

On 19 June John Douglass, a field technician who uses a company van to go from one assignment to another all day long, stopped on his way home from his last assignment at a plaza mall where there is a restaurant called Big Boy. He stayed there several hours with the company van parked in the general parking lot, attended a union meeting held there, then had dinner, and drove home. The rule is that the technicians who use company vans for work, and there are about 22 of them at this location of the Respondent, take the van home at night, but may not use the van for "personal use." The record is replete with all kinds of situations where vans have been used, permissively, for having dinner or for other urgent situations, for by the employees.

James Custer, Douglass' immediate supervisor, testified that that same evening, 19 June, after going home from work, he drove to the same plaza mall to go shopping, arriving at 6:20 p.m. When he parked his car, he recognized Douglass' company van parked nearby. He said he watched it a while, knew it was not supposed to be there, and then went into a store to look for something. He said he was in that store for an hour but did not find what he wanted, and he went back to his parked car. I doubt anyone could spend a whole hour in a store just looking for something he could not find. He found Douglass' company van still parked in the same place, and then just sat in his own car until 10 p.m., doing nothing more than looking at it. At 10 o'clock he saw Douglass come out of the restaurant and drive away. Custer did not talk to Douglass then; he did not go near him, he just went away.

Douglass was fired the next day. Why did Custer just sit and watch that man for 3-1/3 hours? He knew it was a company van; he knew it was Douglass' van; if he was not sure, there was no reason for him to worry about that, because the number on the van was all he needed to connect it with the proper technician. He knew the employee was not working—at that late hour—in that area. If all he was concerned about was the violation of a company rule—as he said at the hearing, he had all he needed right away. Against these realities, Custer's explanation did him no credit. He said he wanted to see who was going to get into the truck, to see what the truck was doing there. His explanation does not make sense. He had to have another reason. Did he know there was a union meeting going on in that restaurant then? Did he want to see who would come out at the end of the meeting? I do not know. But one thing I am sure of—he was not telling the truth when he said he just sat 3-1/2 hours watching for no coherent reason.

This business of the men not telling the truth has a direct connection with what went on the next day when, for a myriad of added reasons—all recorded but entirely unexplained—Douglass was discharged. See below.
